

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. ## PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

IN THE FOURTH SESSION OF THE FOURTEENTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, APPOINTED TO MEET 11 NOVEMBER, 1841, AND FROM THENCE CONTINUED TILL 1 FEBRUARY, 1844, IN THE SEVENTH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, February 22, 1844.

MINUTES.] BILLS. Public.—3<sup>d</sup>. and passed :—Offences at Sea.

PETITIONS PRESENTED. From Sherborne, against Repeal of the Corn-laws.

THE ISLAND OF TAHITI.] Lord Brougham said, that he was anxious to ask a question of his noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, respecting an occurrence of great interest, which had been stated in the public papers to have taken place. He alluded to the occupation by the French of the Island of Tahiti. He was sure that his noble Friend would give him credit that nothing was further from his wish than to embarrass the Government on a subject which was most important to the preservation of the peace of the world, namely, our relations with France. He wished to know whether the event which he had alluded to had taken place, at least according to the accounts in the newspapers, and whether his noble Friend had received any intimation or communication from the French Government respecting the occupation of Tahiti by a French force? He did not wish to call upon his noble Friend to make any improper disclosures on the subject.

The Earl of Aberdeen believed that the statements which had appeared in the public papers were correct. He believed that it was perfectly true that a French naval force had taken military possession of the Island of Tahiti. He had heard of that event with great regret; but he was not in possession of any explanations of the French Government on the subject, as there had not been sufficient time to make communications and to receive an answer.

Lord Brougham agreed with his noble Friend in expressing the deepest regret at that event, which appeared most unadvised as long as it remained unexplained. He did not mean to say but that it might be explained. It might, perhaps, be disavowed by the French Government, but he could not conceal the deep feelings of regret when he saw what had occurred in the announcement of this occupation, feeling as he did the greatest admiration for that gallant nation—a nation so much to be admired for its many great military and civil qualities—and that they should have followed such a course as had been adopted on the present occasion. He considered that it was the deepest degradation to any party to adopt the tone which had been used by certain parties in France on this occasion. The persons who had resorted to the tone of expression to which he alluded were the enemies of peace, and more especially to the friendly relations subsisting between France and this country; such parties were bad friends to the honour and renown of the great nation to which he had alluded. The subject to which he alluded was the tone of exultation which had been adopted on the occupation of that Island, as if some great triumph had been achieved over this country in their taking possession of that small Island, which was inhabited by a race who had been justly and properly designated as the grown children—the defenceless children—of the South Sea Islands. It was not worthy of a great and gallant nation to make this a matter of boasting, which, in comparison of their former triumphs, must be regarded as nothing. Such a nation as France had need of no such laurels as it would acquire from such a proceeding, when it could boast of such victories as those of Marengo, and Austerlitz, and Eylau, and Jena, and Wagram, and other equally immortal victories which he could name. It was not worthy of such a people to boast of such a paltry acquisition as this. Those who made these boasts were not actuated by any love of French military glory in the eulogiums which they thus bestowed on this wretched acquisition. They did not care one straw for the glory of the French army. He, therefore, lamented that such language should have been used, and such arguments introduced, by any persons: but they had been resorted to by those whose only object was to work on the passions of an excitable people, so as to mar the prospects of peace, if that were possible; but he trusted that it would be impossible for any efforts of such persons as those to whom he had alluded to mar those prospects.

OFFENCES AT SEA BILL.] On the motion of Lord Wharncliffe, this Bill was read a third time and passed.

wished to move for a Return relative to a subject which was alluded to in the course of the debate the other night, and he believed that there would be no objection to furnish the papers in question. He was, however, anxious to make some observations in explanation of the reasons which had induced him to bring the subject under the notice of the House. It would be in the recollection of those noble Lords who took part in the discussion last Session, respecting the appointment to the Arch-deaconry of Armagh, that the particular circumstances attending the exercise of the Prerogative in that appointment, were brought under the attention of the House. From what then took place it appeared to be the general opinion that the English Government was not responsible for that appointment. It was said you must deal with that appointment as having been made on the authority of the Irish Government, and for which they were responsible. In the course of the last Session he had pointed out, and it was not denied, that the recommendations of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had been departed from in filling up this appointment to the Archdeaconry of Armagh. The Commissioners recommended that on any vacancy occurring in the Archdeaconry, that the two parishes constituting it should be separated, and that they should be bestowed in such a manner as to secure the residence of the Rector in each. The avoidance of that Archdeaconry was occasioned by the Government itself, which had appointed the clergyman holding this dignity to a Bishopric in Ireland; and they had, in his judgment, most improperly continued the union of the two parishes in favour of the gentleman whom they themselves had appointed to the vacant Archdeaconry of Armagh. It was true, that the recommendation of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners was given previous to the passing of the Church Temporalities Bill; therefore, at the time it was made, the resources of the union were larger than they were when the Government had to deal with the appointment in 1843. The value, however, of this piece of preferment amounted to 1,000*l.* a-year when it fell into the hands of the Government, and the recommendation of the Commissioners was, that on any vacancy arising, there should be two clergymen and two parishes. The Government passed over the recommendation of the Commissioners, and conferred this piece of preferment on one clergyman, by which arrangement they left the parish of Caledon, containing upwards of 2,000 members of the Church of England, without a resident clergyman. The defence made of that appointment by the noble Duke was, that it had taken place in consequence of the high character of the individual appointed, and of his peculiar adaptability to the situation in question. He would take this to be the case on the statement of the noble Duke. But if the defence of an appointment rested on the great capacity of any man for the office in question, it ought to be considered whether that was sufficient to justify a departure from the recommendation of the Commissioners. If this was to be the case, they had only to select a good and proper man for any appointment which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners wished to have abolished, and every one of the recommendations of the Commissioners might go for nothing. In that case, the excellence of the choice of the party was the only defence for the appointment; but would noble Lords opposite apply the same reason to the present case before the House. They, however, had been told a few nights ago, when allusion was made to this appointment, that it was merely honorary, and that peculiar circumstances called for it. When the case was first mentioned in that House the noble Lord, the President of the Council, said that the appointment of the Rev. Holt Waring to be Dean of Dromore was defended on this ground, that there were no emoluments annexed to the Deanery. Although this statement was made to his surprise, being at variance with the only information before Parliament, he confessed that he did not think it any thing extraordinary that the noble Lord might have been misinformed on the subject, and he was anxious that all doubt on the matter should be cleared up by the production of the Papers which he now intended to call for. If the noble Lord was correct in his information as to the reasons for this appointment, the reasoning in defence of the appointment of last year could not be applied to the present case. The latter appointment could hardly be justified on the grounds of the merits of the individual upon whom it was bestowed, for it was on this ground only, that the Archdeaconry with the united parishes, producing 1,000*l.* a-year, was conferred on Mr. Stokes, in direct opposition to the recommendations of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. It should be recollected, that the state of these parishes was first brought under the attention of Parliament by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners appointed by the noble Duke when he was at the head of a former Government, and the report of which Commission was laid before Parliament in 1831. He knew not what alteration had been made since, as regarded the emoluments connected with the Deanery of Dromore, but he found a description of that Church Dignity in the report of the Commissioners. It appeared, that it comprised a union of six parishes, which were sixteen miles by nine miles in extent. In each of these parishes was a church, and also in each parish resided a considerable number of Protestants, who were members of the Established Church. In each parish, also, there was a resident vicar, who received the vicarial tithes, while the rectorial tithes constituted the emoluments of the Deanery. He did not know the exact amount of the emoluments thus received, but he found that the tithes of one of these parishes was 250*l.* a-year, independent of the vicarial tithes. If the same thing applied to the other parishes constituting the union when the report was made in 1831, it was clear that the Deanery of Dromore was at that period a profitable benefice. Undoubtedly, it was quite certain, that in 1831 the rectorial tithes went to the Dean of Dromore. The recommendation of the Commissioners was, that on a vacancy occurring in the Deanery a severance of the union should take place, and that the revenues arising from the parish, five miles long and four miles broad, should constitute the emolument of the Deanery of Dromore. It appeared from the report that the revenue of this parish was 497*l.*, or 500*l.* a-year, derived from tithes. Now, he wished to know whether there had been any diminution of the revenue derived from those parishes since that time. According to the recommendations of the Commissioners there was to be a severance of this union, and the tithes of one parish, the amount of which he had just stated, was to constitute the future emoluments of the holder for the time being of the Deanery. He, therefore, inferred from this Report that the communication that had been made by the noble Lord, alleging that there were no emoluments annexed to the Deanery of Dromore, was erroneous. He (Lord Monteagle) was not affirming that he was necessarily right as to the facts of the case, as he could only draw his information from the Reports of the Commissioners which were before the House. If there had been no severance of the union the emoluments of the benefice must be large, but even if the emoluments of the Deanery had been reduced as recommended, were only the tithes of a single parish, the result would be, that since the passing of the Church Temporalities Act the revenue would not be reduced below 500*l.* a-year. He could not, therefore, understand how it could be asserted that the Deanery of Dromore was a benefice without emolument. He trusted, however, that a benefice of such high dignity in the Church would not be held valueless, whether there were emoluments or not annexed to it. He would now proceed to advert to the manner in which this benefice had been filled up. In the selection of a person to be appointed to the Archdeaconsry of Armagh, they had been told that the step that had been taken was justified from the circumstance that the person was not in any way a political character, and that he was, from his acquirements and qualities eminently fitted for that office. This was the ground on which the noble Lord rested to justify this appointment, which was made directly contrary to the recommendation of the Commissioners. Now, he begged noble Lords to consider what were the inducements to the appointment to the benefice which he was now alluding to. It was immaterial for his argument whether this dignity was accompanied with emoluments—whether it possessed considerable emoluments, and involved the performance of duties, or whether it was a sinecure without emoluments—when he regarded the manner in which it had been filled. He was not desirous of laying down any fanciful standard as to the selection for a Church appointment, nor would he go back to remote periods to search into the character or conduct of those who were named to stations of authority in the Church. He should not make a complaint on any abstract ground, but he did complain of Her Majesty's Ministers, that they were acting in this case against their own declarations as to the mode in which they meant to act in their distribution of Church patronage in Ireland. For these good intentions, they claimed credit as evidence of the honourable and impartial disposition of the Government. The extract which he was about to read was written by the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government on the subject of Church patronage. The letter was dated the 14th of September, 1841, and was addressed to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. That right hon. Gentleman observed,—

“ Let it be understood, that in respect to the Church preferments, you will act on your own sense of duty, and on the result of your own inquiries; and if that sense of duty prompts you to prefer the claims of professional merit, let your inquiries be directed to the ascertainment of those claims.”

The general purport of the letter was obviously to give to the Lord-Lieutenant the unrestrained power of selecting for the objects of his Church patronage in Ireland persons, the most deserving from their virtues and their acquirements. The next paragraph proceeded,—

“ It is absolutely necessary, for the best interests of Church and State, that the patronage of the Irish Church should be applied on such principles. I will willingly forego any Parliamentary support which will only be conciliated by the disregard of those principles; though, indeed, the fact is, that if such considerations are to be attended to, the interests of the Government are, on the long run, much better promoted by the honest exercise of patronage, than by administering it to favour individual supporters.”

He thought that the general import of these suggestions would not be objected to by any of his noble Friends; on the contrary, that they would meet with their approbation. The letter to which he alluded, was read in a discussion in the House of Commons, and therefore might be regarded as a public document; certainly if it could be viewed as a private letter, he would not have read it, or allowed it to influence him. It appeared from the first observation in this letter, that the responsibility and the patronage of these appointments were transferred from the Home Government in Downing-street to the Irish Government, and the power was given to the Lord-Lieutenant to make such appointments as corresponded with the principles laid down in this letter. How did it appear that the ecclesiastical appointment now under consideration could be defended on the ground, that it was in conformity with Sir R. Peel's letter? Could there be any doubt that the ecclesiastical appointments to high stations in Ireland were matters of great and serious importance at the present time in Ireland? His noble Friend near him (the Marquess of Normanby) could refer with satisfaction to the ecclesiastical appointments made by him while at the head of the Government of Ireland, for he was enabled to challenge public opinion, and even the judgment of his political opponents, as to the propriety of the ecclesiastical appointments made by him. He believed that no doubt had ever been entertained or expressed as to the excellence of his appointments to high dignities in the Church, or even insinuate that they had not been bestowed on those in the highest degree qualified to fill them. He said this with confidence, for he knew that noble Lords opposite would not have abstained from complaint, had an opportunity been afforded. He was sure that it must be in the recollection of noble Lords, that even the appointment of Justices in a corporate town, and the nomination of Registrar of Births and Marriages, had been made a matter of charge and accusation against the late Government. It was clear, that Her Majesty's present Ministers were fully aware of how much importance it was to exercise the greatest caution in their appointments to the high ecclesiastical dignities in Ireland; but let the House now consider who the gentleman was who was recently selected to fill an office of great dignity in the Church—the Deanery of Dromore—possessing either large emoluments, or being only an honorary appointment, he cared not which—but which was a station next in rank to that of a Bishop in the Church. The noble Lord (Lord Wharnccliffe), on a former occasion, when the subject of this appointment was alluded to, and when a noble Friend of his referred to an exhibition of conduct on the part of this dignitary which, on the part of a clergyman, was not of a very seemly kind or character, stated, that the newspaper paragraph, from which the description of the proceedings had been taken, was grossly exaggerated. Now he (Lord Monteagle) would refer to no newspaper paragraph to no report of a hostile character respecting this gentleman, but he would refer to the evidence which the reverend gentleman himself gave on oath before a Committee of that House. He should like to know what noble Lords opposite, who were parties to this appointment, thought of such evidence? It appeared, that in the year 1825, the most serious inquiry that had ever been entered into as to the state of Ireland was undertaken by Parliament, and this at a period when Lord Liverpool was at the head of the Government in England, and Lord Wellesley was Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland—the investigation before that Committee lasted a considerable time, and persons of all classes, and drawn from all parts of the country, and of every shade of political opinion and of religious belief, were brought before the Committee and examined on oath. The Rev. Holt Waring was brought before this Committee, and examined on oath. He was asked in 1825,

“How long were you a member of the Orange Society?—Since 1798. Have you held any office under the Society?—I have. What office?—I undertook the office of Secretary. Did you hold any other office in the Society?—No, except chaplain. Have you ever been present at the procession of Orangemen?—I have.”

The witness was then asked what remedial measures he would recommend for the state of Ireland. The witness proceeded to recommend that the Roman Catholics should be deprived of the Elective Franchise, and that the Act of 1793 should be repealed.

“This might conduce, that is, it might tend towards tranquillity, but I believe would not accomplish it at the present time. It would give confidence and satisfaction to the Protestants of Ireland, and would have very little bad effect on the Roman Catholics; who are already in opposition to the Government, and are desirous to separate England from Ireland, as we have reason to suppose; and who are bound, as was lately exposed on public trials in Dublin, to the extirpation of the Protestant religion out of Ireland; therefore, I think it would not altogether accomplish tranquillity, it would make us better, and them no worse.”

Now, he would ask the House to consider the character of this evidence, and whether it could be listened to without feelings of mingled astonishment and regret. The next question elicited a still more extraordinary answer. He was asked,

“On what ground do you consider the Roman Catholics in opposition to the Government?—Their being almost universally bound together by oaths of a treasonable nature, and having been convicted of acting up to their oaths in every instance that they have been tried for it.”

Here was a charge brought against the Catholics of Ireland, according to which they not only were opposed to the Government of the day, but that they were charged as engaged in attempts to form conspiracies for the extirpation of the Protestants of Ireland. Such was the evidence of the Rev. Holt Waring, whom the present Government had selected of their own accord to fill a dignified office in the Church, and to perform the ecclesiastical functions as Dean of Dromore in the present day. He found also in the Papers which were on the Table respecting Orange Lodges, that in 1833 and 1834, the name of the Rev. Holt Waring appeared as Grand Chaplain to the Orange Society of Ireland. It should be remembered that the Orange Society, the members of which took secret oaths, was given up when the Act of Parliament was passed enacting that all oaths taken in secret societies rendered them illegal. The Orange Society, therefore, gave up their illegal oaths, but instead thereof they substituted solemn declarations, and subsequent to this, and at the present time, to make matters more serious, an attempt was made to reconstruct the system of Orange Lodges in the north of Ireland. [Lord Wharncliffe: “When did that appear?”] He saw the announcement in the public prints, and he believed that it was the case. This Mr. Holt Waring, a man of large fortune and influence, had been appointed to this high ecclesiastical dignity, just at the time when an attempt was made to revive the Orange Lodges in the North of Ireland. He admitted, however, that at the time when attempts were some years since made to get up Orange processions in the North of Ireland, the Rev. Holt Waring interfered to prevent the placing Orange emblems on the church of which he was the Rector, and to prevent the desecration of the church. That rev. Gentleman succeeded in this, but did not do more. [Lord Wharncliffe: “When was that?”] About two or three years ago. What he wanted to know in the first place was, whether it was a fact that this was an appointment without emolument; and he should also like to know whether the ground which justified the selection of the Rev. Holt Waring to the Deanery of Dromore was the decorum of his conduct, or his peculiar fitness for the office to which he had been appointed. As to Members of Orange Societies—there could be no question that they were illegal—the man taking the oath, and the man administering it, were both guilty of an illegal act, for which they might have been indicted, if there had been evidence of it; and here the Government had selected as an object of especial favour for promotion in the Church of Ireland a man who was a great dignitary in that illegal association from the year 1798 to 1825, and a Gentleman who gave the evidence to which he had referred, and of which the Members of the Government ought to have been aware at the time the appointment was made, the evidence in which he spoke of the Roman Catholics having been bound together by oaths of a treasonable character and having been convicted of acting up to those oaths on every occasion when they had been tried. If men of that description were to be made objects of preference by the Crown, if they were to be made depositories of the favour of the Crown, and, above all, were selected for Church patronage, it was in vain to consider that the principles laid down by Sir Robert Peel’s measure were carried practically into effect, which set forth the principle of abandonment of all political motive, and the selection of persons for appointments in the Church for professional merit and piety alone. What was the ground of the selection of the Gentlemen here referred to? would it be justified on these grounds, or on the ground that he was a very rich man? This appointment appeared to him a departure from the principle laid down by the head of the Government, by the selection of a man for high Church preferment who was known as a violent partizan, and whose evidence was, in fact, that he had preferred an indictment on oath against the great mass of the people by whom he was surrounded. In conclusion he would beg to move for a Return of the parishes constituting the Deanery of Dromore, as laid before the Commissioners in 1830, and a copy of any orders which might have been subsequently issued, altering the nature of the preferment, and showing exactly what it now is.

The Earl of Ripon was not about to object to the Motion which his noble Friend had made. It was very proper that their Lordships should be put in possession of the information he claimed; but as he had prefaced his Motion by remarks of a criminatory character, he felt called upon to make a few observations. He had no intention of going into the question of the Archdeaconry of Armagh. He had stated last year what appeared to him sufficient grounds for the steps which had been taken. He was by no means clear whether he could then recollect all the circumstances of the case as they were communicated to him, and by him to the House; but with regard to this particular appointment of the Rev. Holt Waring to the Deanery of Dromore, he knew that the noble Lord was entirely mistaken in some most important and material facts on which he seemed to have relied. He (Lord Montague) entertained considerable doubt whether this was a dignity without any emolument, but he (the Earl of Ripon) begged to repeat that it was not only a dignity without any emolument, but it could not be so by law. His noble Friend had referred to certain documents laid before the House, but he would state how the facts stood subsequent to that period; but of course he could not find fault with the noble Lord for not knowing what he was about to state. The noble Lord was mistaken if he supposed that what had been done was confined to the suggestion made by the Commissioners. In 1834 an Act was passed, to which he had not adverted, to amend the Church Temporalities Act, and a clause in that Act directed that in case of a vacancy of the Deanery of Dromore, or any other dignity below that of Archbishop or Bishop, it should be competent for the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to recommend to the Lord Lieutenant and Privy Council to suspend the appointment of any such dignitary, if they thought fit; and it might be competent for the Lord Lieutenant and the Privy Council to give effect to such recommendation; and it was provided further, that, during the time of such Deanery being suspended, all profits derived from it should be applied to the purposes of the Ecclesiastical Commission. But the next clause proceeded to state, that after such a suspension of an appointment had taken place, if it should seem fit to the Lord Lieutenant, or the necessary authorities, whoever they might be, to remove the suspension, it should be competent for them to do so, provided all tithes and emoluments were dis severed from the dignity to be conferred. So that the Act of Parliament made it impossible that this Deanery, conferred on Mr. Holt Waring, could carry with it any emolument whatever. Now, what was the course taken with respect to this Deanery? Under the law to which he had referred it appeared that, in the year 1837, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recommended the suspension of the appointment to the Deanery, by an instrument dated the 18th of April in that year. There being then a vacancy in the Deanery, the Lord Primate submitted to the Commission that the rectorial tithes of the six parishes constituting the cure of the Deanery should be disappropriated, and applied to augment the vicarages in the same parishes. Both these recommendations were submitted to the Privy Council, who reported that, finding that certain matters over which his Grace the Lord Primate had no control, and which were necessary to precede the final adjustment of his Grace's plan, remained undone, and that the composition ending with the year 1837 had become due and payable, they recommended that the appointment to the said Deanery should be suspended until the Lord Lieutenant and Privy Council should think fit otherwise to direct. An order was made for the suspension, dated 22nd December, 1837. The subject was again brought forward before the Privy Council on the 25th of May, 1838, when they reported that the objection to the adoption of the plan proposed by the Lord Primate had, since their report, been removed, and they accordingly recommended that the suspension should be removed, and all the rectorial tithes of the Deanery should be severed therefrom, and united to the vicarages of the six parishes forming the cure. An order was accordingly made to remove the suspension, dated the 9th of October, 1838, and a further order was made of the same date, disappropriating the revenues, and appropriating them otherwise; so that all these emoluments were dis severed from the dignity, and the gentleman who now held it could derive no possible emolument from it whatever. That would appear in the Papers for which the noble Lord had moved. Now the noble Lord next went into the question of the personal character of this gentleman, and he read extracts from evidence given by him in the year 1825, nineteen years ago. His noble Friend had doubtless an exceedingly accurate memory and a very scrutinising eye, and he had had the good fortune, for his own purpose, to pick out of that evidence what had been stated by that gentleman, which he had not the slightest recollection of, although he read the evidence given at the time: and, in fact, he did not recollect that he had ever been examined at all. At all events, the expressions were used nineteen years ago; and he thought if their Lordships were all to be tried by the opinions which they had expressed at such a distant period, they would come off very indifferently. He had no doubt he (the Earl of Ripon) had said very many foolish things in his time, and he should not like to be tried by such a standard, and which, he thought, ought not to be sanctioned for the purpose of throwing odium on the character of this gentleman. But how came this gentleman to be appointed to this office? What induced the Lord Lieutenant to confer the appointment on him? It was a recommendation, or memorial, addressed to the Lords Justices, in August, 1842, a year before the agitation had reached its highest point. Now, his noble Friend tried to connect this matter with what had been going on very recently. He said, what a time, when Ireland was almost in a state of rebellion, to show to the Catholics, by such an appointment, the spirit by which you are actuated towards them. But his noble Friend must remember that this appointment was made in 1842, before the Repeal Agitation had become so great. But, further, a recommendation was made to the Lord Lieutenant, pointing out that it was desirable that a person should be appointed to perform whatever duties there were as connected with this Deanery; and the Chapter, the Canons, or whatever they might be, they all united in recommending this Gentleman, on the ground that he was the oldest beneficed clergyman in the whole district. This was not a reason that indicated a desire for Parliamentary support; but this was reported by the Bishop of the Diocese, who confirmed and recommended it; and after due consideration this Gentleman was appointed to this empty honour—empty, at least, as far as it concerned the emoluments. The Lord Lieutenant was bound also to consider who was likely to take it, for it was not everybody who would do so—but Mr. Holt Waring resided in the neighbourhood. If they had taken a poor man, however respectable, from a distant part of the country, and placed him in that dignity, how could he reside there?

He ventured to say, that if his noble relative had hunted about for some one else, he would have found some difficulty in getting anybody to take it; and if he (the Earl of Ripon) was not misinformed, his noble relative's predecessor did offer the dignity to an individual who would not take it. But one word as to the Resolution of Parliament with reference to Orange Societies. It was only a Resolution, but certainly a most important one, and he was not sure whether it was not laid before His Majesty; but he had stated, and he would adhere to that conviction, that the conduct of this Mr. Waring, a zealous and eager man, if they pleased, and full of prejudices; but his conduct, as he (the Earl of Ripon) had been informed by a person who lived in his neighbourhood, and who was a Member of that House, was most praiseworthy, for he exerted all his influence and power, and it was great, to induce his friends, neighbours, and dependents, many of whom were poor, ignorant, and full of the most vehement feelings by which those Societies were actuated—he exerted himself, he (the Earl of Ripon) said, in the most earnest manner to induce them to pay willing obedience to the Resolution of Parliament; and, in conclusion, he would say, that a man who had thus sacrificed all his feelings, and made atonement for the past, was not to be reproached as undeserving of the confidence of the Government.

The Marquess of Normanby said, he was not aware that his noble Friend intended to do more than move for the Papers. If he had seen him before, he should have borne testimony to the accuracy of that part of the statement of his noble Friend opposite, with reference to the transactions of 1837 and 1838, as to the Deanery of Dromore. He had before stated, that he thought the appointment had been very improperly conferred on Mr. Holt Waring. His noble Friend opposite stated that the evidence which had been quoted by his noble Friend behind him was given nearly twenty years ago, and persons changed their opinions in that time. Some did, but others did not. But that the opinion of Mr. Holt Waring had not been lately taken up by him, he thought was sufficiently evident from his own statement at the time, when he said that he had been twenty-seven years a member of an Orange Lodge. Then with reference to the continuance of the sentiments he had expressed, he must say, that a much stronger objection to his appointment arose from his unbecoming conduct as a clergyman in taking a large body of men, marching in military array, to a public meeting, the object of which was not to uphold the Union between the two countries, but by an exhibition of force to awe the Executive Government of the country. But the noble Earl said it was difficult to find any one to perform the duties of this office; why the Deanery of Dromore was an absolute sinecure. Then what was it after all but another instance, which he mentioned with much regret, of that conduct which had been most unfortunate and impolitic with reference to the Government of Ireland, which was giving all the dignities and honours of the Church to the most zealous partizans that could be found. Whatever respect he might have for the Gentlemen whom the Government had elevated to the Bench, he must say, that whilst persons hostile to the Educational System filled that dignified position, and whilst all the Church patronage in Ireland was given in that direction, it was impossible for the Government ever to convince the great masses of the population there, that they were sincere in their professions, and would give all due support and countenance to the Educational System of Ireland. He thought it necessary to say a few words with reference to the appointment of Mr. Holt Waring; he would, however, add, that when Parliament intimated their desire that the Orange Societies should cease, he was quite aware that Mr. Waring had taken the step which his noble Friend opposite had referred to. By this improper appointment the name of Mr. Waring was brought before the public, and he had been always distinguished for his prejudices. The noble Earl, not then in his place, the Master of the Orange Lodges, had taken the same step as that which Mr. Waring had been praised for, but noble Lords opposite would hardly think it right, he presumed, to appoint to any important office, a Nobleman who had exhibited such strong party feeling.

Lord Wharnccliffe said the noble Lord who had made the Motion had fortified it by bringing forward evidence of what Mr. Waring had said many years ago; but he would put it to the noble Marquess and the noble Lord whether they thought the raking up of these matters for many years was the way to tranquillize Ireland, or induce persons who had held strong opinions in the course of their lives to behave as he (Lord Wharnccliffe) thought they ought to do towards their fellow-countrymen. They had arrived at a time when he thought it would be better to forget all these things. The noble Lord had alluded to the appointment of Law-officers, which, he said, he thought was improper. He (Lord Wharnccliffe) thought that at the time the answer given to that objection was perfectly good—that it was no reason why, if four or five years before a gentleman had been a member of the Precursor, or any other political society, he should be excluded from promotion in his profession: and he would say so in this case, that it was not a reason for excluding this gentleman because twenty years ago he had had strong feelings, when many people not only in Ireland, but in this country, had also—for we were then in the midst of a great struggle with Ireland. He would repeat that it was not fair to adduce these things as proofs and reasons why a clergyman who might in other respects be perfectly fit for his office, should not be honoured by such an appointment as that which had been conferred upon him. If the noble Lord had brought a case against the Government of the conduct of this gentleman of late years, it might be different; but merely because ten years ago he appeared at the head of his parishioners, or that twenty years ago he gave the evidence spoken of, when he had since shown a desire to disband the Orange Societies, he thought it was not right to impugn his conduct now.

Lord Campbell said, that in his humble opinion his noble Friend was justified in bringing forward this matter and well justified in introducing the topics which he had alluded to. The noble Lord the President of the Board of Trade said, that the appointment took place in 1842, when there was no agitation. [The Earl of Ripon dissented.] When there was little agitation. [The Earl of Ripon: “No, No.”] Well, then, he said the appointment was not recent, when the Repeal agitation was at its height, but in 1842, when there was but little agitation. Why had they the agitation now? It was from such appointments being made. [“Oh, Oh,” and Laughter from the Ministerial Benches.] Noble Lords might try to treat this with ridicule, but he believed it was the opinion of a large portion of the public body, that by such appointments all hope was taken away from the Catholic community, that their just rights would be attended to, and it was from such causes that they had been induced to join in the Repeal agitation to such an extent as to bring the Empire into its present state of peril. His noble Friend had proved, that in the year 1825, Mr. Holt Waring expressed sentiments against the Roman Catholic body, as a body, of the most offensive description; and what evidence was there that he had ever retracted those sentiments? In the year 1834 he certainly had not, for it was then he headed the procession which it had been stated was an attempt to overawe the Executive of the country, after which it appeared, that he discouraged the Orange Lodges; but that did not show that he had altered his principles with regard to the Catholic body. Did he show any charity towards them as fellow Christians, that he respected their rights, and was willing to live in peace and tranquillity with them; and that he fostered those feelings that ought to prevail among all persuasions of Christians. There had been nothing to show that his opinions in these respects had been altered. If that were so could this be called a proper appointment in 1842, when the new Government had been installed into office when they had Ireland handed over to them in a state of peace and tranquillity—when it was to be seen if they would follow up the course that had been pursued—whether the practical enjoyment of equal rights for six years was to be continued? That there was no emolument belonging to this office had been proved; but it was an honour, a distinction meant to express the favour of the Crown, and the Executive Government of the time to this individual; and in that point of view it must be considered by all the Roman Catholic population of Ireland.

The Duke of Wellington said, he begged to call the attention of their Lordships to one circumstance. This gentleman was recommended for the appointment by the Chapter in August 1842, who petitioned the Lords Justices to give them the advantage of having a Dean added to their body. This petition was presented to the Lord Lieutenant by the lord Bishop of the diocese—so there were the Bishop and Chapter concurring in recommending that this appointment should be made, and that the appointment should be conferred on this gentleman. All this, however, material as it was, had been entirely left out of the case, as stated by the noble Lord, and had been inadequately brought forward, as he thought by his noble Friend. It was thought necessary to run this gentleman down on account of what he had stated in evidence nineteen years ago; but that fact was totally left out of the case, although it was distinctly stated by his noble Friend. It was in consequence of that recommendation that the appointment was made, and he thought it was perfectly justifiable.

The Marquess of Westmeath said, that when this subject was introduced, in the general debate, he was surprised; but he was not so much astonished that it was now brought forward as a party Motion to create effect out of doors. Could anything be so unfair? He felt it as having been a resident in Ireland, for he was convinced that this matter would be felt by every one at his fireside. A statement that appointments were made for the purpose of insulting a large class of Her Majesty's subjects was injurious to the peace of every family who wished to live securely under the Government. It was not his wish to defend the Government in this matter—they did not want his assistance—but as an honest country gentleman he felt it right to address a few observations to their Lordships. What could be more unfair than to have read this evidence given four years before the Emancipation Act passed, at a period when most parties in Ireland had forgotten their cause of disagreement? A new series of events had taken place, and the dates should have been taken up from a later period. Nothing but the most unhandsome conduct could induce any one to rake up evidence which was given when Orangemen did feel that they were the best defenders of the country. The noble and learned Lord who last addressed the House went to the extent of saying, that this appointment had been considered an insult by all the Roman Catholics of the country who had been agitating the subject of Repeal. He had no doubt he had read the reports of their proceedings at their debating societies as closely as the noble and learned Lord, and he did not recollect having seen that the appointment of Mr. Waring was given as a reason for causing a separation of the two countries.

The observations which had been made on that side of the House would stamp upon the proceeding the character and feeling which had dictated it, and the manner in which it ought to be received in Ireland. Was it on account of emolument? In what position did the noble Lord himself stand? When he was in office, a gentleman prominent in politics was appointed to a patent place—a situation his physical powers did not enable him to fill. The noble Lord thought the right hon. Gentleman might not outlive the Government of which he was a Member. But what happened? A pension was procured for that right hon. Gentleman, and the noble Lord got his place in time to have a pension himself of 2,000*l.* a-year. If this were true, he could not help telling him that the words “Holt Waring” would hang as well under a sinecure Deanery, as those of “Spring Rice” under a pension and a peerage.

Lord Monteagle said, after the remarks which had been made upon his Motion, he would merely trouble their Lordships with a few observations. He would not make any reply on a subject of a personal nature, which certainly had no kind of connection with the question before the House; and he would deal with that question utterly unconcerned, without using any unparliamentary terms, at what had been introduced. He denied altogether that he could be charged with bringing this case forward: he had only referred to the rules of the distribution of Church patronage laid down by the Premier, and had applied those rules to the present appointments. The noble Lord, the President of the Board of Trade, would have had it believed that the Chapter being incomplete for the performance of its functions, wished it to have it completed by having a Dean; but no duties are required; it was a mere sinecure—an appointment which was a matter of personal distinction, intimating the approval of the Government for the conduct of the individual. His object in bringing forward the case was not adverse to Mr. Holt Waring: he only desired that the Government should justify the appointment. They were informed that there was no emolument attached to the Deanery; but there was a recommendation of the Commissioners, which went to attaching a living to the Deanery, and he had doubts whether, in point of law, if that living fell in, the Dean would not be entitled to it.

The Duke of Richmond did not wish to take part in the debate, but he certainly felt that expressions of rather too strong a nature, and of too personal a character, had fallen from his noble Friend on his left (the Marquess of Westmeath). He did not at the time rise to order, because he found, from experience, that when noble Lords were angry, rising to order often made them more angry still; and upon this point, he thought that a late occasion had shown that the House had reason so to think. He would ask noble Lords, however, whether it was consistent with the dignity of the House, whether it was right, whether the country would look up to them with that respect they had hitherto done, if they did not do their utmost to keep their tempers, and not to sanction the use of personal language. He did not call upon his noble Friend to do more than he would do if left to his own feelings; but if his noble Friend asked his opinion, he would say that he did, in the heat of debate, use expressions which were not strictly in order.

The Marquess of Westmeath, called upon as he was by the noble Duke in so handsome a manner, would not be the person to persist in disorderly conduct. He had felt strongly when he had used the expressions; and if their Lordships thought them disorderly—and the noble Duke was an excellent interpreter of order—he had no objection to say that he had been disorderly, and had exceeded the bounds of fair discussion in what had fallen from him.

Motion agreed to. House adjourned.

TAHITI.] Sir G. Grey said, that since the question which had been put on a former evening to the Government, with reference to the condition of Tahiti, there had appeared a statement in the French and English newspapers, that that Island had been taken possession of by the French Admiral in those seas, and that the native Queen had been compelled to take refuge on board a British ship. He wished to know whether Government had received any information on the subject, and, if so, whether they would lay it before the House.

Sir R. Peel said, that when the question referred to was put the other evening, he had stated with the utmost truth, that he had no information on the subject. The account of the transaction, however, appeared the next day in the public papers, and since, by a vessel arrived from Tahiti, probably the same which brought the published account, Government had received despatches from the British authorities at the Island. The information he had received went to show that the accounts referred to by the right hon. Gentleman were correct. He believed it to be the case, that the French Admiral in those seas had taken possession of Tahiti. All he could at present say on the subject was, that he deeply regretted what had taken place. At the same time, he had no reason to believe that the course pursued had had the previous sanction of, or was in consequence of any instructions from the French Government. He had had no opportunity as yet of communicating with the French Government on the subject, and under these circumstances, he was sure the right hon. Gentleman and the House would think he was exercising the soundest discretion in abstaining from making any further reference to the matter at present, and he would at the same time venture to deprecate discussion on the subject on the part of other Members. At a future time, when they had fuller information, they would have ample opportunity for taking the affair into consideration.

STATE OF IRELAND — ADJOURNED DEBATE (EIGHTH NIGHT).] Mr. Maurice O'Connell would promise the right hon. Gentleman, and the House, that he would not detain them long. He proposed to confine himself to meeting certain statements which had been made on the preceding evening by the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland. That right hon. and learned Gentleman, in the beginning of his speech, had thought proper to taunt the traversers as to their conduct in reference to the reporter, Mr. Bond Hughes. He (Mr. M. O'Connell) could not but think that when the right hon. and learned Gentleman made his statement with reference to Mr. Bond Hughes, he had but a very limited recollection of the facts of the matter. The case as regarded that person stood just thus. Mr. Bond Hughes laid an information, that at a certain meeting at Mullaghmast, he saw Mr. Barrett present, and that Mr. Barrett addressed the meeting. Let this be admitted. He further swore, that on a subsequent occasion he saw Mr. Barrett at a meeting in Abbey-street, and immediately after the Proclamation which prevented the Clontarf meeting, also at a dinner held at the Rotunda, at which, he believed it was further said by Mr. Bond Hughes, that Mr. Barrett spoke. Now, when at a later day, the traversers attended at the chambers of Mr. Justice Burton, amongst those there present, on the part of the Crown, was Mr. Bond Hughes, who attended for the purpose of correcting an error he had made as to the Christian name of one of the traversers. He there saw Mr. Barrett for the second time, and after seeing him, as he stated in his evidence two months afterwards, which was the first the traversers heard of the correction, he became aware that he had made a mistake in stating Mr. Barrett to have been present at the Abbey-street meeting, and at the Rotunda meeting. This, he stated at the time to Mr. Kemmis's head clerk, in the presence of Mr. Kemmis; but nothing was done in consequence. When a summons was served on Mr. Bond Hughes to answer the complaint of wilful and corrupt perjury, Mr. Kemmis appeared for him to oppose the informations, but he never made any allusion on that occasion to the statement which Mr. Hughes had made, namely, that he had made a mistake, and Mr. Kemmis thus allowed Mr. Hughes to remain under the imputation of wilful and corrupt perjury. On the fourth or fifth day of term, a mandamus was applied for at the Court of Queen's Bench, to compel the Police Magistrates to take informations for perjury against Mr. Hughes, and although that motion was opposed, yet no allusion was made to the mistake that Mr. Hughes admitted he had made. Now, he thought one could not entirely acquit Mr. Bond Hughes for allowing so grave a charge as perjury to hang over him, when it was obviously his duty to take the first opportunity of meeting it. But he was a Crown witness, and it must be supposed, that he was in the hands of the Officers of the Crown. Those Crown Officers contented themselves with resisting the application for the mandamus moved for on the part of the traversers, and they allowed the charge to hang over Mr. Bond Hughes from the 16th of October until he was examined as a witness on the trial, when, in the course of cross-examination, it was elicited from him that he had committed a mistake. He thought the only blame that could be attached to Mr. Bond Hughes was, that he allowed the matter to rest in the hands of the Crown Solicitor, instead of taking it up himself, and placing it in its proper light before the public. The moment it was placed in its proper light before the public, that moment the obloquy which had been cast upon Mr. Hughes ceased. With that peculiar disposition which characterises the Irish people, every thing as regarded Mr. Bond Hughes, was dropped and forgiven, and Mr. Hughes instead of being held up as an object of obloquy, was set right before the public in the papers, the Editor of one of those papers, through the agency of which Mr. Hughes was set right, having been one of the very persons who was the subject of one of the mistakes. He thought, therefore, that it would have been wiser of the Attorney General if he had stated what the facts were as regarded the course that was adopted towards Mr. Bond Hughes, instead of stating merely that he had been an object of vituperation. If he had been for a time exposed to obloquy, it was the fault of Mr. Kemmis, that he had been exposed to it so long, and the blame, instead of being thrown on the public, ought to have rested upon the officers of the Crown. Why did not the officers of the Crown, instead of contenting themselves with opposing the informations against Mr. Hughes, and the application for a mandamus to oblige the Magistrates to take these informations—why did they not, instead of contenting themselves with that, state at once, that Mr. Bond Hughes had fallen into a mistake. The right hon. the Attorney General for Ireland said a good deal last night with respect to the applications which had been made for copies of the Jurors' Lists, but he did not state why the application for a copy of the caption of the indictment had been opposed. A different course had been pursued in Ireland from that which prevails in England; the application for a copy of the caption had been opposed, but it would not have been opposed in England; it would be furnished to the Solicitor for the traversers as a matter of right. In fact, Justice Perrin stated, that he believed it to be the right of the traversers, and that although it had not been customary to furnish it in Ireland, the fact of the right having slumbered, did not deprive the parties of that which they were entitled to. The traversers were to be called on to plead to the indictment in which the caption was, and if there was a material error in the caption, it would quash the indictment. They were called on to plead to that, which, according to the Attorney General, they had no right to get. But was that the only case in which the traversers were opposed in the proceedings which they felt it necessary to take? They put in a plea of abatement, which they were entitled to do under the statute, and the Attorney General demurred to the plea—they applied again, and it was decided by the Court, that they had a right to a four-day rule, and accordingly they obtained that rule, as the Chief Justice stated that he found it was consistent with the practice of the Court to grant that rule; and what was the conduct of the right hon. the Attorney General on that occasion? The Attorney General expressed his opposition to it, and said:—

“ I insist that as the Chief Officer of the Crown, and representing the Sovereign in this case, I am at liberty to form my opinion, and I say again, that I considered these pleas to have been put in for delay. If this is not so, why should they not be ready to argue them to-morrow. I call on them, if their object be not delay, to join in demurrer instant, and whatever rules of practice may exist on this point, I insist and claim it as my right, that they should not be adhered to strictly. It was well observed by Lord Plunket, that the rules of the Court are the servants of the Court, and where a plea in abatement is put in, as I assert, in order to create delay, and where I sustain that view by demurring as rapidly as I could. I say, that considering these circumstances, I trust your Lordships will, notwithstanding any rule of practice to the contrary, require them to join in demurrer forthwith, as I require them."

Now he would ask the Attorney General for England whether, with such an indictment hanging over the traversers, with so much at stake, with the country so much excited, would he exercise any prerogative he might possess, as the chief Law Officer of the Crown, against persons in the position which the traversers at that time occupied? The Attorney General for Ireland in his speech last night, insisted, as he had previously done in Dublin, that everything on the part of the traversers had been done for the purpose of causing delay. Now he (Mr. M. O'Connell) could not say whether or not the trials were attempted to be brought on at an early period in order that the Jury should be selected from the Jury List of 1843, but this much he could say, that if the trials were brought on at that early period, they must necessarily have been proceeded with before a Jury formed from the List of 1843, a List that was made out without any of that strict revision which had taken place before the Recorder. If the trials had been forced on, it was beyond a doubt that the Jury should necessarily be selected from that List. The right hon. the Attorney General had complained that the traversers only sought delay by their pleas, but he had not attempted to show to the House that the traversers made use of any means that were not permitted by the law, that they made any endeavour to produce a frivolous or vexatious delay. They had a perfect right to apply for the rule which the Court granted; they had a right to apply for a copy of the caption of the indictment; and no one had a right to say that they did so for the purpose of causing delay, and in order to frustrate the objects of the Crown. They acted properly in seeking for the chance of a better Jury than one selected from the Jury List of 1843, from which the Jury would have been selected if the trials had been forced on. He believed that a very different course would have been taken in England, where, he understood, every possible facility was afforded to the traverser for his defence, and where it was, he believed, the practice to give a copy of the caption and a list of the witnesses on the back of the indictment. The Attorney General for Ireland, in his speech last night, had alluded to the statement made by the hon. and learned Member for Worcester, in reference to the impossibility of setting aside, without cause, as many as they pleased of those persons who might be called on to serve on a common Jury. Now, what the hon. and learned Member for Worcester stated was, that the Crown might, it was true, have the right, but public opinion beat them down, and they could not do so with a common Jury. He had asked the Attorney General for England if he would have been inclined, under the circumstances, to exercise all his prerogatives, as they had been exercised in Ireland, against persons in the condition of the traversers; and he should now show to the House that the right hon. Attorney General for Ireland was capable of exercising his prerogative in a very extraordinary manner; and the instance which he was about to mention, was one that would, in his opinion, excite some surprise in the House. At an early period of the proceedings an application was made to correct an error in one of the names in the Bill before the Grand Jury; the name was that of one of the Clergymen, he believed the Rev. Mr. Tierney; Mr. M'Donogh, who is Queen's Counsel, and was counsel for Mr. Tierney, opposed the application to correct the error, and what reply did the Attorney General make? He did not attempt to meet the argument of Mr. M'Donogh, and to show that there existed a legal right to correct the error and amend the bill. No, but he proceeded in the manner of a gamekeeper, who meets a stranger in his master's preserves, and suspects him to be a poacher—instead of replying to the arguments of Mr. M'Donogh, he turns round like a gamekeeper, and asks for his licence. The Attorney General for Ireland demanded the licence of Mr. M'Donogh for acting as Counsel for the traversers, he being Queen's Counsel. The Attorney General had been so lately dealing with the Arms Bill, that perhaps, he forgot himself, and thus was led into asking for the licence of another counsel, as of a man suspected of poaching. It fortunately happened, however, that Mr. M'Donogh was able to show that he had procured a licence to act for the traversers. The Attorney General had alluded last night to the conduct of

Mr. Mahoney, the Solicitor for the traversers, in sending notes of different colours to persons who were qualified to be on the Jury List. Any person whose name was not on the Cess Collectors' book as qualified to be a Juror, had no right to have it put on the List, unless he, or some one on his part, served a notice to that effect within a certain number of days, and it required a similar notice in case a person who was not qualified wished his name to be struck off. These notices, to which the Attorney General alluded, were, therefore, necessary; but in remarking on the fact of Mr. Mahoney having caused them to be served, the Attorney General omitted to mention that when the lists were before the Recorder for revision there appeared, not only the Counsel and Solicitors for the traversers, whose duty it was to attend, but there were also counsel and agents to oppose the admission of names which the traversers' Counsel applied to have put on the List, and to support the claims of those which the Counsel for the traversers objected to. Those Counsel and Solicitors discharged the duty assigned to them with great ability and industry; and up to this time it was not known publicly in Ireland by whom they were sent to perform that duty. When the Attorney General, last night, denounced the conduct of Mr. Mahoney in serving notices on persons who were qualified to be placed on the List, he omitted to state to the House that similar notices, and perhaps on different coloured paper, had been served on other persons by Counsel and Agents in opposition to those of the traversers. By whom were those Counsel and Agents employed, he would ask? The Attorney General last night, cast an imputation upon a Gentleman, Mr. M'Grath, the clerk of the peace, against whose character he never before had heard the slightest charge. The Attorney-General imputed to Mr. M'Grath that he had been corruptly influenced by Mr. Mahoney, the Solicitor for the traversers, or that some religious feeling (he being a Roman Catholic) had induced him to deal more favourably with the traversers than with the Crown. Now, what were the facts as regarded the conduct of Mr. M'Grath? The Act directs that the parochial lists should remain three weeks in the office of the Clerk of the Peace, and both sides were entitled to a perusal of them. They had the means in Court of taking down these lists, and the Solicitor for the traversers applied for permission to compare the lists which were laid before Mr. M'Grath, with the books as revised by the Recorder, in order to ascertain if the copies were correct; and he was informed that Mr. M'Grath afforded the very same information to the Crown which he furnished to the traversers. They obtained leave to compare four of the parochial lists, and on applying for leave to compare the fifth, they were refused, on the ground that the papers were sent to the Recorder, to London. They were thus refused permission, it was stated, to examine any further, and up to this time no charge of corruption had been brought against Mr. M'Grath. The right hon. the Attorney General said that frequent applications were made on the part of the Crown, and that they had all been refused, but there had been no evidence offered of that, although Mr. Mahoney stated in full, in an affidavit before the Court, the manner in which he obtained a copy of the lists. Now, if this imputation of corrupt influence against Mr. M'Grath could be supported, would it not have been better to have stated that on affidavit before the Court? For at the time that Mr. Mahoney's affidavit was made, it would have been very important to have put in an affidavit, if they could, that advantages had been given to the traversers which were not extended to the Crown. If the Crown could maintain such a statement, they ought to have put it forward on the trial, but they did not. On the 29th of December, the lists which the Recorder had brought with him to London, arrived in Dublin, and on the 30th the Juror's Book was sent to the Sheriff. On the return of the Recorder an application was made to him, on the part of the traversers, for a copy of the list, but he said that the application ought to have been made to the Sheriff. The application was made to the Sheriff, and he refused to agree to the application without the consent of both parties, and that consent the Crown refused to give. So anxious were the officers of the Crown to get copies of the Lists, according to their own statement, that they applied almost every day at the office of the Clerk of the Peace for those copies, and were refused, and now, when they could get them by joining with the traversers in consenting to have them furnished, they refused to give that consent. Now, if the desire on the part of the Crown to get those Lists did not arise last night for the first time, why did not the Attorney General consent to have the copies furnished, when by doing so he could get a copy of the List? The Sheriff was allowed ten clear days from the 30th of December, when he got the Jurors' Book, to arrange the Special Jury List, but he only took till the 3rd of January. The Jury was struck under protest, and on the 13th the traversers' counsel applied to quash the panel, but the application was refused. The array was then challenged on the ground that there were twenty-seven Catholics and thirty Protestants whose names ought to have been on the Special Jury Panel, and who were omitted. Fraud was directly imputed by the traversers in the challenge to the array, and the Attorney General could have joined issue and have triers appointed in Court to ascertain if any fraud had been practised; he did not join issue, however, but he demurred to the challenge, and, legally speaking, admitted the fact, thus permitting the imputation to go uncontradicted, when they might have joined issue, and have had the matter tried in Court. The trial at length proceeded with the panel that had been objected to, and a verdict had been obtained. He would say nothing of the conduct of the Judges and Counsel on that occasion. Those matters had been already much discussed, and considerable light would yet, perhaps, be thrown on the subject. The Attorney General had succeeded in getting a verdict of a very questionable character, according to his impression. He admitted the right to appeal by a writ of error against that verdict, to the House of Lords, and assuredly that should be done. But of what value was the verdict to them now they had got it? Amongst the six millions of people who had been charged with being present at these monster meetings, was there one individual who had been deterred—was there one individual who would be deterred from seeking the Repeal of the Union by these legal proceedings? The National Association was still in existence—the Repeal Rent still flowed in. The amount collected for the last week was 500*l.*, for the week before that 600*l.*, for each week in the fortnight previous to that 500*l.*, and for the week before that period it was over 900*l.* He had promised the House not to detain it, and he would keep his promise. His only object had been to expose some of the fallacies in the ingenious, but not very candid, speech of the right hon. and learned Attorney General. He had only to add, before sitting down, that let the consequences of the verdict which the Crown had gained be what they might to the traversers—amongst whom, he supposed by accident, he had not been included,—the Government had not succeeded, nor would they succeed by means of that trial, in raising one single argument why the Repeal of the Union should not be sought for; nor had they delayed the period when that object would be gained one single moment; but they had established a disagreeable precedent in Ireland, which might before long be carried across the Channel to be applied to other cases in this country—a precedent which, by-the-by, had already so frightened some gentlemen who were desirous of raising an association in opposition to the Anti-Corn Law League, that before attempting it they had felt obliged to take the opinion of Counsel as to its legality. The Government had gained nothing for themselves in Ireland by the course they had pursued, but they had established a precedent which whilst it might sometimes be useful against their enemies, might likewise be applied against their friends.

Mr. Serjeant Murphy begged to explain. Having heard that in his absence from the House last evening the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland had made allusion to certain observations which had fallen from him with respect to requiring the constant attendance of the traversers in Court during the trial, he could only say, that no one could rejoice more sincerely than he did that he should have been mistaken in what he then stated. He had taken his information from the public papers; he believed it, and upon their authority he had spoken. He could only add, though the right hon. the Attorney General might have been grieved at the time, that he had good cause for congratulation that those accusations had been made, for they enabled him to prove himself a most able and accomplished debater in that House.

Mr. Gregory: It was not my intention at the commencement of this debate to have obtruded myself on the attention of the House, and I should even now be unwilling to do so, should I not by remaining silent lie under the imputation either of being lukewarm in my approbation of the course pursued by Her Majesty's Ministers, or indifferent to the feeling and opinions of that large and important constituency that has returned me to Parliament. I have no intention, at this protracted period of the debate, to enter into historical disquisitions—to endeavour to analyse the State policy of Ollam Fodla or King Dath with the Repeal Association—to discuss the merits of Oliver Cromwell's system of colonisation with the hon. Member for Edinburgh, or to speculate on the intentions of Mr. Pitt, with some of my hon. Friends behind me. My intention is to take things as I find them—to regard the present and not the past—the nineteenth and not the seventeenth century—to advert briefly and simply to some remarks that have been made during this discussion. I have been unable to follow the speech of the hon. Member for Tralee, who has just sat down, for two reasons; first of all, I am no lawyer, and secondly, if I were, I should have been equally at a loss to understand his arguments. Sir, the hon. Member for Edinburgh said very truly last night, Ireland is always combustible but not always on fire. Sir, I wish that observation which came so eloquently from the mouth of that hon. Gentleman had sunk a little deeper into his consideration. Had he reflected upon the truth of the sentiment he was pronouncing—on the importance of that sentiment—he would not have delivered that speech, which, with all its brilliancy and ability, I conceive more adapted to work upon that tendency to combustion which is so alarming, than any that has been delivered on the other side of the House, even by the very advocates of Repeal. What was it but a most elegant and spirited resuscitation of old and bitter wrongs of the extirpating policy of Oliver Cromwell—of the pains and penalties of William III.—of the treatment of the Roman Catholics for a long period of time—when the brave were forced to leave their shores, and proffer their services to foreign Kings, and the wise and learned to hire their abilities to foreign ministers—when their priests were treated as mountebanks, and themselves as Gibeonites—browsers of wood and drawers of water. Are these, Sir, topics fit for the present time? Is this the legitimate object of that historic research for which that right hon. Gentleman is so justly famous? All these things have passed away. If the memory still remains it may be attributed to speeches such as these—hatchments, if I may so term them, over the memory of departed grievances, with the word Resurgam ostentatiously inscribed in most conspicuous characters. But, Sir, the hon. Gentleman seems to be unwilling that any one should refer to history but himself. He quarrels with the noble Lord the Member for Lancashire (Lord Stanley), for referring to the petitions and statements of Roman Catholics many years ago, for showing that they flew at much less high game than they do at present. Why, Sir, what was the object of the noble Lord, but to show the impossibility of ever satisfying these demands—that as fast as one was granted, another was insisted on—to convince the House that were the Protestant Church swept away to-morrow, something new would be required, as little contemplated at present, as the right of Catholics to sit in that House was expected by the Petitioners for the free exercise of their religious worship. It is hardly fair for the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Macaulay) not to allow the noble Lord to inform the House what were the prayers, hopes, and wishes of the Catholics at that period—what were the expectations of those who listened to those prayers, and fulfilled those wishes, when he details to the House oppression and wrongs under which they who clung to that religion laboured. Sir, the proceedings at the late State Trials in Dublin, have been strongly commented on by the hon. Gentlemen opposite. So much has already been said on the jury case that I am unwilling to enter further into the subject. The explanation of the right hon. Baronet, the Secretary for the Home Department, was, I think, most explicit, and ought to have left no doubt upon that subject. Indeed, I cannot understand how so able and experienced a tactician as the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) could have been found hardy enough to rest any portion of his case upon that ground—when he must have been aware that it was in the power of the Government to meet his allegations with the greatest certainty of success. The hon. Baronet, the Member for Devonport (Sir G. Grey) did not fall into this error; he at once confessed that the Government could not have acted otherwise, that they must have struck these jurors off the panel—that they were, under existing circumstances, justified in doing so. The right hon. Baronet said clearly that this was not the field on which the battle was to be fought—that no position could be taken up on a foundation so insecure. He therefore dismissed the subject, firing off his gun as he retreats, at the right hon. Secretary, for endeavouring to illustrate the case by a jury of fox-hunters or lay impropiators. This is a mere pettifogging view of the case, says the right hon. Gentleman, to compare a great and important State Prosecution to some miserable trial of fox-hunting squires on a case of trespass, or lay impropiators on a case of tithes—I acknowledge the justness of your remarks, but I criticise the aptness of your illustration. What would the right hon. Gentleman have said if the Protestants of the North of Ireland, instead of acting with that temperance and moderation which I trust will always characterise their actions, had determined to take the law into their own hands—had met in enormous masses, had held monster meetings, and proceeded to demonstrations, which the law advisers of the Crown consider hostile to the law, and subversive of the Constitution. The ringleaders are brought to trial—a Special Jury is struck—the Crown Solicitor leaves on the Panel men notoriously connected with this movement, who had signed requisitions for these meetings—who had contributed their money to the promotion of that conspiracy—who were in short universally considered to be heart and head, body and soul, identified with, and sympathising with, the operations of these very men thus brought to trial? I know well with what a song of triumph, with what an Io Pæan such a course of conduct would have been greeted. The noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) would have come to the House with his Jurors' List in his hand—he would have cited their names, description, and disposition. See here, he would have said, look at the constitution of that Jury—men born in Down, begotten in a hot-bed of Orangeism, nursed in Monaghan imbibing prejudice from the breast—educated in Fermanagh—black-mouthed and bigotted no doubt, and the noble Lord would have indignantly cast these valuable statistics on the Table of the House of Commons, and protested, in the name of common justice, against this solemn mockery of her courts, against this truckling and self-abasement on the part of Ministers to Protestants and Orangemen. And yet would not this be a parallel case to the one under your consideration—of a Panel of forty-eight men, of which ten were struck off by the Crown Solicitor, according to Act of Parliament—struck off, because on his oath he believed them to be not unbiassed or indifferent? Now, I appeal to any man, not utterly jaundiced by party spirit, whether the Law Officers of the Crown could have done otherwise? Would they not have been fools to have supposed they could have conducted their prosecution with success, had these men been left upon the Jury? Would they not have been worse than fools if, foreseeing the result that must inevitably have followed, they had allowed themselves to be deterred from the execution of their duty by a momentary and inconsiderate clamour? Why, Sir, a clamour was raised up from the very earliest stage of these proceedings—a clamour even more inconsiderate than this: not a town in Ireland, not a dead wall in Dublin but was covered with placards breathing vengeance on the informers—the perjurer, Bond Hughes! An action for perjury was to be instantly commenced—not a moment to be lost—the pillory stood in the back-ground—and what was the result? Mr. Hughes, as my right hon. Friend, the Attorney General, stated last night, was openly complimented in Court by Mr. O'Connell for the impartiality and fairness of his testimony. These compliments were repeated by Mr. Steele, another of the traversers, and the very person from whom all these charges originated, the day Mr. Hughes left Ireland for England. And now, Sir, we come to another and graver charge—not once, but perpetually insinuated, that the suppression of one sheet of the Jurors' List was not the result of accident, but connived at and instigated by those whose object it was to obtain a successful termination of those trials. By successful, I mean in accordance with the wishes of the Government. The hon. Member who has just sat down has reiterated this charge, and has quoted the words of Judge Perrin—"That he was not prepared to say that the omission was the result of accident." My hon. and learned Friend, the Recorder for Dublin, has acquitted Mr. M'Grath of all culpability in these proceedings; I am bound, therefore, to coincide with his opinion. But this I will say, that great partiality was evinced by Mr. M'Grath in the facility he afforded to the agents of Mr. Mahony, one of the solicitors for the traversers, in every inquiry and reference they were desirous of making—and in the difficulties and impediments he opposed to every effort made by the other party to obtain access to these same documents. It is the opinion in Dublin—it was the opinion, and will remain the opinion in the minds of a large proportion of the inhabitants of that city, “that this omission was not the result of accident,” but of design—a design, I will aver, that would never have entered the thoughts of the Law Advisers of the Government. Sir, I fear I have entered into the subject of the State Trials rather more fully than I was warranted in doing: I shall endeavour to make amends by compressing the few remarks I have yet to make into as short a space as possible. With regard to the Franchise—the next evil complained of—I have only to say, that I do not think hon. Gentlemen have attributed to the real causes the restriction they find such fault with. I attribute the real restriction of the Franchise, not to the reluctance of landlords to grant leases, but to the constant expectation that has been entertained for the last few years that a change in the nature of the Franchise was to take place; which opinion has deterred many from registering till these contemplated alterations should have passed into law. But far more do I attribute the restriction of the Franchise to the extreme unwillingness of the peasantry themselves to be registered, knowing full well the difficulties that the exercise of their rights will entail upon them. Naturally inclined to rally round his landlord, proud of his success, and grieving in his failure, perhaps occasionally influenced by other and less elevated motives, the Irish peasant finds himself brought, in the exercise of his Franchise, into collision with a tremendous power, whose menaces he fears, and at whose denunciations the bravest of them tremble—the Roman Catholic priesthood is this power. In this unhappy state of things, when he must either offend the landlord, at whose hands he has received kindness, or on whose will all his future is dependant, or must endure to be branded as a betrayer of his country, and an apostate from his faith—can you imagine but that it is with considerable reluctance, except when the politics of the priest and landlord are identical, that the Irish peasant allows himself to exercise so dangerous a privilege? The noble Lord the Member for London (Lord John Russell) complains too of the great restriction of the Franchise in Ireland as compared with that of England, and stated on the authority of Mr. O’Connell, that the county of Yorkshire had more registered electors than all the counties of Ireland. Is the noble Lord however prepared to lay down the broad principle that population alone is to be the basis of the Franchise? I thought it was his opinion that a line should be struck between property and population, by which the Franchise should be regulated. Is not the same complaint applicable to the English constituencies, and is the noble Lord prepared to make it? Why does he not bravely assail the state of the English constituencies at once? Is it not a hardship in his eyes that Thetford, with its 160 electors, should balance Birmingham with its 5,000; or that Tamworth, with its 300, should have equal weight as Manchester with its 12,000? If an argument of this description is pleasing to hon. Gentlemen, why not at once for the sake of uniformity, adopt the Chartist scheme, and divide the electors of England into constituencies of 20,000, returning in all 300 delegates to Parliament? I shall now dismiss this subject, merely reminding the right hon. Secretary for the Home Department of the warning given to him by the noble Lord the Member for Sunderland. “You may enlarge the Irish constituencies if you please. I approve of the plan—it will be placing additional arms in the hands of us who are the friends of Ireland.” I trust the hon. Baronet will recollect in these, his alterations, that he is not legislating for England but for Ireland. In England he may extend the elective Franchise in the counties if he will; property there, I rejoice to say, possesses still its legitimate influence. In Ireland, however, the case is different. The more extensive the augmentation of these constituencies, the greater powers are you lodging, not in the friends of Ireland, but in the hands of those who are the determined enemies of British connexion, and of the re-establishment of tranquillity in that country. Now, Sir, I have but little to say with regard to the Established Church, the so-called monster grievance of Ireland. We have received assurances of a very different nature, which convinces me that that Establishment is not yet destined to be overthrown. We have received on this side of the House the assurances of the right hon. Baronet and the noble Lord, the two Secretaries of State, declaring their unalterable determination not to abandon that institution. That declaration on their part was loudly cheered by their supporters on this side of the House, and will, I am satisfied, be responded to by the country. But, Sir, the strongest assurance of all comes not from us, but from the Opposition Benches. The noble Lord the Member for Sunderland (Lord Howick), on entering upon this subject, stated that he was aware of the difficulties he had to encounter in bringing it forward. That he was aware what he had to say would be unpalatable to some of his Friends sitting by him, and would not be in accordance with the general opinion of the country. His speech, nevertheless, had one advantage, it was clear, candid, and explicit—a proclamation of no quarter to the Established Church. It differed much from that of the noble Lord, the Member for London, who, after entering widely into the insult and injury (that is the proper phraseology I hear of the Established Church), concluded by saying he was not prepared to do anything, or to make any statement as to what should be done—but strongly urged on the Government the important measure of at once relieving the Roman Catholic Hierarchy from the galling affront of not having their titles recognised by the State. In fact the noble Lord on this subject was prepared to say little and do less, and in this course of conduct he was ably seconded by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Devonport (Sir G. Grey). But, Sir, supposing hon. Members on this side of the House were to retire from the contest, and allow the Opposition to settle it among themselves, I do not even then foresee the exact result. The greater number would then, no doubt, be inclined to vote with the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Ward), and make the perfect equality he recommends, by despoiling the Church, and converting its revenues to other purposes; but the greater influence would, I conceive, be joined with the noble Lord the Member for London (Lord J. Russell), who would not acquiesce in the proceeding. He and others would, I dare say, produce the equality desired by paying the Roman Catholic priesthood, and thus raising them to the level of the Establishment. But the Roman Catholic Clergy have no desire—they refuse to be paid, and your difficulties remain as great as ever. In short, I cannot conceive a question less likely to be settled than this identical one, even if it were left to your own tender mercies and exclusive legislation. Sir, I shall not, as I said before, enter into the question of the right of the Established Church in Ireland to its property and position. A separate discussion is to be taken on this subject by the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Ward). But, Sir, as I am upon this subject, I must complain of the line taken by hon. Members opposite—of the language they have held—of the endeavours they have made to impress on the minds of the Roman Catholic population of Ireland, that an inveterate hostility against themselves and their religion is entertained by the present Government of the country, and by those who support this Government. What possible motive could the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) have had in raking up the speech of the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Bradshaw), delivered years ago, in the most exciting times, and in all the heat of an election; and in endeavouring to affix the responsibility of that speech on Her Majesty's Government? Was this fair or was it generous? Was it a sign of the strength or weakness of his cause to descend to matters of this kind so long forgotten? If the noble Lord loves to call to remembrance by-gone speeches, why not in that instance; as he has quoted one, why not refer to the speech of the Colleague of that hon. Gentleman (Mr. Smythe)—not made years ago—not delivered in the heat and ardour of election, but calmly and deliberately in this House, not many months since, and which breathed nothing but the kindest sentiments and deepest sympathy with his Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen of Ireland? What right has the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Ward) to come down here and read from an anonymous pamphlet a series of paltry trash, in shape of letters, supposed to be written to Roman Catholic priests on different occasions, by Protestant landlords—referred to, I regret to say, by the hon. Member for Edinburgh—and when the hon. Gentleman is asked for the authenticity of these precious concoctions, "Oh," says he, "I have no doubt they are quite as true as many of the statements I hear coming from that side of the House." Why did the noble Lord the Member for Sunderland, persist in attributing the words "false" and "idoltrous" to my right hon. Friend the Recorder of Dublin, with reference to the Roman Catholic religion? My right hon. Friend totally disclaims the use of such expressions, and I listened to every word of his speech, and can attest the truth of that disclaimer. The hon. Member for Wycombe (Captain Bernal) complained greatly of an address to Lord de Grey from the Dublin Operative Society, which was graciously received. He says, the word idolatry was applied to the Roman Catholic religion in that Address. I can scarcely believe, that the hon. Gentleman is correct ; but I am unable to find the Address alluded to. [Captain Bernal: It is true.] But even if it be so, to show the House and the country that such sentiments are deprecated and disavowed by Her Majesty's Government, I have only to state, that an Address to Her Majesty, from the same body in Dublin, was committed to my charge, which contained some allusions to the effect the Roman Catholic religion produced on Ireland. This Address I forwarded, as was my duty, to the Home Secretary ; it was returned to me by him, with a communication to the effect that he could not reconcile it with his duty to present an Address to Her Majesty containing sentiments disrespectful to the religion of a large proportion of Her Majesty's subjects. I am sure the hon. Baronet can recal this circumstance. I make no comment on the truth or falsehood of the Address. I relate simply what occurred. Sir, the present Government is said to maintain its power in Ireland by an army of occupation. Sir I am no advocate for a Government of the sword. If this Government and state of things has been imposed on Ireland, let the accusation fall on those who are the causes. What does the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Sharman Crawford) say about this—the assertor of popular rights—the wrong-headed, but the honest and intrepid champion of popular grievances ? How does he stigmatize that system of agitation, which has forced that Government of the sword upon us ? He calls it “a system abounding in the most offensive and exaggerated imputations, bombastic threatenings, violent declarations, and extending demands, ending in disgraceful compromises.” When such proceedings as these are sanctioned by a nation, I ask, are not grounds laid for the imputation that such a nation is not in a condition to acquire or to maintain the rights of freemen. When you act in this way, you encourage England to treat you as slaves ; and I address you in the language of Grattan—“if England is a tyrant, it is you who made her so ; it is the slave that makes the tyrant, and then murmurs at the tyrant whom he himself has constituted.” Sir, I trust this mode of Government will be no longer needed ; I trust that measures will be introduced for Ireland's benefit—liberal and generous measures. Let not a country such as Ireland, an anomaly among civilised states, be treated by the niggardly and exact rules of political economy. She wants assistance for the creation of commerce, the revival of trade, the employment of her poor. Let not that application be met by a quotation from Adam Smith, or a reference to M'Culloch. The idea of Repeal—the light in which that great question is regarded by the Irish people—is not as you suppose. It is no absolute love of a Parliament in College-green. No vague speculation on the part of a band of visionary enthusiasts in behalf of a federal connexion—it is not a single and individual abstraction ; but it is the great focus to which determine all the complaints, murmurs, and grievances of Ireland. It is the murmurs of the Irish Priesthood against the existence of a Church which they deem alien and heretical, and which they are banded together to overthrow ; but which we deem true, and, under God's blessings, are determined to maintain. It is the murmurs of the restless and turbulent, whose existence is faction, and whose occupation, in time of tranquillity, is gone. To this you should give no heed. It is the murmur of the ruined tradesman, ruined by that agitation whose handmaidens, depression of trade and insecurity, he purblind and infatuated fool mistook for confidence and revival. But, Sir, it is also the complaint of poor men against a law, in vindicating which your troops are employed. It is their complaint, as their last shilling is taken from them, 3d. of which is devoted to the support of paupers not one whit worse off than themselves, while the remaining 9d. is applied to the maintenance of that prim Elizabethan establishment, which surveys the adjacent squalor and misery, like self-satisfied virtue contemplating vice. It is the cry of the unfortunate father, who sees his children in the last extremity of fever, dying in a ditch, as I have seen only a few months since. It is his cry, Sir, as he protests against that system of medical relief which our squabbles render so inefficient. It is the indignant appeal to justice and to Heaven of that poor wretch who, because he can minister no longer to the political ambition of his master, or the extortion of the middleman, is driven out roofless and homeless on the wide world, to swell the lists of those to whom any change must be a God-send. But Her Majesty's Ministers have devoted their attention to these subjects—they are anxious, I am convinced, to do everything that can be done to remedy some of those evils. I trust the greatest of all, the Poor-law will not escape their consideration. I will not allow to hon. Members opposite, free traders as you are, the monopoly of good wishes towards Ireland—the time is gone by for this delusion. The keys to the true Government of Ireland is “firmness” and “impartiality.” The one maintains confidence, the other will command respect. But it is you who, now that agitation is put down on one side of the Channel, are reviving it on the other.—are creating fresh irritation—are ripping up old sores—while you bellow lustily for amity and conciliation—and is this what you have the effrontery to call the responsibility of Opposition? Why, even in some petty parish, if men fall out, and a feeling of animosity is engendered prejudicial to that small community, how would you endeavour to reconcile—would it be by dinning into the ears of one that the other had traduced the reputation of his mother, or reflected on the memory of his father, and that nothing but insults are to be expected—and yet is not this the way that you have throughout this debate stirred up Ireland against England, and dignified this unworthy conduct by the sonorous title of the responsibility of Opposition? When the time comes, as you evidently expect it will come, when this responsibility of Opposition shall be exchanged for the responsibility of Office, you will have reason to regret the course that party spirit has induced you to pursue—you will have raised hopes and expectations in these your bidnings for place, which your pledges will prompt you to fulfil, but which your conscience will tell you to resist, which the Priest and the Agitator in Ireland will demand, but which the Protestant and Dissenter of England, will indignantly reject.

Mr. Bellw said, the recent Trials were not only unsatisfactory to the Catholic population of Ireland, but to a very large portion of the hon. Gentlemen opposite. The state of the Franchise in Ireland was also unsatisfactory to the people. With regard to the Administration of Justice, he did Her Majesty's Government the credit of conducting it as well as their predecessors. He looked upon the Stipendiary Magistrates as one of the greatest blessings which Ireland enjoyed, and preferred them greatly to unpaid Magistrates. He did not care whether they were appointed by Whigs or by Tories, because they were under the immediate supervision of the Executive, and he must say that the Executive had discharged this duty most properly. With respect to the Church question, the noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies had, he thought, very unnecessarily referred to the Catholic oath. As a Catholic Member he hoped he should be believed when he said he should be as far as any man in that House from intentionally doing anything incompatible with the oath he had taken; but he really thought some indulgence ought on this subject to be extended to the Catholics by Protestant Members, when they recollected the oath they themselves took at that Table. 630 Members of that House took an oath at the Table not only that the religion of the Catholics in that House, but that of two-thirds of Christendom, was damnable and idolatrous. [“That is altered.”] He was very happy to find such was the case. Still he thought, under the circumstances, there should be great indulgence shown to Catholic Members with reference to this subject. The Catholics did not say there should be no Protestant Church in Ireland, they only objected to the Establishment as it at present existed there. The Church was pre-eminently the question on which the whole Government of Ireland for good or evil must turn, and till that was satisfactorily arranged it was impossible that peace or contentment could prevail. He did not mean to discuss the several propositions which had been made on either side of the House; but it was most encouraging to observe that even Gentlemen opposite on the Ministerial Benches were ready to admit that some alterations must take place in the position of the Catholic Church, while the various suggestions which had been offered indicated an improved tone and temper, from which good results might be expected. He thought the State should protect and patronize the three great denominations in Ireland equally, and he believed that a large number of the most respectable Presbyterians and Dissenters in Ireland were prepared to see that question fairly arranged. He was also inclined to think that the proposal with respect to glebes and land for chapels might be most advantageously adopted. With respect to the Landlord and Tenant Commission, he could by no means agree in the attack which had been made on the noble Earl at its head. That noble Lord possessed extensive estates in Ireland; he had done much to improve them, and he had always conducted himself in the most benevolent and kind manner to his tenantry. He believed the Commission had been issued by the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government in good faith, and in the idea that in some degree it might tend to improve the relation between Landlord and Tenant in Ireland. Of this he was quite certain—that by those who, residing in that country, were conversant with the wretched condition of the relations between Landlord and Tenant, and the fearful moral evils consequent thereupon, any attempt to improve the present state of things, whether efficient or not, must be hailed with gratitude. It was the fashion to throw all the blame upon the landlords. No doubt there was in Ireland a large class of landlords who did not, he was sorry to say, discharge their duties in the manner they ought; but with respect to many he might say, this was more their misfortune than their fault. It was not only the tenantry that were poor and embarrassed—the landlord was too often poor and embarrassed himself, and could not spend so much money in improvements as would be desirable. There were others who had both means and will, and especially in Ulster and Leinster great improvements had been made, not because the population was Protestant or Catholic, but because there was a large resident gentry, who spent money on their estates and gave good leases to their tenants. He was glad to find that both the Church question and the Landlord and Tenant question were now attracting so much public attention, and from this circumstance he augured the most important and happy results.

Mr. Liddell had no intention of taking any part in this debate, nor would he at all have trespassed on the House, but for some expressions which had fallen from his hon. Friend the Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. A. S. O'Brien), reflecting upon a noble Friend and relative of his, for whom he entertained privately the greatest esteem. It was not to be expected that he should compromise his political opinions by any defence of the public character and conduct of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Normanby) to whom he alluded. The expressions to which he alluded referred fully as much to the private demeanour of the noble Marquess as to his public conduct; and if he was wrong in the interpretation he put on them, he was sure his hon. Friend who used the expressions would be the first to thank him for the opportunity of explaining them. He was almost sorry to remind his hon. Friend of the words he had used. His hon. Friend talked of “the theatrical and ostentatious display of the noble Marquess.” If by those words his hon. Friend referred merely to Lord Normanby’s progress through the country, and when a sort of gaol delivery took place without the intervention of Judge or Jury, he was ready to admit there was some indiscretion in such conduct; it wore an unseemly appearance, and might be resorted to as a precedent by individuals standing in the same highly responsible situation, and anxious to create a species of spurious popularity. In that point of view, undoubtedly, such a proceeding was not exempt from criticism. But if his hon. Friend alluded to his noble Friend’s general conduct in exercising the functions of his high office, he begged to say, that he had heard from all quarters, and not only from Gentlemen of his own political opinions, that the duties of that high office were never exercised with more becoming dignity, with more courteous affability, with more consideration and generosity towards all parties who attended his levees, and towards the Irish people generally. He might say it was dignity without ostentation, affability without affectation. He knew that the private charities of the noble Marquess and his lady were only limited by the opportunities afforded for his exhibition. He might say this feeling of kindness and charity belonged to the nature both of the noble Marquess and his Lady. In the far distant West, many an unfortunate individual of the negro population, whom he found in slavery and left in freedom, could attest the kindness and charity of his noble Friend during his residence in Jamaica, and the same sympathy and attachment had been exemplified in Ireland. With regard to the Church question, the appointments made by the noble Marquess in Ireland during his Vice-Royalty, were most carefully considered, and were all marked by great discrimination and propriety. He had never heard the slightest censure pronounced on the conduct of his noble Friend on this subject by Members on either side of the House. He was aware that expressions were often allowed to escape the lips of Members in the heat of debate which those using them were the first to regret. Upon this occasion, he was unwilling to leave the defence of his noble Friend entirely to hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House, and he gladly embraced this opportunity of paying a trifling, but a very sincere tribute, to one whom he regarded with much esteem and affection. He also remembered that noble sentiment :—

“—— Absentem qui rodit amicum, “ Qui non defendit, alio culpante,

Although he could have wished to offer some remarks on the speeches of the hon. Member for Worcester, and the noble Lord the Member for Sunderland, yet he would not protract the debate by so doing. He could not, however refrain from expressing his satisfaction at the speech of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. Though he differed from the hon. Gentleman both in politics and religion, he felt that the sentiments which he had expressed did him honour, and showed that there were among the Roman Catholics of Ireland men who were disposed to deal with public questions in that spirit of sincerity and candour which was so much honoured in this country. Upon the whole, he thought the Government had reason to congratulate themselves upon the progress of the debate. From the convincing speech of the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary, at the commencement, to the speech of the Irish Attorney General last night, the defence of the Government had been in all respects full and complete. He congratulated them that they had been as triumphant in argument as they would be in the division; and he trusted [that they would persevere in the same course of moderation, justice, and clemency, and long continue to preserve what they had now attained to—the support of their Friends, and the respect of their enemies.

Mr. A. S. O'Brien, in explanation, disclaimed all intention of using disrespectful language respecting the noble Lord alluded to by the last speaker. In using the word “theatrical” his only intention was to characterize the noble Marquess as having done that noisily and ostentatiously which might have been done quietly and plainly. He certainly thought the noble Marquess in releasing the prisoners had done it in a theatrical way, and for the purpose of producing effect. At the same time, he had no intention of saying anything personally disrespectful of that noble Lord.

Mr. Hume must say, with regard to the noble Marquess alluded to, that whatever his manner might have been, his conduct had been highly to his honour. It was most gratifying to the friends of the noble Marquess that he should have conducted the Irish Government so much to the satisfaction of the Irish people. He wished he could say as much for those who had preceded and followed the noble Marquess in that Government. With regard to the present motion, he thought that too much of the debate had turned upon the late trial, which he himself believed to be of little comparative importance. Whatever attempts might be made to justify the proceedings on that trial, he believed that the people of Ireland and of England would pay but little attention to the decision come to at that trial. With respect to the error in the Jury List, he felt quite sure that the right hon. Recorder had had no control over it. But why were not the proceedings quashed as soon as the error was discovered? It was no answer to say, that such a proceeding would have an injurious effect on others. Why should one man be sacrificed in order to prevent injury to others? The traversers had not had a fair trial—the proceedings were unjust to them: and that was the opinion with respect to them entertained by the people of Ireland. The hon. Gentleman opposite called on the Irish to bury all past grievances in oblivion; but what was to become of existing grievances? Ireland ought really to become what she was now only in name—a portion of the Empire. She ought to be deriving from the Union those advantages which a poor country always derived from an Union with a rich one; which Scotland had derived from the Union with England, and which many foreign countries had derived in a similar way. That Ireland should enjoy these benefits was the desire of those who passed the Act of Union, and the avowed object by which that measure was recommended. In the Speech from the Throne at the commencement of the Session of 1800, His Majesty expressed his conviction that an Union of Ireland with England, founded upon an equality of rights and a reciprocity of advantages, would be for the benefit of both countries; and Mr. Pitt soon after said, that such must be the foundation of a Measure for effecting the Union. Thus Ireland was promised a full participation in all the benefits which she ought to enjoy from an Union with England. Had this promise been fulfilled? No. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin had told them that, even if the Irish Church were destroyed, there would still be some other grievances. Of course there would, and there would continue to be grievances until all were removed—until Ireland, in the words of the passage he had quoted, should become really incorporated with England, and be a participant in all the advantages enjoyed by this country. With regard to the Church, how was it possible for the people of Ireland to be satisfied with the Church as it was? Scotland had her own Church, England had her own Church; how could Ireland be expected to be satisfied with a Protestant Church, while the vast majority of the inhabitants of that country were Roman Catholics? An hon. Gentleman opposite had attempted to deny the truth of the statement of the comparative numbers made on that (the Opposition) side of the House; but, according to the census of 1833, there were (out of a total population of 7,943,000) of Roman Catholics 6,427,000, of Protestant Episcopalians 752,000, of Presbyterians 642,000, and of other Protestant Dissenters 121,000. The sum paid to the Protestant Church was 806,000*l.* per annum, and to the Presbyterians 35,000*l.*, but the whole sum paid to the Roman Catholics was 8,928*l.* for the maintenance of Maynooth, and even that was grudged them by some Gentlemen opposite, who were only restrained from moving that the annual grant should be rescinded because the Premier was really ashamed of such a proposition and forbade the attempt. Was it likely that the Irish people could feel otherwise than aggrieved at the existence of a Church under circumstances of such injustice? He had never been a party man as regarded Irish questions. His only partizanship on those subjects had been on behalf of the whole people of Ireland. In 1833, when the Whigs proposed their Coercion Bill, although he had generally voted with them, he denounced the Measure, and predicted that it would be the cause of their downfall. He called on the people of England to fulfil the bond signed with the people of Ireland at the time of the Union, and thus act an honourable part by their fellow-countrymen. The real Agitators were the Orangemen and those who denied justice to Ireland; and the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government, who sympathized with them and supported them, was the Arch-agitator. He was by no means opposed to agitation, whichever party might be in power. No Government would consent to changes till they were made uneasy by the pressure from without. He had himself been in one sense a great Agitator during his political life—for he had denounced all abuses in public institutions, wherever they were to be found. He had, however, consistently and firmly opposed the use of physical force. The first thing that should be done for Ireland was the removal of the Lord Lieutenant (as the Commissioners of Scotland had been displaced), and governing the Sister Island by a Secretary of State. Repealers, of course, would be against the proposition; but he who was for preserving the Union, would wish to see Ireland relieved from the evils that ever attended delegated Government. The same men would act differently in Dublin and in London. There was, happily, a high spirit of honour among public men in England, which preserved them from petty intrigues or jobbing, which had been too much displayed in Ireland. The Repeal Agitation was not novel; it had been carried on since 1833. As to its causes, he considered the Irish Church the chief of them, and did not care for former pledges in its behalf if its preservation prevented peace in Ireland. [Sir R. Peel entered the House.] Here comes the principal cause of Irish Agitation, for he perpetuated institutions which excited it, and was therefore responsible for it. He had entertained great confidence in the sincerity of the right hon. Gentleman's intentions, but he had been sadly disappointed. All his fond hopes had been blighted. There had been promises of reductions, but they had not been fulfilled; perhaps they would be seen in the Estimates. Well, they would find it out by and by he supposed. He could not too strongly impress upon the Government, that any state of things which kept up excitement in the public mind produced a sense of insecurity inconsistent with prosperity. There had been praise claimed by the Government for resorting to trial by jury, but would the right hon. Baronet admit that troops had been at the same time brought into Ireland? If they did justice to Ireland they might withdraw the troops from that country to-morrow. He wished the noble Lord who had introduced the present Motion, had made it a direct censure against the Government. Nevertheless, he looked upon the Motion as a censure of the Government, and should vote for it as such. He had been almost tempted, in order to remove all doubts, to move, by way of amendment, a direct censure on the conduct of the Government. [Sir R. Peel.—It is not too late.] He was too old a bird to be taken in that way. He, indeed, wished that they were more unanimous with respect to Ireland. The hon. Member concluded by stating, that he should give his vote in favour of the Motion.

Mr. George Hamilton stated he had some hesitation in obtruding himself upon the House at so late a period of so protracted a debate. But there were some matters which had been adverted to by most hon. Members opposite, who had spoken in the debate, respecting which he felt it to be his duty to make a few observations. The first of these topics was the Landlord and Tenant Commission, of which he was a Member. He fully agreed with those hon. Members who intimated an opinion that it was desirable that the Commissioners should make a report with as little delay as possible; and he could assure the House there was no want of diligence on the part of the Commissioners, and no want of disposition to discharge their duty within as short a time as it was possible for them to do so.—But the House should consider the peculiar nature of the inquiry, and the difficulties attending it. When he informed the House that it appears from the Census of 1841 that nearly one-half the farms in Ireland are under five acres in extent—that five out of six farms are under fifteen acres—that the Census Commissioners state that in the rural districts one-half the population live in the lowest state—possessed of accommodation equivalent to a cabin of a single room, and that sixty-eight per cent., heads of families in Ireland, are without capital in money, land, or knowledge, being labourers or farmers under five acres, the House would understand the extreme difficulty as well as importance of an inquiry involving remedial suggestions for such a state of things. It involved in fact that most difficult of all problems, the social condition of Ireland.—Whatever suggestions the Commissioners might be able to offer as regarded direct legislation, it was quite obvious that the greatest advantage which could be expected to arise from their labours, would be the operation upon public opinion of the report they might make, and the evidence they might receive. In order to that, it was equally obvious that evidence must be received very fully, and the report most carefully and deliberately considered. Whatever might be the result, he would assure the House the Commissioners were determined to do their duty by probing the matter to the very bottom, according to the instructions they had received, and to make known to Her Majesty fully and fairly the real state of things as regards the occupation of land in Ireland. Some hon. Member had intimated that the Commission was too much of a Landlord Commission. He could assure him, however, that the Commissioners were anxious to receive as largely as possible evidence from the class of Tenants. They had already examined several of that class, and with the view of rendering the examination as convenient as possible to that class, it was their intention to visit different localities, for the purpose of receiving evidence on the spot, and seeing and judging for themselves on the evidence they should receive. Other hon. Gentlemen, and among them his hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon county, had adverted to the excitement which the Commission had caused, and to the probability that public expectation would be disappointed. If excitement had been caused, he could only say it had not been through the Commissioners. They, on the contrary, had taken every means of making known what the objects of Commission were, and they took every opportunity of apprising parties that they were not invested with any authority to settle differences between individuals, or power to make any adjudication as to the rights or claims of individuals. Adverting next to the general question before the House—namely, the Irish policy of Her Majesty's Government, as an independent Member, and as the representative of many of those in Ireland who, last year, were of opinion that too great a degree of forbearance, or inertness, had been exhibited as regards the Repeal Agitation, he felt bound to state that the speeches of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Home Department, and the other Members of Government, had afforded him in that respect very great satisfaction. The right hon. Baronet had explained, and in his opinion most conclusively, the reasons on account of which that apparent supineness had existed. His right hon. Friend the Attorney-General for Ireland had last night explained—and in a manner which he felt confident must have been convincing to the mind of every Member of the House—the several matters in reference to the late trials which appeared to require explanation; and he had no hesitation in stating that, in his opinion, the course which Government had pursued with regard to the Repeal Agitation, was marked by great moderation, great wisdom, and great firmness. The noble Lord opposite, in his speech on opening the debate, had stated that Government in these countries is now in a great degree, a Government of opinion. This was a very obvious truth, but he (Mr. Hamilton) could assure the House it was a mistake to suppose that that should rightly be considered public opinion in Ireland which was represented or indicated by the Repeal agitators, or by the Repeal meetings, however multitudinous they may have been. He was far from undervaluing the opinion of the lower classes; neither, under existing circumstances, did he mean to say anything harsh of the agitators themselves; but when the noble Lord spoke of Government being a Government of opinion, and being influenced by opinion in Ireland, he felt bound to say that the public opinion upon which Government rests in these countries, in the sober, sound, and reasonable judgment of the community at large, exercised upon an intelligible and definite subject, and after sufficient and correct information. But who could say that this was the case with regard to these multitudinous meetings in Ireland? These meetings were convened—in some cases exclusively, in almost all—principally by the Roman Catholic Clergy in each locality—at their instance the people attended, naturally attended, in large masses. There was little to prevent them from doing so; unlike the labouring classes in England, their time was of little value to them, and they are fond, naturally fond, of meeting together and hearing popular eloquence. At these meetings, and by the circulation of such newspapers as The Nation, they learned to indulge in glowing but delusive visions of wealth, prosperity, and comfort, and were taught to expect them from Repeal. Considering the condition of the great mass of the people of Ireland—their ardent and imaginative temperament, and the means that had been used to excite them—it was no wonder they had been intoxicated with those deceptive representations, and raised up to a degree of frenzied excitement which endangered the peace of the country; but this was not public opinion in Ireland. Theirs, under such circumstances, was not that sober, sound, and justly-formed public opinion in Ireland, upon which any Government could rest, or by which any Government ought to be influenced. To say nothing of the Protestants of Ireland, whose opinion certainly, considering their intelligence and property, was entitled to some consideration, but who were quite kept out of view by hon. Gentlemen opposite, as if no such body of people existed—he was prepared to say, that of the Roman Catholics those entitled to most consideration were either unwilling Repealers, or were opposed altogether to Repeal Agitation. He had stated last year that, admitting the great danger in which Ireland had been placed, and the excitement which prevailed, it was his opinion that it was a forced excitement, an unnatural excitement, rather than a deep-rooted discontent, arising out of the pressure of political grievances. He had watched, narrowly watched the progress of events since then, and he had seen nothing to alter his opinion. Certainly he was not one of those who entertained those gloomy apprehensions with regard to Ireland which some hon. Members had expressed. He was not one of those who would entertain any very great apprehensions even in the event of a foreign war. He could not, and would not, believe that his countrymen were really disloyal. It was one thing to agitate, even in the most objectionable manner, for measures, regarding which differences of opinion might exist, and in reference to which allowances are to be made for enthusiastic feelings—for pre-conceived notions which may operate to blind the judgment even of the leaders of that agitation; but it is another thing to take up arms in support of a foreign foe. He did not believe, that in such an event the leaders of the agitation would adopt such a course. Even if they did, he did not believe the mass of the people would follow them; but even if that should be the case, and he would not allow himself to contemplate it, he felt sure there would be enough of loyalty and spirit remaining among Her Majesty's Roman Catholic and Protestant subjects in Ireland, to hold that country for Her Majesty either against foreign or domestic foes. In reference to the recent agitation, it had been, in his opinion, manifestly the duty of the Government to repress it; but he rejoiced that the common law of the land and the existing principles of the Constitution had been resorted to, rather than any extraordinary powers sought for. He sincerely hoped Government would act steadily on the policy of repressing agitation. If they did so, and at the same time took means to improve the condition of the people, it was his firm conviction that the representations they had heard made by hon. Members opposite, would turn out perfectly unfounded, that the excitement would soon subside, and Ireland soon cease to afford a political battle-ground for the noble Lord and his party. He would not have been inclined to have troubled the House with any further remarks on the present occasion, if it had not been for the reference which had been made by almost every speaker on the opposite side of the House to the Established Church in Ireland, and to a provision for the Roman Catholic Clergy. The plan of a separate State provision for the Roman Catholic Clergy appears to be abandoned for the present by hon. Gentlemen opposite, but they seem agreed in opinion that the property of the Established Church should be confiscated, with a view to what they call the establishment of a perfect equality in religion. The noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies, in his speech, for which, on the part of the Protestants of Ireland, he thanked him, had expressed in the strongest manner the determination of Her Majesty's Government to resist any such confiscation, and he had pointed out also the reasons which operated against any State endowment of the Roman Catholic religion. But in his opinion, there were other grounds upon which both the overthrow of the Established Church, and the endowment of the Roman Catholic Church, ought to be resisted, and which he felt it to be his duty to state to the House. He was well aware of the opinions entertained by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and expressed so repeatedly in the course of the debate, with regard to Church Establishments. But, notwithstanding those opinions, he was not afraid to avow, and he thought it the highest and best grounds upon which the Church of England in Ireland, or any Church, could be maintained in its connection with any State—that, in his opinion, it is the paramount duty of a Christian State, for the sake of truth in religion, to recognise and acknowledge one definite system of religion, as the depository and teacher of religious truth. He never for one moment could admit what those hon.

Members maintained, that religion is to be regarded as a matter merely between man and his Creator—that there is no responsibility, in respect of religion, beyond the responsibility which attaches to us as individuals—that there is no obligation upon us, in our collective capacity, as Members of a State, to uphold honestly, and sustain fearlessly what we conscientiously believe to be truth—that religion is a thing that is to be left to take care of itself, and that the State, as such, has no cognizance of religious truth. On the contrary, it has always been held by the ablest Constitutional writers, by the soundest Constitutional lawyers, and by the greatest Statesmen that England had ever seen, that by a fundamental law of the British Constitution, religion is made a part of the State—that the great end of all Government is to promote man's highest interest—that man's highest interest is essentially involved in his religious condition, and that, therefore, the State must necessarily be cognizant of religious truth, and responsible for sustaining and promoting it. He thought it was impossible not to feel that this must be so. It was impossible not to feel that if other interests—subordinate interests—the interests of Commerce, the interests of Manufactures, the interests of Agriculture, the varied and complicated interests in a great Empire—are admittedly within the cognizance of the State, and the subject matter of State policy, notwithstanding differences of opinion which exist as to the degree of truth or error which may be involved in the principles upon which those interests rest; and if the State, notwithstanding such differences, does not hesitate to pronounce with authority, and to maintain steadily, and act upon fearlessly, what it believes to be true, in reference to those subordinate interests—it cannot be that, when religion comes to be dealt with, involving, as it does, truth of the most exalted character, and interests—the only interests of real and permanent importance—it can cease to be the duty of the State to declare boldly, and sustain steadily, and promote anxiously, what it acknowledges to be truth in reference to those paramount interests. The Roman Catholics in these countries acted themselves on this principle—it is manifest that they feel that as a body they are responsible for the maintenance of what they consider truth in religion, and that in their opinion, religion is not a matter to be left to take care of itself. Devoted to their own religion as sincerely as he was to his, they saw, as he did, the inconsistency and danger of a connection between their religion and a Protestant State, and in his (Mr. Hamilton's) humble judgment, they acted rightly and consistently in abjuring such a connection. It was unnecessary for him to state, and he should, therefore, refrain from doing so, for what reasons the Protestant religion has rightly been selected as the religion of the State. It was sufficient for his argument that it has been so selected; but, being so selected, he thought it followed necessarily, that the State is responsible for offering to the whole of the population the great truths which that system of religion contains. He could not admit that there was any hardship or grievance in this, or insult to those who differ from the Established Religion. States, as well as individuals, may differ, and will differ with regard to what truth in religion is; but States, as well as individuals, appeared to him in that respect to act under the most solemn of all responsibilities. States, like individuals, were bound to make a selection, and he thought a total indifference on the subject of religion, whether in States or individuals, was a greater insult to religion than a conscientious selection of what some persons might consider erroneous. He believed there was no people on the face of the earth who entertained stronger feelings with regard to the importance of religion than the Roman Catholic population of Ireland. He thought they were in that respect an example to the lower classes in England; and he would go further, and say, that there was no people who appreciate and estimate more fairly, sincerity and piety in those who differ from them in religious belief, and, however indisposed they may be to receive the ministrations of any clergy but their own, he (Mr. Hamilton) did not believe, now that the pressure of tithes was removed from them, that they felt it any hardship or grievance, that the form of religion which the State acknowledged, should be upheld and supported as such. If the principles which he thus laid down were sound, the question of an Established Church could not be argued merely on grounds of numbers or proportions of the population. Truth is not less the truth, because in some parts of a great Empire such as this, it is held by few, and the duty of taking reasonable means for promulgating it, is not diminished, but rather increased by the prevalence of what we believe to be error.

He was quite ready to admit that this principle, like all great principles, is to be confined in its application within reasonable limits. A State might be bound to maintain an existing Church by treaty or compact, though differing from the Established Church, as was the case with the Church of Scotland, and some of the Colonies; and he thought further, that it would be an abuse of the principle if it was to be adduced in support of a system of excessive wealth, or of sinecures or pluralities in a Church. This, however, he would be prepared to show on a proper occasion was not the case in the Established Church in Ireland. Lord Althorp in 1833 had stated that greater exaggeration existed with regard to the wealth of the Established Church in Ireland, than upon any other political topic which had ever come under his observation; that noble Lord confessed that, until he looked into the subject himself, he had exaggerated, even to himself, the amount of the Revenues of the Irish Church Establishment. He regretted that the Return, moved for last Session, by his right hon. Friend and Colleague, had not as yet been made. When that Return should be made, it would be found—and he was persuaded he should be able to convince even the most sceptical—that the average income of the Parochial Clergy in Ireland does not exceed 170*l.* a year; that the average income of the Beneficed Clergy does not exceed 216*l.* a year; and that when the Church Temporalities Act shall be fully in operation, there will be in the whole of Ireland only forty-four Benefices above 1000*l.* a year, twenty-nine of which will be in the province of Armagh; that more than one-half the Benefices in Ireland will be under 300*l.* a year, and 1,156 out of 1,400 under 600*l.* a year. The noble Lord had spoken of a plan for making a congregational rather than a parochial division for the Church in Ireland, with a view to the reduction of its revenues, and ultimately the endowment of the Roman Catholic Church. He believed he was correct in the noble Lord's meaning—but let the House just consider how it was possible for that plan to be made available for the purposes of the noble Lord. By the Report of the Commissioners of Public Instruction, and it was considerably under the truth, the members of the Established Church in Ireland were 852,000, besides 660,000 Dissenters, many of whom attended the Established Churches: the number of Beneficed Clergy was about

1,400. Supposing, then, the whole population of members of the Established Church divided amongst the Beneficed Clergy, there would be a congregation of more than 600 to each; but the average income of the Beneficed Clergy was little more than 200*l.* a year. Now he would put it to the noble Lord himself whether, considering the manner in which the Protestant population was scattered in Ireland, or indeed under any circumstances, 200*l.* a year could be considered more than a sufficient provision for an educated gentleman; and if that were so, what would become of the fund out of which to make provision for another and hostile Church? He had to apologise for having trespassed so much upon the indulgence of the House. He did feel that in the subject to which he referred there were higher considerations than those of temporary expediency involved, and higher principles than those of civil government, and higher interests than the transient ones of party or of country. He felt that States, like individuals, were but instruments in the accomplishment of the great ends of Providence—that they, like individuals, had a talent committed to them, for the use or abuse of which they would be held deeply responsible. Looking upon England, a little island, raised up by Providence to so wonderful a degree of power and importance regarding her as the head of a great Empire—greater in point of influence—higher in point of character—more extended in commerce—bolder in her achievements, and heretofore more successful than any of the great Empires which pass across our vision in the retrospect of man's eventful history—he had always felt that she had been raised up by Providence for some purpose more important than the transient interests of mankind, however important those transient interests might be. He had always regarded England as the depository of right principles—as raised into power for the purpose of maintaining and extending those principles, for the permanent benefit of mankind, and for the promotion of man's highest interests. He could not believe that England, having sustained those principles in the protracted struggle for her existence in which she had been engaged at the close of the last and the beginning of the present century, and which conflict she had engaged in principally from her devotion to those very principles, would now abandon them. If she should, he (Mr. Hamilton) would only say, it was his firm conviction that her course would thenceforth be a downward one, and that in future ages England, too, would be reckoned amongst the other nations of the world, which, in the day of their power and greatness, had forgotten the purposes for which that power and greatness were entrusted, and being left to follow their own imaginations, had sunk back to that state of weakness and insignificance from which they had been originally taken.

Mr. Caleb Powell bore testimony to the decent, decorous, and orderly conduct of the masses who attended the Repeal meetings. More orderly assemblages he never witnessed. He could hardly hope that such meetings would be as peaceable in future. How could any one hope it after what had occurred? The trials had been productive of the greatest indignation and of the most utter disgust throughout the length and breadth of the land. The people were disgusted, not only with the manner in which they were instigated, but with the way in which they were conducted. First of all let him, as a Protestant, remark in what a position the Attorney General had placed the Protestant population of Ireland. They were unpopular enough before,—how much would not their unpopularity be increased, now that the right hon. Gentleman had selected Members of that class to be his instruments in inflicting a punishment upon the most popular man in Ireland? Then there was the Jury List business. The Recorder of Dublin had attempted to escape from all the censure connected with that matter; but how was it, let him ask the right hon. Gentleman, that he, an exceedingly well paid officer, and, though not an old man, a very aged placeholder, should have permitted the administration of justice to be impeded for so long a time by the inadequate machinery of the office over which he presided? How was it, that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had abandoned his post on such an important occasion, coming to England for his private recreation, and leaving his duty to be performed by an incompetent underling? Then, as to the Chief Justice—what should he say, or rather, what should he not say, of his summing up? His words the House had heard—he wished they could have seen his gesticulations. It might be said of him as it was said of Lady Teazle, that he could do more to injure his own reputation by a look, than others could do by the most elaborate slanders. Altogether, the Court presented just such a spectacle as Byron had described:—

“ —Judges in formidable ermine,
With brows that did not very much invite The accused to think their Lordships would determine

His cause by leaning much from might to right.

An Attorney General, awful to the sight,
As hinting more, unless our judgments warp us,

Corpus.”

With regard to the effect of such a prosecution, so commenced and so conducted, it was his belief—indeed, the belief of every reasonable person—that, instead of putting down O’Connell and the Agitation for Repeal, its effect would be to make the vast political influence of the Liberator hereditary in his family, and his cause a sacred one with the people, who held his name so greatly in veneration.

Sir H. Douglas said, if he had seen any representative of an Irish constituency rise to address the House, he would not have risen, nor indeed he (Sir H. Douglas) would not presume to offer himself to the attention of the House on the present occasion, but for the purpose of explaining what he had stated with reference to this subject on a former occasion. In the part which he took in the debate on the Motion of the hon. Member for Limerick, in July last, he had stated, that Ireland had made a steady progress in every branch of her industry since the period of the Union down to the present time. He had founded that statement on figures and documents which he had compiled with great care, from public documents. These statements had been questioned by—amongst others—the hon. Members for Kilkenny and Waterford, who, seeing the importance which such statements carried with them, had impugned their accuracy; but he (Sir H. Douglas) was fully prepared to attest and vindicate the accuracy of those compilations, and which, if necessary, he was ready to read to the House. It appeared from those documents that, since the Union, Ireland had steadily increased in population—her manufactures of linen and flax had increased—her tonnage inwards and outwards had increased—and her exports of bread-stuffs, and of cattle, had increased enormously; all her provident and charitable institutions, loan funds, &c. &c. testify improvement. Education is making great progress; and, with the additional stimulus, resulting from increased pecuniary provision, will proceed in a corresponding and much higher ratio. Notwithstanding what is said by the hon. Member for Waterford, that the taxation of Ireland is one-fifth that of England, and what the hon. Member for Kilkenny says, that it is as three to four; the fact is, that the taxation of Ireland is not one-tenth of that of England and Wales, and about four-fifths of that of Scotland. Thus, Ireland, with a population of about 8,200,000 is taxed to the amount of 4,000,000*l.*, whilst England and Wales with a population of 16,000,000 are taxed to the amount of 42,485,000*l.*; and Scotland with a population of 4,600,000 is taxed to the amount of 5,000,000*l.* At the time of the Union, the Irish debt was 23,000,000*l.*, he spoke in round numbers; that of Great Britain was 451,000,000*l.* The Irish debt has only increased from 23,000,000*l.* to 34,000,000*l.*, whilst the debt charged to Great Britain has increased from 451,000,000*l.* to 740,000,000*l.* The charge for interest is, for Ireland, 1,183,845*l.*; and for Great Britain, 27,357,330*l.* It was settled, at the Union, that, for the space of twenty years, the contributions of Great Britain and Ireland, respectively, towards the expenditure of the United Kingdom should be in the proportion of fifteen-seventeenths, and two-seventeenths; and that after that period, the expenditure, other than the charges for interest of debt to which either is liable, should be in such proportion as to the united Parliament may seem fit. According to this, the budget of 1801 was, for the expenditure of the United Kingdom 42,197,000*l.*, of which 4,324,000*l.* was for Ireland. It thus appeared that, in all these respects, Ireland has been treated with the greatest liberality, and that all the financial stipulations and engagements made at the time of the Union, have been most faithfully carried out. With respect to the remission of taxation, it is asserted by Gentlemen opposite, that Ireland has not been fairly treated, and that whilst there was an immense remission of taxation in favour of England, there was a very small remission with respect to Ireland. The repeal of taxation in Great Britain and Ireland, respectively, from 1814 to 1842 inclusive, was computed upon the average produce of each tax, during the five years next preceding its partial or total Repeal. Now, take the year 1816, for instance; the amount of taxes repealed for Great Britain was 17,033,169*l.*, and for Ireland 163,155*l.* But of this 17,000,000*l.* for Great Britain, no less than 14,942,000*l.* was the Repeal of the Income Tax. How much of that burthen did Ireland bear? How much of such a burthen does it bear now? Why, at this moment Ireland is exempt from two taxes, namely, the Income Tax and the assessed taxes, which together amount to about 10,000,000*l.*, or very nearly, one-fourth of the taxation of the United Kingdom. He defied any hon. Member opposite to impugn the correctness of these statements, or the accuracy of the conclusions drawn from them, that Ireland had been treated, in all these respects, with the greatest generosity and liberality. Seeing, at the time that the Motion of the hon. Member for Limerick was brought forward in the last Session of Parliament, that agitation and excitement were proceeding to an extent tending to disturb the public tranquillity, to endanger the lives and property of Her Majesty's subjects, and to set all Government at defiance, he recorded his opinion with his vote, that it appeared to be necessary to put a stop, at once, to proceedings and movements which could no longer be tolerated, with due regard to the public safety, the integrity of the State, and the honour of the Crown; and he, for one, declined to go into the consideration of any Irish grievances, real or unreal, until that agitation should cease, or be put down. He expressed this with kindly feelings towards Ireland and Irishmen, and that there was nothing he would not do for Ireland, but that of being supposed to be goaded by fear, instead of being guided by favour. He had been inclined to think the Government had delayed too long in putting an end to that agitation, but he now believed that they acted right. They had calculated their own means, and when the time came at which they thought fit to act, he congratulated them that they did so effectually, firmly, and at the same time mercifully. He had heard such assertions made use of with respect to the Proclamation for putting down the meeting at Clontarf, as "a fiendish and murderous proceeding." Now, he thought, that whatever may have been the cause of the delay in the appearance of the Proclamation, it was in effect most merciful, because irresistible; every combination was defeated; it was too late to make any other arrangements. With some knowledge of such tactics, he did not hesitate to express his conviction, that if the Proclamation had appeared at an earlier period, other appointments would have been made, other arrangements formed, other positions taken, and that well-timed act, was merciful, because it precluded and defeated all combinations. Now, with respect to the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for London; that noble Lord, after admitting that outrages had existed in Ireland for upwards of a century; that a few pages of parchment cannot eradicate the pressing evils under which Ireland is now suffering; and that for his part, he knows of no direct remedy for these, proceeds to say, it has been objected that neither political franchise nor political power, would put bread into the mouths of the hungry, nor give employment to the unemployed. He agreed with the noble Lord, that the great and pressing evil of Ireland was to be found in the physical and social condition of the people of that country, and he thought that the effect of political agitation was only to inflame them still more. A people must first be reclaimed from that wretched and very backward physical and social condition, in which a great portion of the people of Ireland unfortunately are, before they can either participate in political rights, or discharge properly the arduous duties they impose. The noble Lord then went on to observe, that the participation of political rights and political privileges, are the very first and best means by which you can impart prosperity to a nation. To this he would reply, that not only the history of this country, but the rise and progress of society all over the world proves, that political rights cannot be brought to any degree of practical perfection in any state of society, until the human condition shall have been elevated and cultivated by industry, education, and social order. These are the parents, rather than the offspring of political improvement. The great ameliorating principles are industry, rural industry, improvement in the social condition, domestic habits and economy of every description, leading and extending to manufacturing, trading, and commercial industry. Political privileges and constitutional freedom invigorate and promote the moral and political improvement of a people, when these foundations are properly laid; but if the order be reversed, political agitation and the speculative assertion of political privileges and grievances, far from curing, embitter, rankle, and inflame those evils which wretched social and physical conditions engender. He agreed with the noble Lord the Member for Leitrim, that a constant and watchful anxiety is required on the part of the Government, to improve the condition, and employ the industry of the people; that it is only from these, that real relief can be afforded, and that he regards works for the internal improvement of the country as a step in the right direction. He (Sir H. Douglas) agreed also with that noble Lord—that what Ireland most requires is, an extension and improvement of the middle classes. These comprehend merchants, manufacturers, mechanics, traders, professional men, and capitalists. Well! how are these to be formed? Political theories will not create them. Why by industry, the mechanic arts, education, manufactures and commerce. Thus were those middle classes formed and raised and extended, in England, by our Elizabeth, who has been justly denominated, not only the Queen of the seas, but the founder of the manufactures and commerce of this country. In this way was raised that great portion of the body politic, which forms the main constituent foundation by which we are sent to this House. The hon. Member for Belfast denies that the evils of Ireland are attributable to poverty; but that on the contrary, it is the state of the Franchise, the contraction of the constituency, insufficient representation, and above all, the domination of a corrupt State Church, that are the real woes and grievances of Ireland; and that nothing but removing all these, can be of any use to Ireland. The hon. Member in support of this assertion quoted a very well known and clever periodical, The Spectator, an ably conducted journal. He (Sir H. Douglas) read that paper very differently. That Journal asserts, that, though Ireland be rich in natural resources, and may be justly called the flower of the earth, and the gem of the sea, yet those resources require to be called forth by industry,—the flowers cultivated—the habits of the masses raised—the gem polished—before anything effectual can be done, to improve the general condition of Ireland; that were gold spread over the whole surface of Ireland, were the most extended political privileges granted, these would do nothing for Ireland until the physical, social, and moral condition of the people shall have been raised. To do this, a fusion of interests, and not a dissolution of the Union of the two countries is required. He (Sir Howard Douglas) asserted, that this fusion was, and is proceeding, if agitation would only cease its disturbing and destructive operations. The noble Lord the Member for Sunderland, works up his speech to a fearful issue. Well might the noble Lord feel, that he was about to say that which would obtain little sympathy in that House, and still less in the country. The noble Lord says, that the question now at issue, admits not of compromise; that we, on the one hand, stand upon our Acts of Parliament, and maintain our exclusive rights backed by the prejudices of the people of England; while he is persuaded the people of Ireland will yield nothing—that the time for compromise is gone by, and that nothing but the destruction of the Protestant Church in Ireland would now do; that the Irish people ought not to yield, and he (Sir Howard Douglas) feared, that the whole tone and tenour of the noble Lord's speech would be considered, out of doors, the parent of a wish that they the Irish Catholics should not yield; and the noble Lord adds that the struggle will be a permanent one, and may lead to a catastrophe that can only be quenched in blood! Why Sir! what should we stand upon but our Acts of Parliament? And he hoped that the people of England, and the Protestants of Ireland, would not fail to observe the terms in which the noble Lord denominates their principles, prejudices. But Sir, if this indeed be so, that we are at the issue, the fearful issue, to which the noble Lord has brought us, then is it time for the friends of the Constitution, in Church and State, to prepare to stand by the Protestant Monarchy of this Realm. But no; there will be no such struggle;—the struggle out of doors, is over, thanks to the wisdom and firmness of Her Majesty's Government for having stopped those audacious proceedings, and for having brought the leaders to condign punishment. The only struggle now going on, is here, in this House; not for the good of Ireland, but for restoration to power of a party that never did anything for Ireland, and were incapable of doing anything for Ireland, inasmuch as they did not dare, they had not strength, to grapple with, and put down the great monster evil of Ireland, agitation. He would not go back like some hon. Members to periods so remote as the discovery of Ireland, or the introduction of Christianity into Ireland, or what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh calls the annexation of Ireland to England, which, in other words, means a grant made of Ireland to England, by Pope Adrian

III., and its consequent subjugation by England. Whatever may have been the conflicts and exasperations of races, in the course of those contests, the two races would have been fused together, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh has truly remarked, had it not been for the Reformation. Well! is the Reformation to be regretted? Are we to lament that Protestantism, which spread over the whole of the north of Europe, should have been accepted by Great Britain, and that we should thus have effected our religious and civil liberties, which always go hand in hand; or are we to regret that a small portion of the Irish people should have rejected the blessings and benefits which a vast majority of the people of the British Isles secured to themselves and their descendants to all posterity? He was prepared to do everything for Ireland, consistent with the safety of the Protestant Church; but when he saw the safety of that Church threatened, there he took his stand; and he trusted, that there also the Protestant people of this country would take their stand, in defence of the Protestant Church and Monarchy. There was no doubt that all the Roman Catholics of the world were looking with anxiety at the pretensions and movements of the Roman Catholics of Ireland; but the Protestants of this Empire know and feel that the eyes of the whole Protestant world were fixed upon them; for to this country they look, as the great bulwark of Protestantism in the Christian world; and he trusted they would firmly stand by their principles, and that their motto would ever be, "No surrender." With respect to the future measures to be pursued towards Ireland, he thought they ought to be measures calculated to promote the agricultural, industrial, and social condition of the people. He did not object to the Registration Bill, nor to extend the Franchise; but will hon. Members opposite be satisfied with extending the foundation, by enlarging the constituency, without increasing the number of Irish representatives in this House? If this be done, an addition must be made to British representatives, in like proportion, to preserve the present equilibrium, as settled by the Reform Bill; but this, without giving more relative power to Irish representation, would only make this House still more unwieldy. The Irish nation has far more power over Imperial legislation, by having a strong and powerful party in this House, than with any number or description of Members in a Local Parliament, as if the Legislative Union were repealed, subject, of course, as the enactment of laws must be, to the Royal Veto, on the advice of the Ministry of the day. Seeing the difficulties in which the late Government was placed, by having against them, a majority of British representation, and that they could not stand without propitiating the aid of Irish representation and Irish agitators, and, in the end, were driven from power, in spite of their support, he always hoped never to see the Conservative party restored to power, until they should have a majority of British representation, so strong, as to defy Irish agitation, and to grapple, at once, with that greatest of all evils. For, when British representation was nearly balanced in this House, the leader of Irish Agitation, speaking of him with all respect, and with due regard to his present position,—that formidable person stood, as it were, upon the beam of the balance, and by a mere shift of his weighty person, and a switch of his tail, could cant the beam as he chose. And thus he did, most unmercifully, override, and effectually control, the late Government. He trusted now that agitation had been put down, the Government would do all in their power for the improvement of Ireland, and he highly approved of the Landlord and Tenant Commission, as calculated to effect much good, by improving the agricultural and social condition of the people of that country. As an old soldier he might perhaps be allowed to say a few words on the meaning of the words "military occupation." Military occupation, he believed, meant the state of a country in which the laws and constitution were for the time suspended, and superseded by military power, and courts-martial assembled to try, condemn, and execute. But was this the state of Ireland? There was, indeed, a large military force there; but a force in perfect discipline, and by which not a single breach of the peace had been committed—a force sent over at the request of the Civil Power, not to suspend, but to secure the supremacy of the laws. And this force was under the command of his gallant Friend, the Lieutenant General, stationed in that country, than whom a more humane man did not breathe. True there was also a large police force, but not so large as in the time of the late Government, by which that force was established. Complaints had been made that this force was too large to be placed under one individual. But was there any individual to whom more safely, than to Colonel M'Gregor, that power and command, could be entrusted? In testimony of that Gentleman's merit, they need but look to his admirable conduct, when the Kent was destroyed by fire in the middle of the ocean. The noble Lord, the Member for Leitrim, had made use of a mode of expression which is said to be peculiar to that noble Lord's country—the noble Lord talked about defending or fortifying indefensible barracks. Defensible barracks was a principle; it formed a regular part of the military system of the Duke of Wellington, as he himself could testify from the instructions sent out to him some years ago when he was commanding a foreign station. But coming to another question brought forward in the present debate; a great deal had been said about the danger that would accrue to the country, from the state of Ireland, in the event of war breaking out with a foreign country. The hon. and learned Member for Liskeard told them likewise to look at Canada. He would only say to the hon. and learned Member, "wait." The distinguished person at the head of the Government in Canada, by an act of firmness and determination of which he (Sir H. Douglas) warmly approved, and on which he congratulated the country, had emancipated himself from the trammels of what had been very generally described a rebel faction. They would now see how far the redoubtable and vaunted principle of responsible Government would go. But he (Sir H. Douglas) would tell some hon. Members opposite, that such a degree of responsibility as that which they appeared to advocate, was inconsistent with the allegiance and obedience of Canada to the Crown of this Realm. Another hon. Member had made, last night, some menacing allusions to the possibility of what might happen in case of war with France. Another hon. Member said let them take care that a forcible dismemberment of the Empire do not take place like that by which the United States were separated from England. He (Sir H. Douglas) might say that that was a case of successful treason;—

"Treason never prospers, what's the reason,
When it prospers, none dare call it treason."

But in the name of the soldiers and the gentry of Ireland, he protested against the supposition that, under any circumstances whatever, they would join in rebellion. He had heard with admiration the sentiment of an hon. Gentleman who said, "whatever may be our difference at home, if an enemy dare invade us, it would be the most certain means of uniting us as one man." Indeed he could oppose historical proof against any aspersion that foreign invasion would be seconded or supported in Ireland. He was old enough to remember the cases of Bantry Bay and Killala. A French force of ten ships of the line and seven frigates, after suffering something from stress of weather, arrived in that Bay, with 20,000 troops on board, in expectation of assistance and cooperation from the people. But the very French Officers who first went on shore to reconnoitre, and prepare for landing the troops, were made prisoners by the peasantry, and the fleet returned to France without striking a blow. At Killala a force landed, invited by certain rebel agents. But they were not supported by the people; they were joined by only a few hundred unarmed peasantry—they were met by a force consisting chiefly of Irish militia, and taken prisoners, execrating those who had deluded them to come over, by representations of the great support they would receive. He had listened with unbounded admiration to one Speech, in particular, delivered on the other side—he did not mean the speech of the right hon. Member for Edinburgh, who though he made a learned, literary excursion over seven centuries, had yet delivered a very unstatesmanlike address—not the ill-timed speech of the noble Lord the Member for London—nor that most mischievous of all speeches, the speech delivered by the noble Lord, the Member for Sunderland.—It was a passage from the speech of the hon. Member for Roscommon. He hoped the House would permit him, in conclusion, to read the minute he had made of the concluding part of that most beautiful speech, and he trusted he should hear from the hon. Gentleman that he had not incorrectly taken down what the hon. Member had so well expressed. The hon. Gentleman said, he wished the Members of the three Kingdoms, in discussing this question, to look on each other as fellow subjects of the same Queen, as fellow citizens, and as brothers in charity, and in every civil right, and as rivals only in the noble and generous emulation of endeavouring to promote the common good of the three parts of the United Empire. Most cordially did he participate in all these sentiments and aspirations; and the Motion of the noble Lord, whatever might be its tendencies in other respects, had at least produced the great redeeming effect, of affording opportunities of embodying, and vehicles for circulating, such sentiments as these from both sides of the House; sentiments which could not fail to be received with the greatest satisfaction, by the people of Ireland, and to promote the real interests of that important part of the Empire.

Mr. Sheil; I did not rise last night at the conclusion of the speech of the Attorney General for Ireland, for two reasons. The first was, that that speech did not terminate until nearly twelve, and I despaired of engaging the attention of the House at so late an hour; in the next place, I was anxious that the right hon. and learned Gentleman should afford me an opportunity of looking at the report of the case in which I was engaged fifteen years ago to which he has thought it judicious to advert. I wished to look at that report for the purpose of vindicating myself from what I regard as a very serious charge. I applied to the right hon. Gentleman for the report, and he had the goodness at once to give it me. This House must have been under the impression that I packed a jury, and that it was exclusively Roman Catholic. The House must have thought, that I exercised the prerogative vested in me by the Crown, with the sanction of the Law Officers, for the purpose of placing in the jury-box twelve men, my own co-religionists, and the co-religionists of the person for whose death the prosecution was instituted. The right hon. Gentleman said that he was present on that occasion; I think he will admit the truth of my assertion, that of my conduct in the course of that prosecution the Attorney and Counsel for the prisoner did not complain, and the regular Counsel for the Crown did not intimate that any fault was to be found with my conduct. In order to obtain a mixed jury, I was under the necessity, as the prisoner challenged every Catholic, to set aside Protestants, until I could obtain the religious combination which I desired to effect. It may be said, that I gave the Catholics a majority of one on the Jury; but when you recollect that unanimity was required for a conviction, you will at once perceive that a preponderance of one was of no consequence. If the Irish Attorney General had followed my example in the State Prosecutions, and out of a Common Panel had allowed five Catholics to remain on the Jury, we should have not impeached his verdict. The Attorney General has brought against me a very serious charge—he said that where a man was on his trial for his life, I acted a most censurable part. His book refutes him. I find in it a report of my speech, and in order to prove that I did not hunt down the defendant with a bloodhound sagacity, I hope I shall be forgiven if I read one or two passages, which will show the House the spirit in which the prosecution was conducted. I hope the House will listen to this self-vindication, if not with interest at least with indulgence; and I must say, that I never saw an occasion on which that feeling of the House of Commons was more strongly manifested than it had been last night, in listening to a speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman distinguished for ability, and let me add, for moral courage. The following is the commencement of the speech made by me in the case to which the Attorney General refers:—

“I am counsel in a case which the Gentlemen to whom the Attorney General habitually confides the enforcement of the law have permitted me, at the instance of the persons interested in the prosecution, to conduct. I trust that I shall not abuse the licence which has been afforded me. I feel that I am invested with a triple trust. The first is that which I owe my client, for whom I do not ask for vengeance, but for that retribution for which the instincts of nature make in the bosom of a parent their strong and almost sacred call. My client is the mother of the boy for whose death the prisoner at the bar stands arraigned. I owe the next duty to Mr. Pearse himself. If I am asked in what particular I am bound to him, I answer that I cannot avoid entertaining for him that sentiment of commiseration which every well-minded man will extend to one who may be really innocent of a crime, the imputation of which is itself a misfortune; and I do assure you (he will permit me I hope, to extend the assurance to himself), that it is with melancholy that I raise my eyes, and see him occupying the place where guilt and misery are accustomed to stand. To him I owe it as an obligation that I should not abuse the advantage of delivering a statement to which his counsel cannot reply. The scriptural injunction inscribed above that seat of justice, admonishes me that I ought not to make any appeal to your passions against a man whose mouth is closed, and to whose counsel the right of speaking, by an equally cruel and fantastic anomaly, is refused by the law ‘Operi os meum muto’—is written there in golden characters, not only to suggest to your Lordship the duty of judicial interposition on behalf of the silent, but also to warn the advocate not to avail himself in any merciless spirit of his forensic prerogative against the man whom the law has stricken dumb. I shall make it superfluous on the part of his counsel, to produce evidence in favour of his character—he is a man of worth and honour and until the fatal event for which he stands indicted, has borne a reputation for peculiar kindness of heart.”

After stating the facts I concluded thus:—

“At the outset of my statement I expressed myself in praise of the defendant and as I advance to a conclusion I pause for an instant to reiterate my panegyric. He has been I repeat it up to the time of this incident, a humane and well-conducted man. Let him have the full benefit of this commendation. If it shall appear that under circumstances which constituted a necessity, and in obedience to the instinct of self-preservation he exclaimed ‘fire’ then I am the very first to call on you to acquit him”

This is not the language of a man actuated by the fierce zeal of a relentless prosecutor; I think it far less vehement than the charges of Judges which we occasionally hear in Ireland. At the conclusion of the evidence, I told the Judge that I thought that no case for charging the defendant with murder had been made out. I do think that the Attorney General, in reverting to a trial which took place fifteen years ago has not acted with ingenuousness, and I am convinced that in the opinion of the House I have freed myself from the imputation that I did not exercise the prerogative of the Crown with the intent attributed to me; and if the right hon. Gentleman had followed the example which I gave him on that occasion—if in the constitution of the Jury in Dublin, he had taken care that there should be five Roman Catholics and seven Protestants upon it—nay, if he had allowed even two, or one Roman Catholic upon that Jury, I think he would have taken not only a more merciful but a more judicious course than that which he did adopt. The Jury that sat in Dublin on the late trial was composed of twelve Protestants, and the House has not yet been apprised of some circumstances connected with their selection. Eight of those Jurors voted against Mr. O’Connell at the several elections at which that hon. Gentleman was candidate for the city of Dublin. I do not mean to say that they had not a most perfect right to do so, or that because they had voted against him they ought of necessity to have been set aside by the Crown, or that they were unfit to exercise the duties of Jurors in his case; but we have first the fact of every Roman Catholic on the Jury List being set aside, and then we have a Jury of persons admittedly hostile to him selected. There was a controversy the other night respecting Mr. Thompson. A doubt was entertained as to the fact whether he had seconded a resolution at a corporation meeting. I believe the fact is now beyond all doubt. The resolution was to this effect: “That this meeting will support and maintain, by every means in its power, the Legislative Union between Great Britain and Ireland.” There was another gentleman of more marked politics—Mr. Faulkner. It will be found in Saunders’s News of the 14th of February, 1840, that at a meeting of Protestants, convened by the Lord Mayor in pursuance of a resolution of the Common Council, and held in the King’s Room at the Mansion House, a Mr. Jones is reported to have said—“I call on the meeting by every consideration to stand by their principles, and, above all, to maintain the Protestant Ascendancy in Church and State,” and then followed loud and long-continued cheering, with shouts of “No surrender,” and “One cheer more.” Mr. Faulkner, who was one of the Jury, proposed the third resolution, and that resolution was this—“That this meeting views with deep alarm the Bill introduced into Parliament which proposes to interfere with the municipal corporations in Ireland, and which transfers the rights of Protestants to the Roman Catholic party in Ireland.” And on another occasion, in a speech of his, reported in Saunders’s News of the 13th of April, and also in the Evening Mail, Mr. Faulkner called on the meeting to uphold the Protestant Ascendancy in Church and State, and gave the charter toast. Some friend asked what was the charter toast? and Mr. Faulkner said, “I mean the glorious and immortal memory of the great and good King William.” That Gentleman ought to have been struck off. I think the House, when it considers the facts of the case, when it looks to the variety of the circumstances connected with the case, will consider these facts to be material in determining whether the Jury were legitimately selected? Mr. O’Connell might have begun his speech to the Jury with the words of the unfortunate Lewis, "I look for judges, but I behold none but accusers here." I turn to the circumstances connected with the prosecution, the Attorney General has overlooked many incidents which he ought to have stated and which he ought to have known would not be kept back. You have obtained what you regard as a victory over the leader of the Catholic people. That victory has been obtained by you through the instrumentality of a Protestant Jury. If it was fairly won, I am free to acknowledge that it is not unnaturally followed by that Ministerial ovation in which the Secretary for the Colonies and the Secretary for the Home Department have not thought it indecorous to indulge; but if that victory has been unfairly won—if, while you adhere to the forms of law, you have violated the principles of justice; if a plot was concocted at the Home Office, and executed in the Queen's Bench; if by an ostensible acquiescence in monster meetings for nine months, you have decoyed your antagonists into your toils; if foully or fortuitously (and whether fortuitously or foully, the result is the same) a considerable fraction of the Jury List has been suppressed; if you have tried the Liberator of the Irish Catholics with a Jury of exasperated Protestants; if justice is not only suspected, but comes tainted and contaminated from her impure contact with authority—then, not only have you not a just cause for exultation, but your successes are of that sinister kind which are as fatal to the victors as to the vanquished—which will tarnish you with an ineffaceable discredit, and will be followed at last by a retribution, slow indeed, but however tardy, inevitably sure. I have presented a double hypothesis to the House. Let us see to which of the alternatives the facts ought to be applied. I shall be permitted in the first instance, to refer to an observation made by the Secretary for Ireland in reference to myself. The noble Lord said:—

"He must now advert to something which had fallen from a Member of that House out of doors regarding Chief Baron Brady, and Mr. Anthony Blake. It had been observed by Mr. Sheil, that an insult had been offered to the Catholics of Ireland, because those Gentlemen had not been summoned to a meeting of the Council. He believed Chief Baron Brady was a Protestant. But let that pass.

He took on himself the responsibility of not summoning those Gentlemen to the Council. He thought that the measure determined on was the deliberate act of Government, and he did not, therefore, think it proper to ask the opinion of political opponents."

What I said was this: "A circumstance occurred connected with the Proclamation which is not undeserving of note. It has always been the usage in this country (Ireland) to summon every Member of the Privy Council. Upon this occasion the Chief Baron, although living in the neighbourhood of Dublin, was not summoned, and Mr. Blake, a Roman Catholic, who lives in Dublin, was not summoned. He was appointed to the office of Chief Remembrancer by a Tory Government: He had been the intimate friend of Lord Wellesley, a great Conservative statesman. He had never taken any part in any violent proceedings, but he was not summoned upon this occasion, although summoned upon every other to the Privy Council; while the Recorder of the city of Dublin, by whom the Jury List was to be revised, and in whose department an accident of a most untoward kind had happened, was summoned to the Council whence the Proclamation went forth." That was what I said, and I take advantage of this opportunity to add, that if Mr. Blake had been at the Privy Council on Friday, he would have urged his associates not to delay the posting of the Proclamation until Saturday, but would have told them, that, without any long recitals, immediate notice should be given to the people of the determination of the Government. Notice of the Clontarf Meeting was given for three weeks. It was to have been held upon Sunday. On the preceding Friday the Council assembled. On that day the Proclamation ought to have been prepared and posted. I did not appear until Saturday afternoon, and the country is indebted to Mr. O'Connell, if upon an unarmed multitude an excited soldiery was not let loose. The Proclamation was obeyed. With that obedience you ought to have been contented. The monster meetings were at an end; but you had previously determined to prosecute for a conspiracy, and for that purpose you lay in wait for nine months, and that you did the Proclamation itself affords a proof. The Proclamation recites—parts of Ireland, 'under the like pretence, at several of which Meetings, language of a seditious and inflammatory nature has been addressed to the persons there assembled, calculated and intended to excite disaffection in the minds of Her Majesty's subjects, and to bring into hatred and contempt, the Government and Constitution of the country, as by law established; And whereas, at some of the said Meetings, such seditious and inflammatory language has been used by persons, &c."

If this statement be true, why did you not long before indict the individuals by whom those seditious speeches were delivered? Why did you not prosecute the newspapers by which inflammatory paragraphs had been almost daily published, for a period of nine months? The motive was obvious. It was your purpose—your deliberate and long meditated purpose, to make Mr. O'Connell responsible for harangues which he had never spoken, and for publications which he had never read. I content myself with giving a single instance, which will afford, however, a perfect exemplification of the whole character of your proceedings. A Catholic Priest published an article in the Pilot newspaper, upon "The Duty of a Soldier." He signed his name, James Power, to that article. He was never prosecuted—he was never threatened; he has escaped with perfect impunity: but that article was given in evidence against Daniel O'Connell, by whom it does not appear that it was even ever seen. Such a proceeding never was instituted in this country—such a proceeding, I trust in God, never will be instituted in this country—for Englishmen would not endure it; and this very discussion will tend to awaken them to a sense of the peril to which they are themselves exposed. Does not the question at once present itself to everybody, if that seditious language was employed for so long a period as nine months, why did you not prosecute it before? Why did you not prosecute such an article as this which I hold in my hand, and which was published so far back as the 1st of April, 1843. You might have proceeded by criminal information or indictment, for the publication of a poem in the Nation newspaper, on which Her Majesty's Attorney General entered into a somewhat lengthened expatiation in addressing the Jury, and declared it to be a poem of a most inflammatory character. I allude to verses entitled, "The Memory of the Dead."

"Who fears to speak of Ninety-eight?
Who blushes at the name?
When cowards mock the patriot's fate,
Who hangs his head for shame?
He's all a knave, or half a slave,
Who slights his country thus;
But a true man, like you, man,
Will fill your glass with us.

"We drink the memory of the brave,
The faithful and the few—
Some lie far off beyond the wave,
Some sleep in Ireland too;
All—are gone—but still lives on
The fame of those who died;
All true men, like you, men,
Remember them with pride.

"Some of the shores of distant lands
Their weary hearts have laid,
And by the stranger's heedless hands
Their lonely graves were made.
But though their clay be far away
Beyond the Atlantic foam—
In true men, like you, men,
Their spirit's still at home.

"The dust of some is Irish earth;
Among their own they rest;
And the same land that gave them birth
Has caught them to her breast;
And we will pray that from their clay
Full many a race may start
Of true men, like you, men,
To act as brave a part.

"They rose in dark and evil days
To right their native land;
They kindled here a living blaze
That nothing shall withstand.
Alas! that Might can vanquish Right—
They fell and passed away;
But true men, like you, men,
Are plenty here to-day.

"Then here's to their memory—may it be
For us a guiding light,
To cheer our strife for liberty,
And teach us to unite.
Through good and ill be Ireland's still,
Though sad as their's your fate,
And true men, be you, men,
Like those of Ninety-eight."

No man in the Court, who heard this poem recited by the right hon. Gentleman in the most emphatic manner will deny, that it produced a great effect on the Jury. The Attorney General stated, that this was but a single specimen of the entire volume, and that it very much exceeded in violence the productions of the same character in the year 1797. If the description is true, this poem having been published on the 1st of April, and a series of compositions, in prose and verse, of the same kind having appeared for several successive months, does not every man who hears me ask, why it was that proceedings were not taken for the punishment of the persons by whom such articles were published, and for the prevention of offences to which such evil effects were attributed. My answer is this—you had determined to prosecute for a conspiracy, and you connived at meetings and publications of this class. You allowed these papers to proceed in their career, to run a race in sedition, and to establish a complete system for the excitement of the public. You did not prosecute the authors of the articles, or their publishers, at the time they were published. You afterwards joined in the defence the editors of three newspapers, and you gave in evidence against Mr. O'Connell every article published in 1843. Was that a legitimate proceeding? Has there been a precedent in this country of such a proceeding? Has there been an instance of a man indicted for a conspiracy, being joined with these editors of newspapers, and of the articles of those newspapers being given in evidence against him? You might tell me that the mode of proceeding was legitimate, if there were no other mode of punishing the editors of those newspapers. But was there no other mode? Could not those publications have been stopped? Could not the channels by which sedition was circulated through the country have been closed up? Therefore, we charge you with having stood by—(I adopt the expression of the Attorney General) with having stood by, and with having, if not encouraged, at least permitted very strong proceedings to be adopted by the popular party, when you thought your purpose had been obtained, you then fell on the man whom you had inclosed within your toils. I come now to the observations of the Attorney General regarding Mr. Bond Hughes, and I confess myself to be not a little surprised at them. He said that Mr. Bond Hughes had been denounced as a perjurer, and spoke of us as if we had painted him in colours as black as those in which Roman Catholic Members of Parliament are occasionally held up to the public detestation; but he kept back the fact that Mr. Bond Hughes did make two signal mistakes in his information, and which he himself acknowledged to be mistakes, which before Mr. Bond Hughes was examined did produce no ordinary excitement. Not one word did the Attorney General say in reference to a most remarkable incident in these trials. The facts stand thus:—Mr. Bond Hughes had sworn in his information that he had seen Mr. Barrett at two meetings in Dublin. It was of the utmost importance to the Crown to fix Barrett, in order to implicate him with Mr. O'Connell. Mr. Bond Hughes sees Mr. Barrett at Judge Burton's chambers, and turning to Mr. Ray, the chief clerk of the Crown solicitor, informs Mr. Ray that he was mistaken with respect to Mr. Barrett, and that he had not seen him at the Dublin meetings. He suggests to Mr. Ray that something should be done to correct his misapprehension. Ray says nothing. Bond Hughes then applies to the Crown Solicitor himself, to Mr. Kemmis, and represents to him the painful predicament in which he is placed; Mr. Kemmis says nothing. Bond Hughes accompanies Mr. Kemmis to his house, and no rectification of that signal mistake is made. Mr. Bond Hughes stated all this at the trial, which the Attorney General, although he went into exceedingly minute details, entirely forgot to mention. It is quite true that Mr. O'Connell at the trial acquitted Mr. Bond Hughes, but I leave it to the House to determine how far Mr. Kemmis should be relieved from blame. But lest you should think I am varnishing, or impeaching wantonly, the character of this immaculate Crown Solicitor—you who charge us with tampering with Mr. Magrath, a man at this moment in the employment of the Recorder—I will read to you the statement of Mr. Bond Hughes, of which the Attorney General said not a word, because, I suppose, he thought it not at all relevant. Probably he supposed it to be a work of supererogation to set the public right with respect to any unfortunate misapprehension of Mr. Bond Hughes. The following is the evidence he gave:—

“Turn to Monday, the 9th of October—I mean the meeting in Abbey-street. Can you enumerate the persons present of the travellers?—There were present Mr. John O'Connell, Mr. Daniel O'Connell, Mr. Steele, the Rev. Mr. Tyrrell, Dr. Gray, Mr. Duffy, and Mr. Ray.

“Then Mr. Barrett was not amongst them?—He was not.

“Then I presume you did not see at that meeting Mr. Barrett?—No. I made a mistake in saying he was there.

“You made that mistake on a previous day, not this day?—I made the mistake on the occasion I refer to, and I corrected it as soon as I possibly could.

“Then Mr. Barrett was not present? He did not deliver a speech upon the occasion?—He did not.

"The Solicitor General has not asked you about a dinner at the Rotunda. Were you there in your capacity as a reporter?—I was.

"I believe then I may assume as a fact that Mr. Barrett was not at that dinner?—No, he was not there.

"Of course he made no speech at the dinner?—No, he did not. Somebody else made a speech for him. I was misinformed.

"You mistook some one else for Mr. Barrett on the second occasion?—I did, and I corrected the error as soon as I possibly could.

"I think you stated, in answer to a question, that in justice to yourself, you felt it your duty to correct the mistake at the earliest period you could?—Yes.

"Were you at the house of Judge Burton when the informations were to be sworn?—I was.

"Did you see Mr. Barrett there?—I did.

"Did you, on that occasion, depose to the informations?—No; I did that on a prior occasion. I had sworn to the affidavits, and I made an amended affidavit on the second occasion.

"Did I understand you to say that you corrected that mistake about Mr. Barrett on a subsequent occasion?—I did not.

"Were you present at the occasion when Mr. Barrett was held to bail upon the informations previously sworn against him?—I was.

"And you saw him subscribe the recognizances?—I did.

"Did you then and there correct the mistake?—I did, on the instant.

"Oh, I mean as to the name of Barrett?—Yes; I told Mr. Ray and Mr. Kemmis.

"Were they then attending on the part of the Crown?—Yes; they were.

"Did you speak to Mr. Kemmis on the subject?—No; he was engaged taking the informations, but immediately after we got out of the room I communicated it to Mr. Ray.

"Let us have no mistake here. I suppose you don't mean Mr. Ray, one of the traversers?—No; I mean Mr. Ray, the managing clerk of Mr. Kemmis.

"And did you, before you left the house of the Judge, apprise these two persons of the mistake?—I did, as we were leaving the house. I said I had a doubt about Mr. Barrett.

"When did you say that?—I said it when we were leaving the Judge's chamber.

"What did Mr. Kemmis say?—I spoke chiefly to Mr. Ray.

"What did Mr. Kemmis say?—I don't recollect.

"How far was it from the Judge's house?—As we were going through Kildare-street.

"Before you came to Mr. Kemmis's house?—Yes.

"Cannot you recollect what Mr. Kemmis said on that occasion?—I cannot.

"Did he say it was too late to correct the mistake?—He did not.

"Did he make no observation?—I don't remember.

"And there it was left?—There it was left.

"Now you mentioned the matter to Mr. Ray. Was it in Judge Burton's chamber?—It was in the passage, as we were leaving the room.

"Mr. Barrett was then in the house?—He was: we all left about the same time.

"What did you say?—That I had been mistaken with regard to Mr. Barrett, and I doubted whether he had been at the Rotunda or Calvert's Theatre; that I had heard his name mentioned, but was mistaken as to his identity.

"What did Mr. Ray say?—I don't remember what he said.

"Very extraordinary that you should not recollect what was said on so important an occasion. Did not Mr. Ray return?—No.

"And no further steps were taken by you?—I thought when I had put them in possession of the mistake, that I had done all that was necessary. I did not think the question of identity would have been left to me.

"You had no doubt about the mistake?—I was satisfied as soon as I saw him, that he was not the person.

"How long was it after the mistake about Mr. Tierney that the mistake was corrected.—In about three days afterwards.

"That was merely a mistake about the christian name?—Yes.

"The other mistake remained uncorrected. Did you apprise Mr. Barrett of it?—No; I thought I had done all that was necessary when I had apprised the Officers of the Crown of it."

Great stress is laid by the Attorney General on the sworn and unsworn statements of Mr. Kemmis. He told the Attorney General this, and he told the Attorney General that, but he did not rectify the errors in Mr. Bond Hughes' affidavit. Now, I think the House must wonder that a person like the Crown Solicitor should have been guilty of a sin of omission such as I have described; and in the next place, what is more extraordinary, I think the House must be not merely surprised, but astonished, that when the Attorney General made it a matter of accusation against Mr. O'Connell that Bond Hughes was the subject of imputation, and had been calumniated, he did not state that Bond Hughes had been mistaken, and had actually supplicated the Crown Solicitor to rescue him from his difficulty. I wonder if Mr. Kemmis mentioned it to the Attorney General himself? Did he so, or did he not? Oh, last night you thought that the Attorney General had made out a triumphant case. [Loud cheers from the Opposition, met by counter cheers from the other side.] Do you consider this a fitting matter for exultation. [Conservative cheers renewed.] I must say, I cannot enter into your peculiar views, or appreciate the excellence of Tory ethics. [Loud Opposition cheering?] If these things be to you "tidings of great joy," I should be loath to disturb your self-complacency. I pass from a topic upon which I have said enough. No further comments are required; but let it be remembered, that those Gentlemen who charge us with the corruption of Mr. Magrath, who sought—to use a rather vulgar phrase—to turn the tables upon us by a somewhat clumsy expedient—have themselves in the transaction I have mentioned, adopted the course I have described, and respecting which it is unnecessary for me to say one word more. But, to proceed to the other facts of the case:—The Bills are found. The names of the witnesses on the back of the Indictment are demanded by the Defendant, that was a reasonable demand. In this country, united with Ireland—and I hope you will extend to Ireland the same principles and habits of liberty by which you are governed—in this country the practice has uniformly been to furnish the names of the witnesses on the back of the indictment. Am I not right? The hon. and learned Attorney General for England will do me the favour to correct me if I am mistaken. The hon. and learned Gentleman intimates by gesture, that is the practice in this country. We applied for the names of the witnesses; we received a peremptory refusal. You asked for a trial at bar, you wished to have four Judges. One of those Judges was Mr. Justice Perrin. When it was convenient, the right hon. and learned Attorney General relied upon the unanimity of the Court, but when they disagreed he barely glanced at it.

The Attorney General (for Ireland) was understood to say that he had stated the Judges were unanimous in their judgment.

Mr. Sheil: They allowed the Chief Justice to charge the Jury; they concurred with the Chief Justice in his view of the law. But do you not think any attention is to be paid to their dissent? If from their harmony you deduce consequences so valuable, from their discord are not some inferences also to be drawn? It is the practice to give the names of the witnesses in England. Judge Perrin declared that he thought that in Ireland also it was a matter of right to give those names. That was a solemn decision upon the point. Judge Burton, an Englishman, with some remnant left of the feeling for which his countrymen are distinguished, said, he thought that although it was not a matter of right, it would be judicious on the part of the Crown to give the names. Mr. Whiteside, the eloquent Counsel for Mr. O'Connell, at the conclusion of the case made a most reasonable suggestion. The Attorney General resisted it, on the ground that it would introduce a new practice. I think that the right hon. and learned Attorney General, when he went into all those minute details of that part of the case yesterday, would have done right had he mentioned the opinion of Mr. Justice Burton, the decision of Mr. Justice Perrin, and the offer made by Mr. Whiteside on behalf of the defendant. Let the House bear in mind, and let the country bear in mind, that an application never resisted in this country—admitted by the hon. and learned Attorney General for England to be always granted as a matter of right—was by Her Majesty's Attorney General for Ireland, God knows for what reason, peremptorily rejected. I admit that the right hon. and learned Attorney General agreed to the postponement of the trial upon two grounds—the first, that time was required to prepare a proper defence, as it obviously was when it was remembered evidences had to be given regarding forty-one meetings on behalf of the Crown; and on the second ground, that there were but twenty-five Catholics upon the Panel for 1843, while it was perfectly manifest that a much larger number of Catholic Jurors ought to have been upon the Special Jury List. But I deny that the Court refused the application. My impression, on the contrary, was, that the Court determined to grant the application. It was obvious that one of the Judges at least was so disposed. But let me not be mistaken. I do not mean to say that that was distinctly stated by the Court, what I say is this—Judge Burton expressed his astonishment that there were only twenty-five Catholics on the Jury List, and when that surprise was expressed, the Attorney General, having against him an irresistible case, agreed to the postponement of the trial, with the view to give the parties time to prepare their defence, a course he could not avoid, and also in order that the case should not be tried before a most erroneous panel. I do not wish to deny the merit of the right hon. and learned Attorney General, but had he insisted upon going at once to trial with a Panel admitted to be utterly imperfect, and denounced by the right hon. and learned Recorder himself as most imperfect; surely an imputation would then have rested upon him far stronger than that which at this moment attaches to him, and, in my opinion, not without reason. I come to the suppression of a portion of the Jury List. It is right that the House should be apprised that counsel were employed on behalf of the Repeal party and on behalf of the Conservative party, when the Recorder was going through the parochial lists, and that every name was a subject of as much contention as a vote at an election. The Recorder's Court became the arena of the fiercest political contention. But I will begin by declaring that in the adjudication of the parochial lists the Recorder acted with the most perfect fairness, and I have no hesitation in saying that I believe he would rather that his right hand should wither than use it in an infamous mutilation of the Jury List. I entirely acquit him of impurity of motive. But, having made this statement, he will forgive me for saying that I do think it was his duty to have personally superintended the ultimate formation of the Jury List, and if he had superintended it the mutilation of the Jury List would not have taken place. He complained that he had been made the object of the vulgar abuse of hired Counsel. He once belonged to the band of mercenaries himself, and might have spared the observation. But I do not think it either vulgar or vituperative to state that it would have been better if he had remained in Dublin after his judicial duty had terminated, and when his ministerial duty had commenced. I admit as an excuse, almost as a justification, that he had great inducement to proceed to England; for the Evening Mail, the recorder of great public events, did not omit to watch the movements of the right hon. Gentleman, and stated, under the head of "Fashionable Intelligence," that the right hon. Gentleman, having left Ingestre, proceeded to the residence of that distinguished Statesman, who in all likelihood was anxious to consult the Recorder on the proposed augmentation of the grant to the Education Board. And, may I be permitted to add, parenthetically, that upon the subject of Education in Ireland a judicious taciturnity has been observed by the right hon. Gentleman. No one will suspect that the right hon. Gentleman connived at, or had the slightest cognizance of any misdeeds which may have taken place in the transcription of the Jury List. I entirely and cheerfully acquit the Attorney General of every sort of moral imputation, but circumstances did take place in reference to this List, upon which Mr. Justice Perrin remarked in open Court, that there were grounds for apprehending that something had occurred which was worse than accident. Mr. Kemmis made an affidavit in reply, but he did not contradict the fact. There never was an affidavit in reply to that of Mr. Mahoney respecting the fact, although other affidavits were subsequently made, and ample opportunity for contradiction was afforded. What is the case made out against us by the other side? But the Attorney General more than insinuates, because Mr. Magrath is a Catholic, the traversers, or some underlings connected with them, tampered with him. That is the charge made, without a possibility of sustaining it. Does the Recorder assent to this assault on the character of a person still in his employment? How frontless and how preposterous is the imputation! Does any one believe, or can any one, by the utmost stretch of credulity, bring himself to believe, that the defendants would substract a list of one parish, containing fifteen Catholic names, in order that not one of them might be called on the Jury? Yet that is the insinuation made by Her Majesty's Attorney General for Ireland. Is this a fair mode of proceeding? When the Attorney General makes a charge of this kind he ought to invest it with plausibility; but the Attorney General forgot that the defendants put the very charge in issue in their challenge; why did he not venture to controvert it? We are charged with corrupting a public officer whose livelihood depended upon good faith in the performance of his duties—for what? For the purpose of removing Roman Catholics from a panel to try Roman Catholics? Is that plausible? Could such assertions be received by acclamation except by Gentlemen who had been affected by the eloquence of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. The speech itself, indeed, of the right hon. and learned Gentleman I was disposed to cheer, but when I found that cheers were raised for a man who was blasting the character of another, I was astonished both at the want of just feeling on the part of the Attorney General, and that such an accusation, destitute of proof, without plausibility, should be received with acclamations by a British assembly. What took place when the discovery was made of these missing names—I do not care whether they were sixty, or twenty-four, or twenty-seven? The noble Lord opposite very justly says they were balloted for, and selected by chance. That may be a good or a bad principle, but the chances should be equal on both sides. The Judge in Rabelais had a dice-box, and threw for the plaintiff and defendant; but he did not load the dice. You remember the old practice in the House of Commons of balloting, when the names of Members were put in glasses. Suppose in such a case, the names of twenty-seven Tories were left out. Of course, hon. Members, bound by their oaths, would be as incapable of doing anything unjust or improper as a Protestant Jury, but what would the Tories say in such a case? Would they not say, give us a new Ballot? Put the twenty-seven names back. But whether the Jury List was lost, or whether it was stolen, there are two facts connected with it of no ordinary moment. When the Jurors' List was applied for to the Recorder by the traversers, he expressed his anxiety to give it if the Crown would consent to his doing so. He told us that he sent the Clerk of the Peace to the Crown solicitor to ascertain whether the Crown would consent to that which the Recorder himself thought most reasonable and just. The Crown refused. The second fact is of the same character. An application was made to the Sheriff for the List, and the Crown refused to consent. What was the result? That till the very last moment, the traversers' attornies had no knowledge of the state of the Jurors' book. A motion is made to quash the Panel. An affidavit is sworn stating that twenty-seven Catholics were omitted. The Solicitor General makes an affidavit, and does not deny the fact. Judge Perrin declares that in his opinion, there is ground for strong suspicion that foul dealing had been practised. An offer is made by the traversers to have the names restored to the Panel. The Crown refused to agree. An offer is then made, and it clearly might have been done by consent, to have a new Ballot, to put the omitted names into the Ballot box, and that offer is also refused. The consent would have bound both parties, and that which the law contemplated would have been accomplished. The Attorney General, notwithstanding that he professed to detail everything that had happened with the most scrupulous exactness, did not say a syllable about the challenge to the array. He talked of Pearse's case, and Lord Hawarden's case, and fifty other cases, but not a word about the challenge; and for a very good reason, that Judge Perrin declared the challenge to be good, and the Panel to be void. A challenge to the array takes place, and it is alleged in the challenge, and put in issue, that sixty names had been omitted from the Jury List, and that the omission was fraudulent and corrupt. That fact the Crown refused to try. The following are the words of part of the challenge:—

“And the said defendant further says, that a certain paper writing, purporting to be a general list, made out from such several lists so corrected, allowed and signed as aforesaid, was illegally and fraudulently made out, for the purpose and with the intent of prejudicing the said defendant in this cause.”

What reason has the Attorney General given for not joining issue on that important allegation—an allegation sustained by Judge Perrin's previous unequivocal expression of his opinion? It might have been tried at once by the officer of the Court, but a demurrer was preferred. Now mark what happens. We put at issue two facts—the loss of the names, most material—the fraud, still more. Was it not the duty of the Crown, under these circumstances, to have joined issue with us? If they had joined issue, there would have been an end to our objection; and if the point had been decided against them, then, of course, the Panel must have been altered, or some steps adopted. How did the Court decide? Was the Court unanimous? Mr. Justice Perrin, who introduced the act into Ireland, which belonged to the Reform code of the right hon. Baronet opposite—Mr. Justice Perrin, who knew the object of the Act—who was familiar with all its details—by whom its machinery, so to speak, had been in part altered and adapted—Mr. Justice Perrin decided that the challenge was good. But Government went to trial, one of the Judges having declared that the source from which justice flowed had been corrupted. A learned Friend suggests to me that a demurrer always admits the fact but I will be candid on that subject. A demurrer admits the fact, for the purpose of argument only. I did not dwell upon that point because it was in some sort a legal fiction. I went to what was much more substantial. The Crown had the opportunity of ascertaining a fact of the utmost materiality; the Crown shrunk from that investigation. You then went on with the case with the Protest of one of the Judges against you, and a verdict you have obtained, by the intervention of a Jury condemned by one of the Judges who sat in that Court. If all of the Judges were unanimous as to the abstract law, as stated by the Lord Chief Justice, they were not unanimous as to the verdict, because one of the Judges condemned the Panel which was the foundation of the verdict, and if the Panel be shaken, the entire superstructure raised upon it must, of course, fall to. I come now to another portion of this case—the striking-off of Roman Catholics from the Jury. But I see I am occupying the attention of the House at too great a length; but it is a case of paramount importance. It is a case in which I was Counsel, and, of course, took a very warm interest in it—it would be strange if I did not—and I believe I am, to a certain extent, better acquainted with the facts than others can be, and I conscientiously believe I have not stated anything that departs in the slightest degree from the facts. With respect to the striking-off of the Roman Catholics, it is said by Mr. Kemmis that there were ten on the list of forty-eight Jurors. Now, eight of those ten I at once admit were properly struck off. I cannot for a moment pretend that eight members of the Repeal Association, or persons who were subscribers to its funds, ought to have been retained on the Jury. I could no more contend for it than that you should contend that Mr. Sheriff Faulkener should have been upon the Jury. But there were two names struck off who were Roman Catholics, but who were neither Members of the Repeal Association, nor subscribers to the Repeal Fund. Mark the affidavit of Mr. Kemmis, put it in the disjunctive—he believes that the ten persons struck off the list were either members of the Repeal Association, or had subscribed to its funds. Henrick is a Roman Catholic; what course has been taken about Henrick? The noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Colonies, who appears to know more about this part of the case than the Irish Attorney General, told us that Henrick was considered to be a Protestant, and a Conservative. Who told him so? [Lord Elliot: Mr. Kemmis.] Mr. Kemmis did not swear it. It never was mentioned until this debate had commenced. You start a new case or new pretext every moment, and that new pretext is grounded on nothing better than an asseveration of his belief by the Crown Solicitor regarding a fact, in reference to which he was most egregiously mistaken. Henrick was not a member of the Repeal Association. He never subscribed to the Repeal Rent. He is a Roman Catholic. It is sworn that he is. I requested my hon. Friend, the Member for the county of Wexford, when this matter was in agitation, and who was acquainted with Henrick, to ask him two questions: first, whether he was a Roman Catholic; and next, whether he was a member of the Repeal Association, or a subscriber to the Repeal Fund? The answer was that he was a Roman Catholic—that he was not a member of the Repeal Association, and that he had never subscribed to its Fund. But you now make a new case, and say that you thought he was a Protestant, and a Conservative. Come to the case of Michael Dunne. You do not pretend that Dunne was either a member of the Repeal Association, or a subscriber to its funds. But you believed that he might have signed a requisition for a Repeal meeting, though even that allegation is not positively made. But is there no distinction between being a Repealer and being a member of the Association? Is there no distinction between being an advocate of Free-trade and a member of the Anti-Corn-law League? If Mr. Cobden, and Mr. Bright, and Mr. Villiers, and the Globe newspaper, and the Morning Chronicle, were indicted tomorrow for a conspiracy, would the Crown be justified in setting aside, as a juror, every man who had signed a requisition in favour of Free-trade, or had signed a requisition in favour of the repeal of the Corn-laws? Or suppose that in 1831 the Tories had come into office, and had indicted the Whigs for conspiring to carry Reform by intimidation, for corresponding with the Birmingham Union, and for "swamping the House of Lords," would there be no distinction made, in empanelling a jury to try those revolutionary delinquents, between an advocate of Reform, and a member of that seditious association commonly called Brooks's Club, in which I had once the good fortune of hearing a most eloquent speech delivered against the Duke of Wellington by a great orator, who, mounted upon a table through whose planks he almost stamped, poured out an incendiary harangue, amidst enthusiastic acclamation and rapturous applause. But let us go back to the Jury. The Panel was bad, and was so declared by the Judges. You adopted the course requiring that every Roman Catholic should be struck off the List. Would it not have been wise if the Crown had given its consent that some Roman Catholic should be left on the List. I deny that if the Crown had consented to the formation of a new Panel there would have been any objection on the part of the traversers; and in that case, if the traversers afterwards attempted to controvert the verdict, they would clearly have been stopped by their own proceedings. But suppose no consent had been given, was there not another expedient that might have been adopted? Could not the rule for the Special Jury have been discharged? The Sheriff for the city of Dublin is a gentleman of the highest respectability—Mr. Latouche. When the Municipal Bill was passing you took the appointment of the Sheriffs from the corporation. You left that appointment to the corporations in England. You did not take the appointment from cities here; but when you came to deal with us, you took the appointment of the Sheriff from cities, and vested it in the Crown; because you said that if the new corporations appointed the Sheriffs, they would be just as bad as the old. I do not say whether the course you took was right or wrong, but when the Crown assumed the right of appointing the Sheriff, they might most safely and wisely have left to the Sheriff the appointment of the Jury in this case. You use the words Common Jury, an expression, generally speaking, which means men selected from the inferior classes. Now, the Jury that tried this case, were comparatively speaking, taken from the inferior classes. There were on it Protestant grocers, Protestant piano-forte tuners, and Protestant tanners. Perhaps it would have been better if persons of a higher class had been selected; but I must admit, that there is one advantage in making the middle classes the depositaries of political power, and that the middle classes are animated with as high a sense of honour and of duty as the first patricians in the land. I should never quarrel with the Jury if they had not been composed of political antagonists. An expression was used by my right hon. Friend the Member for the City of Edinburgh, which has strongly excited the ire of the Attorney General for Ireland. My right hon. Friend had said that if there had been a Common Jury the Attorney General for Ireland would not have dared to set by the Roman Catholics, whose names might be on the List. To this the Attorney General for Ireland has replied, "I would have dared!" and certainly no one can deny his intrepidity. But what my right hon. Friend meant was this—that the Crown, controlled by public opinion—controlled, if not in Ireland, at least in this country by public opinion, acting under the coercion of British sentiment, would not have ventured upon an act at once so culpable, and so imprudent, as to strike off names of the highest respectability because they were Roman Catholics. Therefore, if you were sincere in the manifestation of your desire that the Roman Catholics should be capable of acting on that Jury, you had a very obvious mode of carrying your purpose into effect and of realising that desire; for when you found the mistake on the Panel by all the Roman Catholics being excluded, you might have got a Common Jury, and in that case the verdict would have been unimpeachable, and all the controversy which has taken place, and all its consequences, and all the natural and inevitable irritation, might have been avoided. Under these circumstances, is it wonderful, that in Ireland great excitement should have taken place? Is it astonishing, that the Roman Catholics of Ireland should have felt indignant to a man on the subject? Is it wonderful that great public meetings should have taken place in every district of the country to take the subject into consideration? Were these Meetings called by factious men? At the head of them stood Lord Kenmare, one of the advocates of the Union—a man of large possessions, of very ancient birth, and a man highly allied in this country. That Nobleman felt that these proceedings were an insult offered to him; he, therefore, not for the purposes of partizanship, not to gratify any political passion, not from any predilection in favour of Mr. O'Connell, signs a requisition to call a public meeting to complain of the course pursued by the Crown. There was another circumstance which gave an additional poignancy to the feelings of the Roman Catholics; that circumstance was this, and as the Attorney General for Ireland thought it judicious on his part to advert to the course I pursued on a trial at Carrick-on-Suir,—he will excuse me if I refer to something which concerns himself, and to an occasion on which he made himself most conspicuous in Ireland. I do not mention this for the purpose of malevolence—I bear no ill-will to the right hon. Gentleman—I have no motive for ill-will—he never did me wrong; and that that right hon. Gentleman should have imagined that a conspiracy was formed against him at the Bar, for the purpose of wounding his feelings, and injuring his prospects, was a most unfortunate hallucination on his part. I beg, on my honour, to assure him that no such intention was ever entertained. But he is a public man, and considering that, and in the management of the important duties it has imposed upon him, he did not exhibit any great delicacy towards others, he must expect, that when his political antagonists scrutinize his motives and his conduct, they will ask what manner of man this must have been, and what course has he pursued? He last night alluded to my conduct at a trial which took place many years ago; and he said, also, that he was sorry for what he had said at the meeting which he attended in 1837. As being contrite, he is to be forgiven. But when the Roman Catholics of Ireland come to compare the course pursued by the Attorney General, at the late Trial in Dublin, with the opinions he had previously expressed—it was impossible that their suspicion should not be confirmed, that unfair dealings were practised in their regard.

The House is already aware of the course pursued by the right hon. Gentleman upon the Education question—a question upon which the Recorder of Dublin took care to spear his right hon. Friend, when he endeavoured to escape from it. But the right hon. Gentleman had distinguished himself still more upon another question. In the year 1837, a great Protestant Meeting was held in Dublin—speeches and resolutions of the most violent character were made and passed at that Meeting. One of the Barristers who took part in those proceedings has been made a Master in Chancery; two of them have been made Judges, Lefroy and Jackson; and the right hon. Gentleman himself has been made Attorney General by a Government which professes to govern Ireland without reference to party. At that Meeting a resolution was passed declaring that the Protestants of Ireland were in as perilous a condition now, as they were in 1641, when the most frightful massacres of Protestants are said to have taken place. But what did the right hon. Gentleman say at that meeting? He said that Roman Catholics in Parliament had no regard to their oaths. That declaration, censurable as it was, was more manly than if he had dealt in insidious hints and despicable insinuations. But, surely, when the public functionary by whom that language was uttered caused ten Roman Catholics to be struck off from the Special Jury, it was impossible not to connect that proceeding with his former conduct—it was impossible not to attribute it to the most offensive motives. Meetings took place in almost every district in Ireland, and even the Roman Catholics of England were stirred into resentment. They are, to a man, opposed to the Repeal of the Union. But this outrage to the feelings of every Roman Catholic in the Empire they could not endure. When the First Lord of the Treasury came into office, Lord Shrewsbury addressed a letter to Mr. O'Connell, calling on him to support the present Administration. But the blood of the Talbots has caught fire—the first Earl in England denounces the gross affront offered to the religion of that community of which he is an ornament. The following letter was written by Lord Shrewsbury to Lord Camoys, on the occasion of the latter noble Lord presiding at a meeting of English Catholics in the Metropolis:—

"My dear Lord—I regret extremely that circumstances will not allow me to attend the meeting over which you are to preside to-morrow, as I was anxious for an opportunity of expressing my indignation, in common with yourself and many others, at the fresh insult offered to the whole Catholic population of these kingdoms, by the conduct of the Law Officers of the Crown in the preliminary proceedings on the interesting and important Trials now taking place in Dublin. The Catholics appear to have been struck off the panel en masse, upon the ground that they were all Repealers; but while this fact is asserted on the one side, it is as stoutly denied upon the other. In the absence of any positive evidence on the point, we are, I think, fully justified in the inference that, whether Repealers or not, no Catholic would have been allowed to sit upon that Jury, seeing that such determination would have been in perfect keeping with what has hitherto been the fixed policy of the present Government in Ireland, to exclude Catholics from all share in the Administration of Public Affairs, and while professing to do equal justice to all, refusing them every grace and right enjoyed by their Protestant fellow-subjects. The exceptions are too trifling even to form the shadow of an argument.

"But even presuming that the facts are upon their side, does it evince a spirit of justice in the Government to discard every man who was known to be favourable to Repeal, and at the same time to leave upon the Panel many who were notoriously Anti-repealers, and who are now actually sitting in judgment upon the traversers? In either case, then, the first principles of justice have been violated, and a gross insult offered to the people of Ireland; and I am sorry that I have only been able to mark my reprobation of such conduct by signing the requisition for a meeting to express our common feelings upon the subject.

"I remain, my dear Lord,

"Very truly and faithfully yours,

"To the Lord Camoys." SREWSBURY,

Is not the fact itself a monstrous one, that in a great Catholic country, in the greatest State prosecution that has ever been instituted in that country, the Liberator of that country should be tried by an exclusive Jury, marshalled in antagonism against him? Strip the case of all those details upon which there has been so much controversy, look at that bare naked fact, and say whether it can be reconciled with the great principles of Catholic Emancipation? As far as Trial by Jury is concerned, Catholic Emancipation is repealed, and repealed in a spirit as preposterous as it is unjust. We are admitted to the Bench of Justice—that

Bench of Justice which was adorned by a Catholic Chief Baron and a Catholic Master of the Rolls,—we are admitted to the Imperial Senate, which I have at this moment the honour of addressing; we are admitted to the Treasury Board, to the Board of Admiralty, to the Board of Trade; we are admitted to the Privy Council; but admitted to the Bench, and admitted to the Parliament, and admitted to the Treasury, to the Admiralty, to the Board of Trade, and to the Privy Council, we are driven from the Jury—we are ignominiously driven from the Jury Box, where a refuge has been supplied to that Protestant Ascendancy which you have re-invested with all the most odious attributes of its most detestable domination. And yet the noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland tells us that he is anxious for the impartial administration of justice! At the last London Election Mr. Baring was asked, by a formidable interrogator, whether he was favourable to Free Trade? He answered that he was favourable to Free Trade in the abstract. But when he was asked whether he would vote for the Repeal of the Sliding Scale, he said that was quite another question. And so it is with the noble Lord. He is favourable to impartial justice in the abstract. Ask him to admit a Roman Catholic as a Juror upon a State Prosecution, and he exclaims, "Oh, that is quite another thing" I must, however, admit, that I believe the noble Lord to have erred from a certain infirmity of purpose, which although lamentable, is not so reprehensible as the Yorkshire Yeomanry authoritativeness, and the Fermanagh fanaticism of my Lord de Grey. There is in Dublin a society called the Protestant Operative Association. It exhibits in its characters the results of Conservative policy in Ireland. That Association presented an address to Lord de Grey immediately after the Proclamation had been issued. In that address it stated that "the sacrifice of the mass is a blasphemous fable, and that a system of idolatry unhappily prevails in our country." It submits to the Lord Lieutenant that "we want in Ireland laws which shall have the effect of abolishing Popery." It calls for the suppression of the College of Maynooth, the address, in short, is in keeping with another address from the same society in which the Catholic religion is designated as a "God-dishonouring, Christ-blaspheming, and a Bible-denying superation, whose climax is gross idolatry." Popery is called "the masterpiece of Satan." It states, there are idolators upon the Bench—idolators on the Judgment Seat." They conclude with a panegyric on the hon. Member for Knaresborough, whose arrival in Dublin they announce as an event to be gladly anticipated by all Irish Protestants. The other day he read a speech attributed to me; I acquit him of all blame, but that speech was not made by me, but by a person of the same name, resident in Thomas-street Dublin. In the Annual Register the speech is given to me by mistake. This Protestant Operative Association, this natural product of your sacerdotal institutions, having addressed the Lord Lieutenant in reference to the Proclamation, what answer did he give? Did he denounce—did he reprove contumely so wanton and so unprovoked? Did he, as the Representative of his Sovereign, who charged him when he went to Ireland to govern the country with impartiality, and expressed to him her tender solicitude for the welfare of her Irish people, express the slightest condemnation of the atrocious language which had been employed in reference to the religion of seven-eighths of the inhabitants of Ireland? No Sir.—But in his answer to the congratulations of these conspirators against the first principles of Christian charity, he expresses his "warm acknowledgments for the honours which they have conferred upon him, in the expression of their thanks for his conduct on a late occasion." Does the First Lord of the Treasury approve of this proceeding on the part of his "Lord Deputy of Ireland?" The Secretary for the Home Department considers it as indiscreet, but as to the Secretary for the Colonies, as he, in all likelihood, sympathises with the Protestant Operative Association, I beg to hand him their address to Lord de Grey, as it will furnish admirable materials for his next "No Popery" speech. The moral effect of the verdict will not be enhanced by the conduct of Lord de Grey, or by the speeches of the Secretary for the Colonies, or the Secretary for the Home Department. That right hon. Gentleman spoke of "convicted conspirators" not being able to upset the Established Church. Even if your verdict had been legitimately obtained, you should abstain from such expressions. You should not give way to this inglorious exultation. You are an Englishman, and you ought not to hit a man when he is down. As to the noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies, he never fails to apply a provocative to our resentments, and to verify what my friend Mr. Fonblanque says of his orations—"Every one of them is a blister of shining flies." I am surprised that the First Lord of the Treasury, knowing, as he must know, that so hot a horse is likely to bolt, allowed him to be entered for the race. He ought, at all events, if the noble Lord was determined to speak, to have suggested to him, that as his Government of Ireland had not been peculiarly successful, to avoid the topics which are most likely to add to the national irritation; he ought to have admonished him not to make such a speech as in Canada would be likely to produce great irritation amongst the large Catholic community of that important colony. Perhaps the Prime Minister did give him some such warning and probably, like the Irish Attorney General, he promised to put a restraint on himself, and to extend his Conservative habits to his temper. But once on his legs, all his good resolutions were forgotten, and he could not deny himself the luxury of offering every Catholic in the House an affront in the pharisaical homily which he delivered on the oath taken by Catholics in Parliament. He read the oath—read it in italics—he read it almost as well as the Chief Justice read the speech of Daniel O'Connell. He begged of us to examine our consciences, and to consider the awful obligation which was imposed upon us. In giving us a lecture on perjury, he does not mean to offend us. Be it so; but suppose that in the spirit of retaliatory gratitude, I were to give him a lecture on an offence of far inferior culpability, on political apostacy, and were to say—"My Lord I do not mean to offend you, but I entreat you not to give way to the acrimonious feelings by which tergiversation is habitually characterized; don't play the fierce and vindictive renegade, for the sake of men with whom the partner of your conversion declared that it would be in the last degree discreditable to consort, and remember that 'sans changer' is the motto attached to your illustrious name." I very much question whether the noble Lord would consider these amiable suggestions as giving me any very peculiar title to his thanks. But there was something even more remarkable than his advice in reference to the Catholic Oath in the speech of the noble Lord. He was exceedingly indignant at the reflections on the Chief Justice in reference to whom delicacy forbids my saying anything, as he was "counsel on the other side," and insisted that a Judge of the land ought not to be made the subject of criticism in this House; yet when he was a Wrig Cabinet Minister he did not exhibit this virtuous squeamishness, but thought Baron Smith, the father of the Irish Attorney General would give capital sport in a Committee of the House of Commons. He proposed an inquiry into the conduct of Baron Smith—an inquiry into the accuracy of the charge of Mr. Baron Smith. [Lord Stanley.—No, I did'nt.] Did'nt you? [Lord Stanley.—No, I did'nt.] What! No vote of censure? [Lord Stanley.—No.] No Motion for a Committee? [Lord Stanley.—No.] Then, what was it? There was a Motion I know made in this House for a Committee to inquire into the conduct of Mr. Baron Smith in charging the Grand Jury. [Lord Stanley.—No.] Yes, but there was. The Secretary for the Home Department perhaps can tell me, because he voted against the noble Lord. The Secretary for the Home Department was shocked at such a proceeding, and my Lord Montague, whose nerves are better now, was shocked too. Upon that occasion the noble Lord (Lord Stanley), and the Secretary for the Home Department were divided; there was then only one star in Gemini. But let me turn from the noble Lord, whose conduct and whose advice we hold in the estimate which they deserve, to the country to which he once said that he would give a lesson—and inquire how it is that you intend that the Government of Ireland, for the future, shall be carried on. Ireland is not to be ruled by force. Indeed! It is to be ruled through Protestant jurors, and Protestant charges, and Protestant goalers: but Protestant jurors, and Protestant charges, and Protestant goalers require that Protestant bayonets should sustain them, and that, with the discretion of the Home Office, the energy of the Horse Guards must be combined. But let me come to your specific measures. You have issued a Landlord and Tenant Commission, composed exclusively of proprietors. You did not place upon it a Catholic Bishop, or any other eminent Ec-clesiastic, having an intimate acquaintance with the sufferings of the poor. These Commissioners are to fill up three or four folios of evidence, to prove to us, what every one of us already knows. The Home Secretary tells us, that he is inclined to render the landlord's remedy more compendious; but he ought to remember that Mr. Lynch, the Master in Chancery, who is thoroughly acquainted with Ireland, a first-rate lawyer, and an excellent man, who has managed his own property with the most humane concern for his tenants, thought the remedy of the Quarter Sessions preferable to an ejectment in the Superior Courts, because the costs in the Superior Courts are overwhelming, and the tenant purchases a little delay at a price utterly ruinous, and which deprives him of all chance of redeeming his land. The right hon. Gentleman also informed us that he had a Registration Bill in his thought; I admit that the Government are entitled to large praise for having thrown the Secretary of the Colonies overboard; but why does not the right hon. Gentleman inform us of his plan? He will cut down the Franchise with one hand, and extend it with the other; but how will he extend it? By the Chandos' Clause: that is, he will discourage the granting of long leases, and he will create a mass of vassalage in times of tranquillity, and in seasons of political excitement he will create an open revolt, by which the whole country will be distracted. But what does he mean shall be done with regard to the Catholic Church and the Protestant Church—with regard to the Church with a congregation and without a revenue, and the Church with a revenue and without a congregation? Will he grant glebe leases to the Catholic Clergy, will he build Catholic houses of worship, will he augment Maynooth? On these subjects the Government are silent, but it is intimated that with the revenues of the Establishment no sacrilegious innovation shall be permitted to interfere, and that the Established Church shall be maintained in the plenitude of its possessions, in a country in which two-thirds of the Irish Members are returned by Roman Catholics, in which Roman Catholics are masters of all the Corporations in the south of Ireland, in which every day the Catholic millions are making a wonderful progress in wealth, in industry, in intelligence, in personal self-respect, and in individual determination. And why is the Church to be maintained in its superfluous temporalities? Because we are told that it is founded in Christian Protestant truth. Be it so; but permit me to inquire on which side of the Tweed in Great Britain Protestant truth is to be found? On the northern bank it is impersonated in the Member for Perth—in the Member for Oxford on the south. It is Calvinistic in the north, Armenian in the south; it is dressed in a black gown and a white band in the north; in the south it is episcopally enthroned, mitred and crosiered, and arrayed in all the pomp of pontifical attire. On the north it betrays its affinity to Geneva; on the south it exhibits a strong family resemblance to that Babylonian lady, toward whom, under the auspices of Doctor Pusey, its filial affection is beginning to return. If I shall ever be disposed to recant the errors which have now continued for 1800 years, in order that, being permitted to assail the Irish Church from without, I may, as a Protestant, undermine it from within, perhaps the Secretary for the Home Department, who is a borderer, will tell me on which bank of the Tweed the truth is to be discovered. But wherever it is to be found, it must be admitted that the Irish Church has not been very instrumental in its propagation. You have made no way in two centuries in Ireland, while Popery is every day, and in every way, upon the advance. The Catholic religion, indigenous to the mind of Ireland, has struck its roots profoundly and widely in the belief and the affections of the people—it has grown beneath the axe, and risen in the blast—while Protestant truth, although preserved in a magnificent conservatory, at prodigious cost, pines like a sickly exotic, to which no natural vitality can be imparted, which by every diversity of expedient you have striven to force into freshness, and warm into bloom, in vain. But you may resolve, per fas aut nefas, to maintain the abuses of the Church, but it is right that you should know, that among the Catholics of Ireland there exists but one opinion on the subject. You heard my hon. Friend the Member for Kildare—he is a Gentleman of fortune and of birth, highly connected, and who has again and again refused to take the Repeal pledge. He tells you that he is thoroughly convinced that an alteration in your Establishment is required. A vast body of the Protestant Irish Aristocracy entertain the same sentiment; and even here, the supporters of a Conservative Government cannot refrain from telling you that a revision of the Church cannot be long avoided. The hon. Member for Wakefield, who was one of the Vice-presidents, if I remember right, at the dinner given in 1838 to the First Lord of the Treasury, at the Merchant Tailors'-hall, bore his important, although reluctant, testimony to the necessity of a change. That change is said to be against principle. But what an incongruity between your theory and your practice: take, as an instance, the Canada Clergy and reserves. The Clergy reserves were appropriated by Act of Parliament, by one of the fundamental laws of the Colony, to the maintenance of the propagation of the Protestant religion. Before the revolt in Canada (that painful instrument of political amelioration) we were told that the Clergy reserves were set apart for sacred and inviolable purposes. But the Canadian insurrection produced one good result; the Archbishop of Canterbury did no more than stipulate for a change of phraseology in an Act of Parliament, and the Protestant Clergy reserves are at this moment applied, in part, to the sustainment and the diffusion of the Catholic religion. The present Prime Minister, the Secretary for the Colonies, the Secretary for the Home Department, the Bishop of London, all agreed to this momentous alienation. The Bishop of Exeter alone stood by his colours—he implored, he adjured the House of Lords in vain—he called on the Bishops to remember their oaths, he pointed out the disastrous precedent which you were about to make. He was right—the inference is irresistible, the whole appropriation question is involved in the Clergy reserves. But consider whether, even in your dealings with the Irish Church, you have not acted in such a way as to render your position utterly untenable. By the Church Temporalities Act you abolished Irish Church rates. You thereby subtracted so much from the property of the Church—you suppressed a certain number of Bishoprics, why should you not suppress a corresponding number of Benefices? You do not want so many Bishops—how can so many parsons be required by you? But the Tithe Bill is a still stronger case. In 1831 the Catholic Members asked nothing more than that you should apply the surplus of Church property to charity and education. They never proposed to confiscate a fourth and give it to the Irish Landlords. In 1835 that proposition was made by the present Secretary-at-War, then Secretary for Ireland. To the Tories the entire merit of originating that wild and Wellingtonian measure exclusively belongs. But the gallant Officer, when Secretary for Ireland, proposed a Bill by which one-fourth of the tithe was confiscated and put into the pockets of the Landlords—not you; you would not alienate Church property—not you; but with one blow you take away one-fourth of their tithes from the Church, and surrender the precious fragment into the pockets of the Protestant landlords of Ireland. Your own conduct in reference to the Education question is the strongest illustration of your own sense of the incompetence of the Irish Church to fulfil the duties of an Establishment. In England, where you have an Established Church which teaches the religion of the people, you gave up your Factory Bill; you have perpetuated ignorance, and all the vices which it engenders, rather than infringe on the sacerdotal prerogatives of your Establishment, which claims the tutelage of the Nation's mind; while in Ireland you have stripped the Church of all its privileges, and declared it to be unfit for one of its most important functions—the direction of the public mind; nay, more, the Secretary for Ireland, who now thinks it politic to offer his homage to the Clergy of the Established Church with a sincerity of panegyric commensurate, I hope, with its exaggeration, denounced that clergy for their factious opposition to the Education Board. You have thus, by your own acts, pronounced a virtual condemnation of your Establishment—that monster anomaly to which nothing in Europe is to be compared. Yes; there is one analogy to be found to your sacerdotal institutions—there is one country in Europe in which your Irish policy has been faithfully copied. In a series of remarkable Ukases the Emperor of all the Russias proclaims the eternal union between Poland and Russia, declares it to be the means of developing the great national advantages of Poland, expresses his surprise that the Poles should be so utterly insensible to his benevolence, reprobates the malcontents by whom fanciful grievances are got up, and establishes the Greek Church as an excellent bond of connection between the two countries. Is there a single argument that can be urged in favour of the English Church in Ireland which does not apply to the Establishment of the Greek Church in Poland? The see-simple of Poland is now Russian. Property in Poland has been Tartarised, by very much the same process by which it has been Protestantised in Ireland. A Greek hierarchy will compensate for the absence of the nobility in Moscow and St. Petersburg, and it will be eminently conducive to public usefulness, that a respectable Greek clergyman should be located, as a resident, in every parochial subdivision of Poland, with a living, in the inverse ratio of a congregation. Almost every year we have a debate in this House touching the wrongs of Poland, and an assurance is given by the right hon. Baronet that he will use his best endeavours to procure a mitigation of the sufferings of Poland. I have sometimes thought, that in case Lord Aberdeen should venture on any vehement expostulation, which is not, however, very likely, Count Nesselrode might ask, whether Russia had not adopted the example of England towards Ireland; whether, in Ireland, torrents of blood had not been poured out by your forefathers; whether Ireland had not been put through a process of repeated confiscation; whether the laws of Russia were more detestable than your barbarous penal code; and whether, to this day, you do not persevere in maintaining an ecclesiastical institution repugnant to the interests, utterly at variance with the creed, and abhorrent to the feelings of the vast majority of the people? Such, I think, would be the just reply of a Russian statesman to my Lord Aberdeen; and, since I have named my Lord Aberdeen, I gladly avail myself of the opportunity to express my unqualified approbation of his foreign policy. When the Home Office plays, in reference to Ireland, so beligerent a part, and when the Secretary of the Colonies, in speaking of Ireland, “stiffens the sinews” and “summons up the blood,” and, I may venture to add, imitates the action of the tiger, nothing will become my Lord Aberdeen so much as “mild behaviour and humility.” Rightly did my Lord Ashburton, under his auspices, concede to America far more than America could plausibly claim. Rightly will he relinquish the Oregon territory; rightly has he endured the intrigues of the French Cabinet in Spain; rightly did he speak of Algiers as a "fait accompli." Rightly will he abandon the Treaties of 1831 and 1833, for the suppression of the Slave Trade; but, after all, this prudential complaisance may be ultimately of little avail; for who can rely upon the sincerity of that international friendship, which rests on no better basis than the interchange of Royal civilities? Who can rely upon the stability of that Throne of the Barricades, which has neither legitimacy for its foundation, nor freedom for its prop. And if it falls, how fearful the consequences that may grow out of its ruins! The First Lord of the Treasury will then have cause to revert to his speech of 1829, to which my hon. and learned Friend, the Member for Worcester so emphatically and so impressively adverted. The admonitions of the noble Lord, the Member for Sunderland, will then be deserving of regard. These topics are perilous, but I do not fear to touch them. It is my thorough conviction, that England would be able to put down any insurrectionary movement, with her gigantic force, even although maddened and frantic Ireland might be aided by calculating France. But at what a terrible cost of treasure and of life would treason be subdued. Well might the Duke of Wellington, although familiar with fields of death, express his horror at the contemplation of civil war. War in Ireland would be worse than civil. A demon would take possession of the nation's heart—every feeling of humanity would be extinguished—neither to sex nor to age would mercy be given. The country would be deluged with blood, and when that deluge had subsided, it would be a sorry consolation to a British Statesman, when he gazed upon the spectacle of desolation which Ireland would then present to him, that he beheld the spires of your Established Church still standing secure amidst the desert with which they would be encompassed. You have adjured us, in the name of the oath which we have sworn on the Gospel of God—I adjure you, in the name of every precept contained in that holy book—in the name of that religion which is the perfection of humanity—in the name of every obligation, divine and human, as you are men and Christians, to save my country from those evils to which I point, but to avert them, and to remember, that if you shall be the means of precipitating that country into perdition, posterity will deliver its great finding against you, and that you will not only be answerable to posterity, but responsible to that Judge, in whose presence, clothed with the blood of civil warfare, it will be more than dreadful to appear. But God forbid that these evils should ever have any other existence, except in my own affrighted imaginings, and that those visions of disaster should be embodied in reality. God grant that the men to whom the destinies of England are confided by their Sovereign, may have the virtue and the wisdom to save her from those fearful ills that so darkly and so densely lower upon her. For my own part, I do not despair of my country; I do not despair of witnessing the time when Ireland will cease to be the battle-field of faction; when our mutual acrimonies will be laid aside; when our fatal antipathies will be sacrificed to the good genius of our country. Within the few days that have elapsed since my return to England, I have seen enough to convince me, that there exists amidst a large portion of the great British community, a sentiment of kindliness and of good feeling towards Ireland. I have seen proofs that Englishmen have, with a generous promptitude, if they have felt themselves wronged, forgiven the man who may have done them wrong. That if Englishmen, noble and high-minded Englishmen, do but conjecture that injustice has been done to a political antagonist, swayed by their passion for fair play, they will fly to his succour, and, with an instinct of magnanimity, enthusiastically take his part. I do trust that this exalted sentiment will be appreciated by my countrymen as it ought to be; and that it may be so appreciated, and that it may lead to a perfect national reconciliation, and that both countries, instead of being bound by a mere parchment Union—a mere legal ligament, which an event may snap—shall be morally, politically, and socially identified, is the ardent desire of one who has many faults, who is conscious of numerous imperfections, but who, whatever those imperfections may be, is not reckless of the interests of his country—is devotedly attached to his Sovereign; and, so far from wishing for a dismemberment of this majestic Empire, offers up a prayer, as fervent as ever passed from the heart to the lips of any one of you, that the greatness of that Empire may be imperishable, and that the power, and that the affluence, and that the glory, and that above all, the liberties of England may endure for ever.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

MINUTES.] BILLS. Public.—1st. Transfer of Property. PETITIONS PRESENTED. By the Bishop of Exeter, from Penrith, and 2 places, respecting Spiritual Instruction in Union Workhouses.

SPIRITUAL INSTRUCTION IN UNION WORKHOUSES.] The Bishop of Exeter presented two Petitions from Penwith and Powder, praying the House to introduce such enactments into any Bill for amending the Poor Law as shall make due provision for the Spiritual Instruction and Religious Worship of the Inmates of Union Workhouses in England. The right rev. Prelate said, these were the Petitions which he gave notice of his intention to lay on their Lordships' Table; and, having done so, he should now, with permission of the House, proceed to move for the appointment of "a Select Committee to consider the provision made, and which may require to be made, for Religious Worship and Spiritual Instruction in the Union Workhouses in England and Wales." It might in the outset be convenient for him to state, that noble Lords might not be detained by the observations with which he might deem it necessary to preface his Motion, that it was not his intention to press that Motion to a division. If Her Majesty's Government concurred with him in the necessity of appointing a Select Committee to inquire into the facts which he should bring forward, he would be prepared in that Committee, if the opportunity were given him; to prove every tittle which he might advance by the most respectable, the most irrefragable evidence. Still he did not mean to press this question to a division. It was his intention to leave the question of "Committee or no Committee" to the responsibility of Her Majesty's Government; but he should state on what grounds he thought, not that himself, but that the country, was entitled to the appointment of a Committee to inquire into matters of such grave importance. Now, for ten years past, his attention had been strongly directed towards, and excited by, the operation of the Poor Law Amendment

Act, and he had witnessed daily more and more the evil effects of that Measure; but, in no portion of it had he seen such lamentable defects as in the spiritual destitution which it entailed on large bodies of the Poor in the different Unions throughout the country. Let it be understood that he did not mean to call the attention of their Lordships to that general spiritual destitution which was said to prevail in different parts of the country. He should speak only of those deficiencies which came within his own immediate notice. The representations which had reached him on this subject came from most respectable portions of the Clergy and Laity: and his own inquiries satisfied him that their complaints were perfectly well-founded. The cases which he was about to place before the House had reference exclusively to Unions in his own diocese. The first Union to which he should advert was that of Liskeard. With respect to that Union, an hon. Gentleman, a brother to a noble Earl—a man who was dear to every one who was acquainted with his virtues—who, as he knew, represented a very ancient family—informed him that the question of the appointment of a Chaplain, had been settled very unfortunately. They had proceeded to the election of a clergyman to the office of Chaplain, but the proposition was rejected. A motion was then made to the effect that a Chaplain was necessary; and he (the informant) was very much surprised to learn afterwards, that a Dissenting Minister, who was not sent for by the inmates of the workhouse, was performing the duty. The most deplorable effect of this proceeding was, that it formed a precedent for similar irregularity elsewhere. The success of the Dissenters in this instance urged them to further exertion, and, leagued with the economists, they prevented the appointment of Chaplains throughout the different Unions of the diocese. He held in his hand a remarkable proof of the accuracy of that statement. It had reference to the Union of St. Austel's. That Union contained fifteen parishes, and a population of 31,000 persons. Here there was no Chaplain. It appeared that there was a very large room adjoining the Union-house, which was planned and erected for a chapel, but which had never been used for that purpose. Some years since a struggle was made by some of the Clergy to get a Chaplain appointed, but without success. At the same time a motion was made for admitting Dissenting Ministers, and carried,

Ever since, that room was occupied twice on a Sunday by the Wesleyans, and on alternate Tuesdays, the Union finding candles. This proceeding was decidedly in the teeth of all the regulations connected with the government of the Unions—and, nevertheless, the attempt to turn this room into a Dissenting chapel was successful. This very room, under the name of "Union-house," appeared in the Wesleyans' quarterly printed directions. They had always preachers on trial, and it would appear that the Union-house was made a training-place. Inquiry was made as to what instruction was given to the children, eighty-six in number, and by whom? The answer was, that no instruction whatsoever was given to the children, except by the schoolmaster (who was also porter) and the mistress, his wife, so that their Lordships would observe here, that the Church was actually sacrificed, and prevented from imparting instruction; and that such instruction as was given was supplied by others who were opposed to her tenets, and hostile to her ordinances. The next case was that of Bodmin; and there he found that no Chaplain was appointed. All the religious instruction that was destined for that Union was gratuitously supplied by the curate of the parish. The parish in which he lived consisted of about 4,000 persons. The curate had most kindly and charitably extended his services to the Workhouse. They had service every Sunday once, and once a week. Now that was done without licence, and indeed was in violation of the law, but in the breach of that law, in such a matter as this, he (the Bishop of Exeter) must say that he could not but honour the rev. Gentleman. The next case was that of St. Colomb, to which he begged the attention of the House. The Union of the parishes consisted of 16,000 persons. They had no religious instruction except such as could be supplied by the Clergyman of a large parish, whose time was almost entirely occupied in attending to his own duties. In that workhouse there were forty-five children, and the only religious instruction they received was that from a schoolmistress, and when prayers were read to them, they were read by the master of the workhouse. He now came to notice the case of St. Germain's in which no religious duties were performed except such as were given by the Clergyman, who had a large parish to attend to. In that workhouse there were thirty-three aged and infirm persons thus left without any religious instruction. The next case was that of Helston, in the workhouse of which gratuitous religious instruction was given by the curate. The parish where he lived consisted of 4000 inhabitants. The curate had to go five or six miles once a week to perform those duties, for which no pecuniary remuneration was afforded. The Minister of the parish had the whole of his time employed in attending to his duties, and he could not give any religious instruction. The right rev. Prelate then came to notice the case of the Union of Penzance. That Union consisted of no fewer than nineteen parishes, and the population extended to the number of 49,951 individuals. On an application for the appointment of a Chaplain to that workhouse, that application was resisted. True it was, that there was a person appointed, but he was one who had apostatised from the Church. A Clergyman of the Church living in the neighbourhood, knowing the facts of the case, undertook to do the duty, but the Board of Guardians refused. What the Board of Guardians did was contrary to the rules of the Poor-law Commissioners. For, in the first place, no Chaplain could be appointed to a workhouse who had not received the sanction of the Poor Law Commissioners, and the licence of the Bishop of the diocese was also requisite in the second place to complete it. But what did the Board of Guardians do in this instance? They elected the individual to whom he had alluded, who had apostatised from the Church. Now he (the Bishop of Exeter) begged here to be understood as bringing no charge of moral misconduct against that individual. He had been a member of the Church, he withdrew "reverend" from his name, and he appeared in public in coloured clothes. He attended the meetings of the Independent Dissenters of Penzance, and attached himself to their body. He married the daughter of a Dissenter of fortune in the place, and the children the offspring of that marriage, were all baptised in that faith. On his being appointed to act as religious instructor to the Union Workhouse no notice was given to him (the Bishop of Exeter) as Bishop of the diocese, which was required by law, but the whole facts of the case were transmitted to the Poor Law Commissioners in London, who sent an Assistant Commissioner down, and the result was that that individual was elected. The right rev. Bishop then proceeded to call the attention of their Lordships to an inquiry into a frightful tragedy which took place in the workhouse. There was in the Union Workhouse an unhappy woman who was brutally treated by the master of the workhouse, and it was determined that she should be placed in solitude and darkness. When she heard what the nature of the punishment she was destined to undergo was, she at once said that she could not endure such solitude, and if she were sent to undergo the punishment with no one to speak to she very much feared that she should lose her senses and that she should commit suicide. She was sent there, and she did destroy herself. When it was proposed to remove the master of the workhouse for his inhuman conduct, the Board of Guardians refused to dismiss him. When the proposition was made to the Board of Guardians, one gentleman, Colonel Wade, whom he (the Bishop of Exeter) named to his honour, insisted upon the man's removal, but without effect. He mentioned this with a view of insisting that the Poor Law Commissioners in London were bound to have an especial eye to the manner in which the Poor Law Act was carried out. The individual to whom he had before alluded as being elected, was still in the same situation. The rev. gentleman the vicar of the parish, who acted as an ex-officio Guardian to the Poor Law Union, told him that the Church prayers were much abridged by him; and that he administered the Baptism in the workhouse on all occasions when births took place there without considering whether it was necessary that there should be private Baptisms, and also without making any registry in the parish. The rule was, to consider the children always in danger, and to have them privately Baptized by the Chaplain a few hours after birth. The Lord's Supper was administered by this individual contrary to all law and authority four times a year in the chapel. So much for Penzance. He now must draw attention to another Union—that of Redruth. This would not present the horrors of the last case, but there were here carried on irregularities of the most startling kind, and irregularities of which the Commissioners in London were cognizant from the Reports of the Assistant Commissioners. The Union of Redruth contained only eight parishes, with a population of 48,987 persons, and there was no doubt at this time the population was 50,000 persons, and was increasing annually. There was a Chaplain there, but how was he appointed? Why, it seemed that there, too, the Dissenters, encouraged by the success of the Dissenters at Liskeard, had made exertions and passed resolutions that the Clergyman who was to perform the duty which the law required of him, should only perform service once on each Sunday, and that the Methodist teachers should perform the other service in the Chapel of the Union. It was with great difficulty that the appointment of a Chaplain could be obtained, and when it was obtained the Assistant Commissioner had entreated them to give some salary, if only a nominal one; and he proposed that 1*l.* a year should be given, which would satisfy the letter of the law. At the same time the Guardians pressed upon the Commissioners the necessity of having these Methodist meetings in the Chapel on Sunday to go hand in hand with the Church Service; and upon the whole, the Assistant Commissioner had thought it better to submit to it. Sometime afterwards the same Assistant Commissioner, thinking the salary of 1*l.* a year somewhat small, had entreated the Guardians to give 30*l.* a year; this was agreed to, and the ex officio Guardians and some wealthy individuals had made a subscription also, to the amount of 60*l.* a year; making in all 90*l.* a year as the remuneration for the Chaplain. But in this case no Clergyman of the neighbourhood would undertake the office. And for two years the parish had been using every effort, by advertising, to obtain a Chaplain, but, from the extent of the duties to be performed, and the smallness of the remuneration, no chaplain could be obtained; and the office was filled, after a manner, by a stranger to the diocese, who happened to be in the neighbourhood, and who, he rejoiced had, been permitted most irregularly to perform Service in this Church. In this Union-house there were no fewer than 306 inmates, about 150 being children. These persons being concentrated from a large Parish, imposed a heavier duty on a Minister than attendance to a Parish of 306 inhabitants. Almost every individual must occupy a large portion of his time, if he did his duty. It was therefore really impossible, unless the whole time of one Clergyman were given to the duty, that the office could be effectually fulfilled. There was no means of giving education to the children except by means of the schoolmaster of the house, and he need not state what kind of education that was. There were other places in the County of Cornwall where there was similar remissness;

but, without going into all these cases, he would only say that there was not an Union Workhouse where there was available provision in this respect, even in the eyes of the greatest defenders of this law. In Devonshire the first Union he would notice was that of Axminster. A Gentleman who had recently filled the office of Chaplain there had informed him that on the whole the religious services of the Church were satisfactorily performed there, and were most gratefully received by the poor. He had entreated the Board of Guardians to permit one of the rooms of the workhouse to be set apart solely for religious worship, and had obtained this boon. In the great majority of places the dining-hall was made the only place for religious service. The poor people were most grateful at having this room granted to them, which they called the chapel, and had been delighted at the idea of having a place which bore some resemblance to the House of God. He mentioned this because it was a duty of their Lordships to take care, in the Bill to be brought before them, that a part of every workhouse should be set apart solely for religious worship. He was not asking their Lordships to run into any great expense for erecting fine Chapels, but he implored them to take care that in each workhouse some room should be set apart for the purpose, free from all the degrading exhibitions which must take place in the dining-hall. From Axminster he would proceed to Kingsbridge. There the appointment of a Chaplain had been insisted upon. The Chaplain, however, soon after his appointment, was obliged to resign his office, and then the Board of Guardians had thought fit to try the patience of the Commissioners and to refuse to appoint another. Remonstrances had been made by the ex-officio Guardians, and by a large portion of the inhabitants, who had implored the Commissioners to insist on the appointment. The Commissioners had sent down word to the Board of Guardians that unless they made the appointment they should be compelled to do so by a mandamus. The Board of Guardians had disregarded this threat, and the consequence was, that the remonstrances had become more and more urgent. A correspondence had taken place on the subject, and the Guardians had given an assurance no less than six different times that the question should be taken into their consideration, and the case rested now where it was, notwithstanding what had been stated by the Commissioners. He was bound in justice to state that the Guardians entreated the Commissioners to wait until a Chancery Suit in which the rector was engaged had terminated, as they thought of appointing him the Chaplain. This state of things had gone on for two years. He lamented that owing to the absence of the Earl of Devon he should not have the benefit of his advocacy on this question. The Clergyman of the Parish, who had two charges on his hands, and a cure of 2,000 souls, had felt himself compelled to undertake, not the performance of the duties of chaplain, but to give what assistance was in his power. Whilst a Chaplain had been appointed divine service had been performed in a kind of pulpit placed against one of the walls of a room in which the people took their meals, and in which the Dissenting Ministers of all denominations alternately preached on Friday evenings. There were 266 paupers in this Union, 115 of whom were children under fifteen years of age, who had no religious instruction whatever. The visitors' book of the Union House contained entries such as "The Rev. — to preach the gospel of Christ and to visit the sick." All this was in the very teeth of the regulations of the Commissioners and of the provisions of the Act of Parliament. He now proceeded to the Union of Oakhampton, and from the Minister of that Parish he had that day received a statement of the condition of things there :—

"The average number of paupers in the house is about 140, children and adults being of nearly equal proportions. The paupers were formerly allowed to attend the parish church on Sunday, but for the last two years have been unable in consequence of the destruction of the church by fire, and the present place of worship not being sufficiently large to receive them with the rest of the congregation. Those who apply to the Board of Guardians have leave granted them to attend divine service on Wednesday evening, and I am happy to say many avail themselves of this privilege. The Guardians have hitherto always refused to appoint a salaried Chaplain, and a motion which Mr. Woolcombe, a Magistrate and ex-officio Guardian, twice brought forward for the appointment of a Chaplain, with the consent of the legal authorities, to be paid by himself for one year, met with a similar result. A number of most ignorant human beings are, therefore, congregated together without any spiritual superintendence, and the Governor of the Workhouse assures me how disgraceful is their behaviour, and how unpleasant his position in consequence. Most of the children born in the house are illegitimate; they are never brought to the church to be baptised, some of the parents appearing totally indifferent about the matter, and I have no power to perform the sacrament of baptism in the Workhouse, unless in cases of dangerous illness. This I have always expressed myself as ready to do when required; several children however having lately died unbaptized, and having been buried in consequence without any service performed over them; (this I know has occurred two or three times within the last six weeks in the parish of North Tawton alone), I feel it my painful duty, acting with the advice of some of my brother Clergy, to call your Lordship's attention to the degraded state of our Union Workhouse, in the hope that something in the way of improvement may be effected."

He would not weaken the effect of this plain statement. But one result could ensue from this tremendous fact. That was not a place, though it was an occasion, in which he ought to enlarge upon the inestimable blessing of baptism; but he could not help believing that there was a tremendous responsibility attached to the hazarding of their eternal salvation by the non-baptism of infants. But most tremendous was the responsibility of those who had permitted such a state of things, and who had put to hazard the eternal salvation of these children. In the Union of Tavistock, which was the next case he had to submit to their Lordships, there had not been one sixpence given by the Board of Guardians to supply the place of Chaplain, and in consequence they permitted the curate of that parish of 1,000 souls, when exhausted by two services in the Church, to give one service at the workhouse. All this was in direct contradiction to the mandates of the Somerset House Commissioners. He now came to Tiverton, and regarding that place it so happened that he had received a letter that morning. There was a chapel there, and the poor inmates had been permitted to attend church once a day on Sunday. But something was to be done in this chapel, and therefore, in the afternoon, service was to be performed there;—by whom? By the master of the workhouse, who went into the chapel, and there enacted the part of Clergyman. It appeared that in consequence of his having given notice of this Motion before their Lordships, the Board of Guardians of this place had taken alarm, and had had a meeting, and passed a resolution, which had been sent to him with breathless haste—what did their Lordships think to do?—to appoint a chaplain? No, but to permit the poor to go to the church twice on a Sunday. These were cases which had occurred in his own diocese, and these cases were of a kind in which he should confidently rely on the consequences of the Motion which he now made. He contended that the whole of these cases were of such a kind that, if true, it would be absolutely necessary that the Poor Law Commissioners should be called on to explain to the country how they had dared to neglect, or rather to abuse their trust. When he moved for this Committee, he was ready to prove everything which he had brought forward. He thought it was due in justice to these Commissioners themselves, that they should have the opportunity which he was ready to give them of disproving his statements. Since the notice of his Motion, he had received several letters on the subject—one from York, and this opened an important case, because it had shown what had been the main stirring principle which had prevented the appointment of Chaplains in the north of England. The Union of York contained seventy-nine parishes, and a population, according to the census of 1831, of 900,000 souls. In August of last year, a Motion had been made before the Board of Guardians there, to appoint a Chaplain. That Motion had been successfully opposed. On what grounds? Why, almost entirely on the ground of pounds, shillings, and pence. They would not incur the expense of having a Chaplain. He appealed to the noble Lord near him (Lord Wharnccliffe) if that were not the motive which prevailed in refusing to appoint a Chaplain to the York Union? [Lord Wharnccliffe: Yes, it is.] He said, it was the expense which prevented the appointment of Chaplains to Unions in the North of England. [Lord Wharnccliffe expressed his dissent.] He was aware that in the neighbourhood in which the noble Lord lived, no such motive could be imputed to the Board of Guardians. A petition was sent to the Commissioners, and the Commissioners returned expressions of regret that such a state of things should exist. The question was brought forward again in December, and then they were told with a jeer that the Commissioners in London had been informed of the circumstance—that they (the Board of Guardians) had expected a mandamus before this, but that the Commissioners had contented themselves with merely saying they regretted what had been done; and so the Board ridiculed the notion of appointing a Chaplain, and thus the friends of religion were again disappointed in their hopes. He should now call their Lordships' attention to the state of another Union, and that a very important Union in the county of Lancaster. In that Union there were twenty-nine parishes, and those parishes contained a population of 59,000 persons, the Workhouses being four in number. The paupers in the Union Workhouse at Preston amounted usually to 491 persons. It appeared that no Chaplain was paid for attending to the spiritual wants of this large amount of inmates, and this fact he was enabled to state upon the authority of one who was himself an ex officio Guardian. He stated, that in all there were 718 inmates in the four Workhouses of the Preston Union, that about two-thirds of them were Members of the Church of England, 139 were children within the age of education, that there was no full service on the Sunday, that the Clergy of the town attended voluntarily, and that they were not able to perform full service on more than one day in the week, and, whether instructions or spiritual comfort were regarded, it must be admitted that the common gaol was preferable. There was no moral control, no inspection, no superintendence. That was the state of things in the Preston Union, a place where, whether the morals, health, education, or religion of the inmates were considered, were less preferable than the prison. At Stockport, they said that they wanted no parson, as they had assistance from the Dissenters for nothing. In the York Union, since September, 1840, there had died in the Workhouse fifty-two persons, of whom fifty were Protestants, principally members of the Established Church, and not one of those persons was afforded the opportunity of receiving the Sacrament from the time of admission into the house till their death. But the case of Macclesfield was much worse than that at Preston—there matters were of a still more painful character. At Macclesfield, in the adjoining county of Chester, the curate had been obliged to make efforts for the instruction of the poor which were quite beyond his strength, and when he quitted the workhouse the aged paupers expressed the deepest regret. Since he left, another clergyman had taken up the case. From that Gentleman's letter, received this morning, which was a document of some length, it appeared that he was usher at the free-grammar-school at Macclesfield, and that he was accustomed to give a portion of the small quantity of leisure that he enjoyed to the duty of affording religious instruction to the inmates of the workhouse. He hoped that their Lordships would allow him to read, if not the whole, a considerable portion of the letter with which he had been favoured by this Gentleman:—

"I have the honour to lay before your Lordship the following facts,—1. As to the Union Workhouse: the number of its inmates has sometimes reached 300, but at present it is slightly under 200, and I think I am correct in saying, that during the last seven months, the number has varied from about 240 to 170. Of these, the adults would certainly average more than 150 and the great majority would, if asked, either profess themselves members of our Church, acknowledge that they had gone to no place of worship, or, what is as common, 'to all sorts.' For these there is no religious instruction or ministerial superintendence whatever, provided by the Guardians. The natural results are, that the very little religion which does, or at all events which till lately did exist, is either entirely Sectarian, or savouring strongly of Schism. The state of moral depravity and religious destitution is frightful, and the utter shamelessness and moral degradation which prevails among the young women in particular are quite appalling. From the construction of the house—an old factory converted into a Workhouse—anything like classification, is impossible, and a moderately modest woman (unless indeed, she should have the good fortune to be sufficiently ill to secure her a place in one of the sick-wards, where it is practicable to enforce stricter discipline) would, after a stay of some weeks in the house, it is my firm conviction, go out, almost infallibly, a hopeless prostitute. The language which sometimes has met my ear has been most dreadful, and the Governor, who is anxious to do his duty, I believe, to God as well as to man, laments the state of things; but, until the removal of the paupers to the house, which is being built for them, he sees no prospect of amendment. In August last, I found that, excepting very rare visits of one clergyman, no one (save some Methodists on Sunday) went near the sick and dying; and at the time to which I allude, I found two or three persons actually dying, without any care having been taken to warn, to instruct, or to comfort them. The paupers have frequently themselves complained of the way in which they had been neglected. An old woman one day said to me, 'Why, Sir, no one has been near us since Mr. — was obliged to give up, and here we are, a parcel of old blind creatures, hard at death's door, and no one seems to think of us, or to care whether we go to heaven or hell.' And oh, my Lord, she spoke the sad, the shameful truth! When I said that no religious instruction was afforded by the Guardians I ought to have mentioned, that they did give permission to the Wesleyan Methodist body to have two regular services on Friday and Sundays, and to hold prayer meetings; which is still continued to them, though I am in a manner acknowledged by the same body. I grieve to say, that this 'religious instruction' has done more harm than can easily be imagined. The poor creatures, from confinement and other causes, are easily wrought upon, and in several instances, in one most melancholy one, my endeavours to bring about anything like a wholesome religious feeling, as far as by the Lord's blessing I might be enabled so to do, have been entirely, and most mischievously baffled. I could, did I not fear lest I should swell this letter into a volume, supply your Lordship with many instances of the wretched state of things among those (both men and women) who are not ill enough to find an asylum in the sick-wards. The Governor's constant complaint is, that the young men and women, having nothing to do, and there being no means of instructing them, are running wild, and always in mischief. One case I will give. A young woman who had been seduced in a very shocking and disgraceful manner, came to the house; of course, she had a place assigned her among the common herd; fortunately she became very ill, and was for long confined to one of the sick-wards. She seemed for a time exceedingly penitent, and I really believe that she sorrowed after a godly sort. She told me, that she was very thankful that she had been brought into that ward, and that she felt how good the Lord had been in his dealings with her, for had she stayed in the room she had previously occupied, she should have been driven distracted. She said, I could have no notion 'how bad they were.' And yet for the reformation of these persons, not one step has been taken, excepting the efforts which I have been able to make, in aid of which I receive no kind of encouragement, nothing but the same permission given to the Dissenters, not even a grant for books. First, as to the children. The children are taught by a pauper school master occasionally in the evenings, and at intervals. On Sunday they have, till last Sunday, gone to the Sunday-school, in connexion with the parish Church. Now, this will no longer be the case, the master, whose business it was to go with them to Church and bring them back, having but little authority over them; and the Governor, being unable to find a pauper whom he can trust, has to-day told me, that he has found it necessary to put an end to their going out of the walls on Sunday, and we have just been trying to organize something like a plan for a Sunday School in the house. Whom we are to procure to teach the poor children, I have yet to ascertain. The last pauper school-master, who also acted as my clerk, was dismissed for being in a state of intoxication during divine service, about six weeks ago. He was in the habit of availing himself of his privilege of going out with the children, to procure intoxicating liquors, and this resulted in a disgraceful exhibition. This person can, moreover, read but indifferently, and writing is an accomplishment which he possesses in the smallest possible degree. As to my own connexion with the Workhouse, it is voluntary; and when my services were first tendered, the acceptance of them was by some of the Guardians opposed, on the ground, that to interfere with the Methodist would be unhandsome treatment. However, it was at last decided, that the Methodists should either have their service in another room at the same time as that which I had fixed on for the performance of divine service, or should fix upon some other hour; and I, on my part, was not to interfere with their Friday evening service, as at first I proposed to do. I have for the last six months (with the exception of an interval for my Christmas holidays, when I arranged with my clerical friends to take the Sunday services for me) performed divine service (as far as a deacon can) regularly on Wednesday and on Sunday evenings. I can only give them evening service, because in the week I am engaged as one of the masters of the grammar school, and on Sunday I have two services in the little church of which I am minister. The sick-wards I visit after school hours every evening in the week, excepting generally Munday, on which evening I rest, and Saturday, which I spend in my little district at B—, three miles and a half from this place. I have procured the assistance of clerical friends in Priests' orders to administer the holy eucharist to the sick several times; on one occasion to as many as six of the old and infirm, with whom I took some pains previously. Indeed, I have always taken care to employ all possible caution before I admitted any of the paupers into the number of those who were permitted to receive that holy mystery. I have also formed plans for the improvement of the young men and women, but I fear that I lack bodily strength to carry them out; and, after all, my Lord, what can I do among so many? I have but little leisure, and the people are perishing for lack of knowledge. I can, indeed, visit the sick, and have without intermission done so since August, excepting during the short interval to which I before alluded; but, oh! how seldom is it that the most unremitted attention on the dying pauper avails anything! In nine cases out of ten when they become confined to their beds, it is too late. I fear that I shall have wearied your Lordship with this long history, and I will only further say on this head, that a more wretched instance of negligence, and consequent spiritual destitution, than is presented in this miserable Workhouse, cannot well be imagined. I think it also exceedingly doubtful whether the guardians have any immediate notion of appointing a chaplin; in fact, I fear that many avail themselves of my gratuitous services to delay taking any steps towards this most desirable object."

He had been requested by the Gentleman from whom this letter came to refrain from mentioning the names of places or of parties, and he should readily comply with this request, if his not doing so could in any respect prove injurious or dangerous to the good and single-minded man from whom that letter proceeded. He then went on to say:—

"I am about to make an appeal to the guardians to entreat them to bestir themselves, and to inform them that I doubt whether my health will permit me to continue my present labours, and to work out my plans for improving the condition of the adults for many months; and were they to feel that their flagrant conduct had been exposed through my instrumentality, I should have no chance of carrying my objects, and it is possible that the Dissenting guardians would make my supposed treason an imaginary ground for renewing their opposition to the appointment of a chaplain."

This single-minded man, only desirous to do good, had begged him (the Bishop of Exeter) not to mention his name; and for this reason, because he was about to make another appeal to the guardians, from fear that his health would not much longer permit him to work out a plan he had conceived for the improvement and instruction of the poor—and because it was not impossible that the dissenting guardians might make his leaving a ground for refusing to appoint a Chaplain. He had been assured that the author of this letter was a man of the most incorruptible integrity, and that his lightest assertion was as worthy of credence as the solemn declaration of the most honourable of men. That Gentleman was a man who could have nothing to fear from the displeasure of the guardians; he might defy the guardians, or any other authorities connected with the Administration of the Poor-law. He had nothing to apprehend, and no man could doubt that the Poor-law Commissioners would feel it impossible any longer to refrain, after the present exposure, from sending down a peremptory order for the appointment of a chaplain. He could hardly bring himself to suppose that that order would not be immediately issued and attended to. If not, he (the Bishop of Exeter) should feel it his duty to propose to their Lordships that a humble address be presented to Her Majesty praying for the removal of the officers, whose duty it was to make provision for the instruction of the poor. He was not vain enough to suppose because he brought forward such a Motion that it would be obeyed, but if they placed any faith in the statements which had been made, he was satisfied that the noble Lords would feel anxious to carry to the Throne their united expressions of indignation against those who would thus dare to palter with the high office conferred upon them. Would their Lordships endure to hear it said by the guardians, that the poor needed no assistance of that kind except what the Dissenters afforded them; and that they were able to have that without any expence? It was clear, then, expence formed the real impediment in this case. The trifling amount of the pounds, shillings, and pence was the difficulty. Happily, the state of the poor was not the same in all parts of the country. Religious instruction was best provided for in the places where the Unions were first formed. There were in all 587 Unions, of which seventy-one had no Workhouses. To 414 there were Chaplains, thirty of whom had no salary. There were 102 which had no Chaplains; and if Liverpool, London, Manchester, and one or two other places were excepted, it would be found that the average salary enjoyed by those Chaplains did not exceed 37*l.* per annum. Liverpool, Manchester, and London, had done as became them. In Liverpool the payment to the Chaplain was 250*l.*; in Manchester 200*l.*; and in London, where they had more than one Chaplain, the gross payment to them all was 400*l.* He would just ask the House to look how the distribution of Chaplains took place in the country. Here was a statement of the different counties:—The county of Rutland pays in salaries to the Chaplains of its two Union Workhouses 75*l.*, nearly double what is paid to Chaplains by the united counties of Durham, Northumberland, and Westmoreland, and half as much again as those three counties and the North Riding of Yorkshire united; the county of Huntingdon pays to its three chaplains 150*l.*, exceeding all that is paid by Cumberland, Durham, Northumberland, and Westmoreland, and the North Riding of Yorkshire: the county of Hereford pays 255*l.*, a sum exactly equal to what is paid by all the three Ridings of Yorkshire, Durham and Westmoreland: the counties of Bedford, of Herts, of Bucks, every of these pay more than the three counties united: the county of Cambridge pays 300*l.*, a sum larger than by all Yorkshire, Durham, Westmoreland, and

Northumberland: the county of Dorset pays 380*l.*, a sum exceeding all that is paid by Cumberland, Durham, Northumberland, Westmoreland, and the three ridings of Yorkshire (in all 376*l.*); the county of Berks pays 580*l.*, a sum much more than double of all that is paid by Yorkshire, Durham, and Westmoreland, and much more than half as much again as is paid by all those five northern counties; the county of Cornwall bears a very discreditable rank in comparison with every other of the southern counties. Upon these and other details he rested his claim to the vote of their Lordships in favour of his Motion. The Poor Law Commissioners, he was bound to say—and he said it with pleasure—were most frank, open, and ready to communicate all they knew, even when they were aware that the declared object of the inquiry was to form a case against themselves. He said this in their praise. Nothing could be more frank and obliging than the behaviour (more particularly of one gentleman) of the Poor Law Commissioners when he applied to them for information. He might go so far as to say these gentlemen admitted that the “moral case” was a very strong one. They were honourable, and good, and charitable, and religious men; and having these, or any one of these qualities, they could not deny there was, morally speaking, a strong case. “But then,” said they, “there are the Dissenters combined with economy.” There might be some feelings of sectarianism in the matter, but the great point—the point which had the greatest weight—was the dread of paying 6*d.* additional for this necessary and indispensable purpose. On the question of economy he hoped their Lordships would say that the question must not be allowed to rest. He did not think it possible that the noble Lord near him—should he take the trouble to reply to the observations directed to the House—would attempt to resist his defence of the Commissioners, and his resistance to the Motion, on this petty, mercenary consideration. It was an absolute injustice to deal with the question in this manner. It was the duty of Government to stand its ground and reprobate so sordid a principle. What, then, could it be rested upon? It was in the recollection of their Lordships what had taken place last year—the tumultuous proceedings and the bickerings which had disturbed the peace and tranquillity of the country during the last Session of Parliament. He could not do the noble Lords near him the injustice of supposing that they would yield to prejudices of any kind against the interests of the poor man; but he had been induced to consider all the reasons for which this Motion could be resisted, and this had suggested itself. But the question of last year was, whether a certain measure, which was not the law of the land, should become the law of the land; and the Dissenters had raised so serious a resistance to it, that the Government had thought fit to give way, and not to pass that law. Was that the case now? No; the law was in their favour, and the law must not be disregarded in deference to the assertions of those whom, he was sure in his heart, the noble Lord could not respect. The present state of things was in direct opposition to the law, for by the Poor Law Act, the Commissioners were not merely empowered, they were bound to appoint, it was their duty to appoint, Chaplains to every Union Workhouse; they had themselves admitted that the Chaplain was an indispensable officer in every Union, and in their letter of instructions, they had told their Assistant Commissioners on no account to give way upon this point. And it would be extraordinary indeed, if it were otherwise, for he would remind their Lordships, how the law stood with respect to other unhappy men. If these poor people were the tenants of a prison instead of a Union Workhouse, they would be sure of the services of a most pious, able, and indefatigable clergyman, one who would receive such remuneration as would entitle them to require that his whole time should be devoted to their service. By the Gaol Act, where there were fifty prisoners, the Chaplain received 100*l.* Where there were 100 and not more, 200*l.* Where more than 100, not more than 250*l.* per annum. Such was the rate at which the Legislature provided for the remuneration of those who had the spiritual charge of the inmates of a prison. Now, suppose that instead of being felons they were lunatics. Then also, in their lucid intervals, they would receive by law the consolations and assistance of a paid Chaplain. But did it rest there? No, for if they were Irish paupers it was peremptorily enjoined by the Irish Poor Law that there should be a Chaplain for the inmates of every workhouse. It was only in England for want of a direct expression in the Act, though it was implied in it, that any poor-house could be without the services of an authorised and paid Chaplain. He would, therefore, ask their Lordships whether it were possible, with all these analogies in support of his claim, for the Poor Law Commissioners to satisfy Parliament or the country that it was even decent any longer to refuse to appoint Chaplains to our Union Workhouses. With respect to the Dissenters, he believed it was well known, that however strong they might be at Boards of Guardians, they were not strong in number in the workhouses themselves—that there the great majority were those who professed, at least, to be members of the Established Church, or who unhappily, from the destitution in which they lived, were members of no church or religious denomination at all. He admitted that he felt strongly for the gentlemen who held the office of Poor Law Commissioners. They had much to encounter, and so had their predecessors in office. They had much obloquy thrown upon them—some, he must fairly say, deserved obloquy, and much that was otherwise. He could, therefore, understand that they had some little disposition to yield to the pressure of these wretched guardians, lauded on by the Dissenters, and threatening opposition to them when they proposed, in this respect, to perform their duty. He felt, therefore, that they wanted some assistance, and that they sought for it that night from their Lordships' House. Nothing could help them so importantly as an intimation of opinion by that House that they would be right in performing what the law required, and what they must feel to be their first duty as men and as Christians. He asked their Lordships, therefore, to give them their support, by giving him a Committee to inquire into this important subject. In respect of all the particulars he had mentioned, although they ought to have cognizance of them from the reports of their Assistant Commissioners, and therefore nothing that he had stated would come upon them for the first time, yet, now that the case was made known to their Lordships, and through their Lordships to the country, there would be no excuse for them if they did not instantly enforce the discharge of this duty. If they would send forth their orders, there was no doubt but that they would be obeyed directly. But, at all events, if it were important to obtain a mandamus, every one of these counties—even Northumberland itself, once a kingdom—would fall prostrate before the majesty of the law. And why was not the law put in force in this great county? He appealed to the noble Lord (Lord Wharncliffe), one of its most distinguished ornaments, whether that great county, which it had been his honour once to represent, and which was so highly honoured by his representing them, would any longer endure the disgrace and infamy (for such it was) of granting only such a miserable pittance for the subsistence of the souls of all their paupers? But in connection with the question of expense, there was one painful matter which remained to be spoken of. The Commissioners had thought fit to prescribe the duties of Chaplains, and to put those duties on the lowest possible scale on purpose to get Chaplains cheap. It was not denied that this was their reason. They required but one sermon on Sundays, in the hope of finding a neighbouring clergyman able to perform the duty, for a small remuneration, in addition to his own duties. He was required to read prayers and to preach a sermon to the paupers on Sundays, unless the Guardians, with the consent of the Commissioners, directed otherwise. He was also to read prayers to them—not to preach—every Good Friday and Christmas-day. Next, to examine the children, and to catechise such as belonged to the Established Church. How often? At least once in every month. Could these Commissioners seriously imagine that examination and catechising once a month was sufficient food for the souls, as well as minds, of these young paupers? If they would consult the Rubric, that would teach them that it was the duty of Chaplains, and, under them, of the schoolmasters, to make children the constant objects of their care. Lastly, the Commissioners required that he was to visit sick paupers and to administer religious consolation to them in the workhouse. How often? When applied to for that purpose by the master or matron. They were not to make these paupers the objects of their spiritual care. It was not to be their duty, as of the incumbents of parishes, to be the spiritual instructors, monitors, and guides of the inmates of workhouses, and to make themselves acquainted with their state and the periods when they required their ministrations. No; but to save expense, their sacred and important duties were to be neglected or performed only in the inefficient manner stated. It was mortifying to be obliged to enter into these sordid considerations, but when they were dwelt on by the Commissioners themselves, he could not forbear reminding their Lordships what would be the expense incurred by appointing a Chaplain to every Union Workhouse in England, with a salary of 100*l.* per annum. There were in all about 600 Unions, and therefore to appoint a Chaplain to each, with a salary of 100*l.* per annum, would amount to between 50,000*l.* and 60,000*l.* Now, what was the annual value of the property rated to the poor? At least 60,000,000*l.* The rental of England and Wales was not less than 32,000,000*l.* many years ago, and it appeared, by a table published by the Commissioners themselves, that rent bore proportion to the other valuable property of the country, as 52 to 48. Therefore, the whole rateable property of England would not be less than 60,000,000*l.* Now, as a question merely of economy, what was the charge of 60,000*l.* a-year on property of 60,000,000*l.*? It was as 1*l.* in 1,000*l.* And what was the proportion of 1*l.* in 1,000*l.*? Something less than one farthing. It therefore, appeared, as plainly as figures could make it, that these sordid Guardians, for a sum so insignificant as a farthing in the pound, were willing not only to act differently to other Guardians, but to sacrifice all the best interests, eternal as well as temporal, of all these paupers. This view of the question was shocking as well as degrading, and he had endeavoured in vain to conjecture what argument could be urged against him. He sincerely rejoiced, however, that there was now a prospect of something being done for the children in workhouses. It appeared that the Government had introduced a provision in their Poor Law Bill for providing for them District Schools. He rejoiced at it, and he hoped that England would soon be studded with institutions similar to the school at Norwood, which he believed was the greatest blessing ever bestowed on the poor people of this country. He was also thankful for it, for it would remove an evil which had been felt for many years without any attempt to provide a remedy. Four or five years ago the Assistant Commissioners warned the Chief Commissioners of the horrible state of schools in Workhouses. Mr. Tuffnell said—

“By far the worst evil to be apprehended from the present system arises from the danger of sending forth into the world a set of beings, vicious in habit and pauperised in feeling, to be future burthens on the parochial rate, or candidates for the gaols and hulks. If there be any truth in the maxim, ‘As is the master so is the school,’ there must assuredly, be in many Workhouses little chance of the children ever becoming high-minded and respectable members of society. There is no class of officers of whom such continual complaints are made, or for whose dismissal you have been called upon to issue so many orders. I need not call to your recollection the numbers you have been obliged to discharge for drunkenness or other immoralities. I have reason to believe great cruelties are practised, at times, on the children, which, probably do not come to light, as a schoolmaster has no difficulty in awing an unhappy orphan, who, probably has not a friend in the world, into silence, and suppressing the complaint. In one case a child was beaten so severely, that had not the punishment been stopped by the fortunate entry of the Governor into the apartment, death would probably have ensued. In another, the schoolmaster was in the habit of tying up with a handkerchief the jaws of those boys whom he thought deserving of punishment, to prevent their screams being heard, and then beating them in the most savage manner. The persons who were guilty of these cruelties had been village schoolmasters, where they could not have practised such conduct, as a child so treated would immediately have complained to its parents, and would have been taken away from the school, which would quickly have shown the master, from policy, if not from charity, the necessity of mildness in future. But where is a poor friendless orphan or foundling (for of these classes a great proportion of the workhouse children consist) to turn for assistance when it knows no one on whom it can place confidence, or to whom it can utter complaints? Hence, it seems incumbent upon us, for humanity’s sake, to be doubly cautious whom we select as schoolmasters for children thus situated, that is whom we make rulers of these little worlds, lest we introduce a tyrannical despot rather than a father.”

The following is extracted from a letter I received from a Chaplain to an Union Workhouse:—

“The evidence I produced against that man (the schoolmaster) was quite disgusting in its nature. I now have a schoolmaster and mistress of good principles. Their faithful discharge of duty has enabled me to exclude a man who, when schoolmaster, at least endeavoured to seduce several of the elder girls in the school.”

Here was a striking illustration of the necessity of having Chaplains. The Chaplain was always regarded as a friend in the poor-house—to him always were brought their complaints—they had no feelings of horror towards him, but regarded him as the Minister of charity and peace. “Friend of the wretch whom every friend forsakes,” he entered the workhouse only conferring blessings, and receiving them from those whom he relieved. The Chaplain was always considered by the poor as their best friend, and for that reason, as well as many others, it was the duty of the Commissioners to take care that they did not withhold from them that invaluable officer. One of the Commissioners himself bore this testimony, "Very frequently the presence of the Chaplain, both on Sundays and other days, is mainly instrumental in establishing a tone of religious feeling and principle which is highly satisfactory." He was afraid that he had now trespassed too long on the attention of the House, but he hoped what he had said would not be altogether useless. He thought it impossible for the details he had brought forward not to make a deep impression, though he had not sought to heighten it by resorting to any rhetorical artifice. Having made his plain statement he would leave the question in the hands of Her Majesty's Ministers. If they would grant him the Committee he would thank them—if they would not grant it, but would say that such a case had been made out, or offered to be made out as would induce them to require the Commissioners to do their duty, he would also thank them. If they would do neither the one nor the other—if they would not let him prove his case, he would yet have proof, for their refusal to let him go into proof must be as convincing as any proof he could possibly have. He was not afraid to say that he thought a most grave responsibility rested on Her Majesty's Government respecting the question now before them. If they attempted to put it down by the strong hand of power that responsibility would be great indeed. There was no man in that House or in the country, who had a higher respect for those noble and right hon. persons than he had. As an Englishman he thanked them for undertaking, as he verily believed in the instance of almost every man amongst them, most reluctantly as far as self was concerned, the responsibility and cares of Government. He gave them praise, he gave them thanks for it. He honoured them also, for the good measures which, under God's blessing, had been the instruments of producing a degree of prosperity long unknown to this country. They had been successful in terminating our disputes in the western hemisphere, they had extended our dominion in the East, they had pacified England, they had vindicated the law elsewhere, they had restored the finances, they had done more in the short period in which they had held office than any Ministers who were ever before placed at the head of the Councils of this country. But while they had done all this—while he honoured them for it, and while they received for it the gratitude of the whole country—he must yet tell them this, that if they refused to do justice to the wretched inmates of our Workhouses, their glory would be darkened, their fame would be impaired; and though the 19th century would honour them for what they had done, it would also do them justice for what they had refused to do. The right Rev. Prelate concluded by moving—"That a Select Committee be appointed to consider the provision made, and which may require to be made, for religious worship and spiritual instruction in the Union Workhouses in England and Wales."

Lord Wharnccliffe: I am sure that your Lordships will not expect that I should go at length into the details which are contained in the very able speech of the right rev. Prelate. In the first place, I should be unable to do that, because I am not acquainted with the facts to which he has referred. At the same time, although I confess that he has made out a very strong case with respect to the non-appointment of Chaplains in some parts of the country, yet he has not, in my opinion, succeeded in affixing to the Poor Law Commissioners so much blame as he supposed. I wish to call his attention, in the first instance, to what the law is under which the Commissioners are to act in this matter. It is not clear, that when that Act passed, there was any intention on the part of the Legislature to give the Commissioners power to enforce the appointment of Chaplains. There is nothing in the terms of the Act, that in point of fact, gives that power to the Commissioners; and it is only by a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench since the passing of the Act that the power of appointing Chaplains is created at all. Under these circumstances the Guardians are bound to exercise this power, which was incidentally given to them by the law, with considerable discretion. With respect to the Guardians I agree with a great deal of what the right rev. Prelate has said, and think that, in many cases, they have no excuse whatever for not having appointed chaplains, and a great deal less excuse for not fixing an adequate salary to the office when the appointment has been made. We must take mankind as they are, and it is not easy to persuade some people against their pecuniary interests—it is not easy to persuade them that they should open their pockets for purposes of which they do not themselves see the direct necessity. The right rev. Prelate says, and most truly, that upon these occasions the ex officio Guardians are generally quite ready to do their duty: but the other Guardians are persons taken from a class who are apt to consider those demands upon them a mulct; and it is with the greatest difficulty, therefore, that the ex officio Guardians, and those who are likely to press these matters upon the attention of the Board, can get them to consent to such appointments. I hope the right rev. Prelate will not think that I consider the Guardians right in so doing. It is their duty to appoint a Chaplain, with a proper salary; but I say that, taking the Boards of Guardians generally, they are persons who are not satisfied that they ought to incur any expense of which they do not perceive the necessity. There is another motive which operates in the particular part of the Kingdom to which the right rev. Prelate has referred—I mean the North of England—and it is this:—that in many of the towns the Boards of Guardians are composed principally of Dissenters, and among them there does exist the utmost indisposition to appoint Chaplains of the Established Church. In dealing with those persons I think it requires the greatest discretion on the part of the Poor Law Commissioners; and I think I can show that this discretion has been exercised by the Commissioners in such a way, that if time be allowed and no violent steps be taken against them—by mandamus, for instance—all the Unions, or all with very few exceptions, will have appointed Chaplains with adequate salaries. The Commissioners have thought it best not to proceed by means of the law to enforce the appointment of Chaplains by the Guardians, but rather to persuade the Guardians to point out to them the necessity, and to impress upon them that it is their duty. Their endeavours have already been successful to a great degree according to the statement of the right rev. Prelate, who says, most truly, that out of nearly 600 Unions, which have Workhouses fit for Chaplains, there are but 102 without Chaplains. In 1840 there were 206 Unions without Chaplains, so that that number is now reduced to 102. Now, I think that that is considerable progress to make by means of persuasion, and without having recourse to those other means which, whatever the right rev. Prelate may say, are calculated to defeat the object he desires. The right rev. Prelate will see that he and I do not differ, nor do the Commissioners differ, with respect to the necessity for the appointment of Chaplains with proper salaries affixed to the office. But they differ rather upon the mode according to which this is to be carried into effect throughout the Kingdom. With respect to the Motion of the right rev. Prelate, I object to it, because I am convinced, that if once this question is opened in Committee, it would excite feelings out of doors, and perhaps I do not say in this House, but elsewhere, that might have a most prejudicial effect; and instead of doing all the good which he and I mutually desire, tend to prevent the accomplishment of our wishes. There is now a Bill before the other House of Parliament for the Amendment of the Poor Law; and it appears to me that it would be far better if there were introduced into that Bill some provision for the appointment and payment of Chaplains. I should prefer that infinitely to any inquiry before a Committee; and I hope that an effort will be made to introduce such a provision into that Bill, and that the law may be made as perfectly clear upon the subject as it has been in the instance, which was quoted by the right rev. Prelate, of the Irish Poor Law. As the matter now stands I do think it is on a most unsatisfactory basis. As I said before, in the original Bill there is no actual power given to the Commissioners for the appointment of Chaplains. They have it indirectly, but I think they ought to have it directly. I think they ought to have the power of calling on the Guardians to appoint Chaplains, giving to the Bishop of the Diocese, as now, a veto on the appointment. And I think also that something should be done in order that the Chaplain may be enabled to perform Divine Service in a proper place. These are the views I take of the subject. I agree with the right rev. Prelate in a great deal that he has said. I agree with him as to the necessity for such Chaplains, and that they should have adequate salaries. The Commissioners, in my opinion, have acted wisely in not unduly forcing the law upon the Guardians, but rather trying persuasion; and I think it would be better if the right rev. Prelate were to endeavour to amend the Bill which is now in the other House of Parliament than to have a Committee here, which, whatever he may think now, would rouse the feelings and passions of a great number of persons, and go far to defeat his own object.

The Bishop of Salisbury said, that having heard the statements of the right Rev. Prelate, he could not remain altogether silent upon a subject of such great importance. He was thankful to believe that the Union Workhouses in his own diocese did not generally exhibit so great a lack of spiritual instruction as those which had been referred to. Nevertheless, they could not but admit that the subject was one of deep importance, vitally affecting the character of the Legislature and of the Executive Government, and therefore deeply interesting to their Lordships' House. He could not forbear expressing his entire concurrence in nearly every word that had fallen from the noble Lord who had just sat down. He hailed the noble Lord's statement as a proof that the Motion which the right Rev. Prelate had made was not indeed in vain, and that it had been productive of good, by calling forth a declaration which could not but be deeply satisfactory to all who had the welfare of this destitute and unfortunate class of our fellow subjects at heart. He would only remind the House that these poor persons were not only their fellow-subjects, but by far the larger portion of them were Members of their own Church, every one of them in his respective parish having a vested interest by birthright in those spiritual consolations, which, unhappily in too many instances, appeared to be denied them in those houses to which they were removed, not by their own free choice, not as those who went forth and renounced voluntarily the rights, privileges, and blessings they had enjoyed, but as men who were constrained to do so by hard necessity. He rejoiced that there was now a prospect of this deeply important matter being satisfactorily settled.

Lord *Camoy*s suggested that the Clergymen of every parish in a Union should contribute towards the support of the Clergyman who might be appointed to perform the duties of Chaplain in the workhouse. This he suggested as the means of avoiding dissatisfaction among the Dissenters.

The Bishop of Exeter expressed his gratitude for the intentions which had been stated by the Government upon this question. He understood the noble Lord to say that Government would introduce an enactment. [Lord Wharncliffe: No; I did not say that.] He confessed that, if it were not so, he himself must be under a great delusion; for the impression on his mind was, that the declaration of the noble Lord was, that instead of granting a committee, the better course would be to introduce into the new Bill a provision for the appointment of Chaplains, and that in fact it was intended by the Government to propose it. That was the only interpretation he could put upon the noble Lord's remarks.

Lord Wharncliffe: What I stated was, that my opinion was very much in concurrence with that of the right Rev. Prelate; that I thought every Union ought to have a Chaplain, with a proper salary. That I undoubtedly stated; and then I said it appeared to me that his Motion was not the best way to obtain his object, but that the best way was to amend the Bill now before the House of Commons.

The Bishop of Exeter was thankful that he had obtained the judgment of the President of the Council, that the best way of dealing with the subject was to amend the Bill now in progress through Parliament. The noble Lord did not commit his Colleagues; he had merely declared his own judgment. He (the Bishop of Exeter) knew the value of that judgment, and particularly in the Councils of Her Majesty; and though he could not say that the Government was committed, yet he rejoiced that the noble President of the Council had declared that such ought to be the course.

Motion negatived.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, Friday, February 23, 1844.

MINUTES.] BILLS. Public.—1<sup>o</sup>. Masters and Servants Bill.

2<sup>o</sup>. Poor Law Amendment.

Private.—2<sup>o</sup>. Ramsay Inclosure; Bury Inclosure; Lancaster and Carlisle Railway; Ribbles Navigation; Liverpool New Gas and Coke.

PETITIONS PRESENTED. From Canterbury, in favour of Mr. Hill's Plan of Postage Reform.—From Whitechurch, by Mr. S. Crawford, from Taunton, and Crediton, by Mr. Fielden, from Oldham, and by Sir G. Strickland, from Preston, and Liverpool, for Withholding the Supplies.—From Wrexham, against Union of Sees of St. Asaph and Bangor.—From Leicester, Southampton, Huddersfield, and Swansea, against Increase in Military Establishments.—From Wellington (New Zealand), respecting certain Settlers.—From Radcliffe Colliery, against Export Duty on Coals.—From Wellington (Salop), against Alteration of Corn-laws.

POOR LAW AMENDMENT.] Sir J. Graham, in rising to move the second reading of the Poor Law Amendment Bill, said, he had an apology to make to the hon. and gallant Member for Brighton. On the occasion of moving for leave to bring in this Bill, the hon. and gallant Officer had asked him whether there was anything in it affecting Local Acts, and he had inadvertently answered in the negative; whereas, the fact was, that the Bill contained two clauses, the one of which, in some respects, limited the operation of Local Acts; and the other extended it. As this Bill was chiefly a measure of detail, not trenching materially on the principle of the existing Poor Law, he thought the House would probably permit it to pass its second reading without opposition. Any objections which were entertained against it might be made at the next stage. If there were no opposition to the course which he intended to take, he would move the Order of the Day for the second reading of the Poor Law Amendment Bill.

Captain Pechell said, that the 56th Clause of the Bill, in connection with the 17th Clause, had created considerable alarm in some parts of the country. He hoped the right hon. Baronet would not interfere with those who had conducted the affairs connected with the maintenance of the poor with advantage to all parties. There were many ameliorations and concessions to public feeling, he would admit, in the Bill. He hoped the right hon. Baronet would not pass any measure which would interfere with the Gilbert Unions.

Mr. T. Duncombe had no objection to the second reading of the Bill, though he thought that some amendments might be made in it with advantage, but those amendments could be made in Committee. He wished to ask the right hon. Baronet if it was his intention to grant a Committee to inquire into the operation of the Gilbert Unions, and, if such were his intention, when he proposed to move it?

Sir James Graham would take care that sufficient notice should be given when he was about to move for it.

Bill read a second time, and to be committed.

STATE OF IRELAND—ADJOURNED DEBATE (NINTH NIGHT).] The Attorney General, in resuming the debate, said, Sir, I rise in the discharge of a duty which

I believe this House and the country expects from me, in consequence of what has occurred in the course of this debate. I have, since the commencement of this debate, been so frequently called on, so frequently challenged, and so often alluded to by hon. Members, that if I had any reluctance, which I have not, I could not avoid joining in the discussion of the question now before us, and expressing my opinions on many portions of the subject. I was prepared to enter upon the discharge of this duty at an earlier period of the debate—I intended to follow my hon. and learned Friend, the Member for Worcester, and to have commented on many of the observations which he made in his speech; but I am sure the House will excuse me for saying that the moment I heard the word dishonour drop from the lips of my hon. and learned Friend, referring to my right hon. Friend, the Attorney General for Ireland, I at once thought that it would not become me to step in between any Gentleman and the vindication of his personal honour—and feeling this, I at once gave way to my right hon. and learned Friend. In what manner that right hon. and learned Gentleman discharged the duty which was imposed on him in vindication of his honour, I leave the House to judge—of the able and admirable manner in which he discharged that duty it may scarcely become me to speak, more particularly as the House has already decided upon it. But I must be permitted to say, that a more able and powerful speech, delivered in a more gentlemanly tone, and with a more manly bearing, I never heard in this House. Having expressed my opinion of the manner in which that duty was discharged, I now wish to observe that I have great pleasure in at once expressing my entire satisfaction to the right hon. Member for Dungarvon, at the explanation which he last night gave with respect to a trial, in which he was engaged as counsel for the prosecution, and which took place about fourteen or fifteen years ago in the county of Tipperary. I am not surprised that when it was suggested, that the right hon. Attorney General for Ireland might have called for a common Jury to try the traversers at the late Trials, that he was afraid of the effect of public opinion, if he were to exercise in that case the undoubted right of the Crown to set aside Jurors—I am not surprised, I say, that when such a suggestion was made in reference to my right hon. Friend, that he should, in consequence of that suggestion, have adverted to a trial which took place in Clonmel about fourteen or fifteen years ago, in which the right hon. and learned Member for Dungarvon was engaged, and on which occasion thirty-six common Jurors were set aside on the part of the Crown, and I am not astonished at the remarks made by my right hon. and learned Friend with reference to that proceeding. When the suggestion was made as to the course my right hon. and learned Friend might have adopted, it was natural that he should have referred to such an unusual exercise of the Prerogative of the Crown as setting aside those jurors; but after what fell from the right hon. and learned Member for Dungarvon last night with respect to that trial, I beg to say that I am perfectly satisfied that on the occasion of that trial, the right hon. Gentleman's conduct was actuated solely by a desire correctly to discharge his duty, and to promote the proper administration of justice. To the right hon. and learned Gentleman, therefore, if anything that falls from so humble an individual as myself can be of value to him, I say that I am perfectly satisfied with his explanation—personally knowing him as I do, and having heard him frequently in this House as well as out of it, I could not, from my experience of him, believe that he could be actuated by any other feelings than those which I have described. Sir, having discharged what I consider a debt of justice to my right hon. Friend I trust the House will extend to me its indulgence while I set myself right as to a point referred to by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Worcester, namely the course which I felt it my duty to take on the part of the Crown in a recent case in the Court of Exchequer, where I, as Attorney General, consented that a trial should be suspended, the Jury discharged without giving a verdict, and the defendant allowed an opportunity of stating his case on a future occasion. Sir, that no mistake may be made in the House or the country on that head, I think it right briefly to state the particulars, and the ground on which I acted. Up to the period of that trial, it had been the invariable practice of the Departments, both of the Excise and the Customs, to state, as nearly as possible, the precise day on which the transaction took place which was to be the subject of inquiry. Now, every lawyer is aware that it is not a matter of such necessity to name the precise day, and that usually the precise day is not so material, if the defendant is afforded a knowledge of the character of the offence charged, and about the time as nearly as possible, when the occurrence took place. For a plausible reason, which satisfied him for a time, the able and learned person whose assistance I had in that case, did not name the 24th of August, which was about the day but instead of that day, named the 24th of December, a period of four months later. That was an entire departure from the ordinary course of the Department, which I did not approve of, and when I heard that such a course had been adopted I discountenanced it, and begged that it should not be repeated, and I said this the rather because the hon. and learned Member for Worcester, about a fortnight before, when acting as Counsel for a defendant in the Court of Exchequer, expressed his regret that the defendant did not know the day, and on that occasion I told my hon. and learned Friend, who had been Solicitor General, and who well knew the practice of the office that the defendant could have no doubt as to about the time when the transaction which was to be the subject of the enquiry took place. When the trial came on in the Court of Exchequer, I had not the slightest idea that the objection would be made, and if I knew the party would have been in any difficulty as to the real day, I should have had no hesitation in at once agreeing to give him any reasonable delay which he might require. It was not until the defence commenced that the objection was brought forward. The Solicitor to the Excise was then put into the witness-box. and he stated, in answer to a question, that it was the invariable practice to name the real day as nearly as possible, and that the day was named in this case four months later. The counsel for the defence addressed the Jury, and said the defendant had been kept in ignorance of the precise day on which the alleged offence was committed. I then interrupted him in the middle of a sentence, and, in order that there might be no ground for complaint on the part of the defendant, I said I would agree to have the trial suspended, the Jury discharged, and that the defendant should have the notice according to the usual practice in such cases. What I proposed was done with the sanction of the Court, and the consent of the other side; and I feel that it was advantageous to the subject, and honourable to the Crown. Sir, I may add, that I am happy to find that in conducting the prosecutions the course I pursued was approved of at Lancaster, Cardiff, and Carmarthen, and I shall have occasion presently to call the attention of the House more particularly to these transactions. The favourable manner in which the House has been pleased to receive a notice of my conduct will undoubtedly animate me in the faithful discharge of my duty. And here, Sir, I may observe, that I should be wanting in fairness to my right hon. Friend at the Head of the Government, if I omitted to state, that one of the principal encouragements which I received in the course of my public life, was from him, and I trust that it will not be considered out of season, if I mention what took place when I was first appointed Attorney General in 1834. If there was any advantage in coming into office with very slight knowledge of its duties, and with an hon. and learned Colleague no better off in that respect than myself, I had that advantage. My Parliamentary experience was not great—that of my hon. Colleague was still less. A case of difficulty arising under such circumstances, it was very natural I should endeavour to avail myself of the great experience of my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government. He gave me the advice I sought, and having done so he said:—"You never need come to me again for advice. The responsibility is yours—and let me give you this general direction. When you have any matter of difficulty before you, consider well before you act; make yourself master of the subject; don't decide in a hurry; ascertain what is your duty with reference to the public interest, and when you have ascertained it, look neither to the right nor to the left. See what is due to the interest of the Crown, and also to the advantage of the public, and when you have ascertained your duty, discharge it. Should I differ from you I will do justice to your motives; that is the only advice I wish to give you, and having given you that advice I leave you to the discharge of your duty under those directions." This was the only advice I ever received from my right hon. Friend, to this moment. It was advice worthy of the first Minister of the Crown, as given to its first Law Officer. It gave me courage and confidence in the course which I have since pursued, for it enabled me to look not merely to the letter of the law, not merely to read the statutes or a digest of the Common Law, but to take the law to be administered at all times, as far as possible, in accordance with sound public opinion, and in unison with the sympathies and feelings of the great body of the community. I have now to advert to that which forms a large portion of the discussion in which the House has been engaged, and it is a portion of that discussion which exhibits very forcibly the danger which may arise from having legal subjects of this nature brought under discussion in this House, whilst proceedings are still pending. I do not mean in the slightest degree, I beg the House to understand, to impugn the authority of the House to discuss such matters, on occasions that might possibly arise. If the House was sitting, it might be right to take notice of a proceeding at that time actually going on. I concede fully the right of the House, or of any hon. Member of the House, with adequate cause, to make a proceeding of that nature the subject of inquiry; but having admitted that, I must say, that there may be great inconvenience produced by the frequent discussion of such subjects, and that the interference of the House in matters actually pending has a tendency to interfere with the administration of justice, and to destroy the confidence of the public in the purity of that administration; and if any part ought more than another to be kept free from an interference calculated to produce that effect, it is the administration of justice as regards the Criminal Law of the country. That interference may be to-day to protect a person supposed to be unjustly accused or unfairly tried, but to-morrow it may be to immolate a victim of popular prejudice, and to sacrifice a person to feelings entertained contrary to the principles of law and justice. Admitting the power of the House, I should, for my part, have desired that matters, which are still pending, and a large portion of which will be, perhaps, the subject of inquiry and discussion elsewhere, should not have been brought under the notice of the House. I should, therefore, have wished, if possible, to have avoided touching on those matters; but at the same time, as the subject has been entered on, I am not sure that I shall not agree with the hon. and learned member for Bath, in thinking that it would be better to go into the whole of it, for it is scarcely possible to discuss such a subject piecemeal. I shall, however, in alluding to this subject, bring forward for discussion, that part only which I am imperatively called on to enter upon, and in doing so, I shall avoid any observation of an acrimonious or bitter character with reference to any one connected with it, or who has spoken on it, on either side of the House. The notice which I feel disposed to take of speeches in this debate, principally applies to the speeches of Members of my own profession. I had not the advantage of hearing the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Cork, (Mr. Sergeant Murphy), but I had the advantage of hearing the speech of the right hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh, who stated that he was no lawyer, though why he so studiously repudiated the profession to which we both belong I am unable to tell; but I must say this much, that I went with him on the Northern Circuit, I held briefs with him, and I know he is a man of too powerful a mind not to be able easily to master the details of our profession, and too honest a man to practise it if he had not mastered them. I shall, therefore, still continue to look upon him as a member of that profession, and to call him my right hon. and learned Friend. He was selected for the office which he held in the East Indies, because he was a lawyer, it was connected with the formation of a code of laws, and he was succeeded by Mr. Amos, a Gentleman amongst those of the highest legal attainments in Westminster-hall. Unless my right hon. and learned Friend were desirous of mixing bad law with worse politics, and for that reason repudiated his profession, I know not why he should have separated himself from us. But I cannot afford to lose the "decus et tutamen" of the profession; and if he is anxious to stray away from the flock he must permit me to go after him to reclaim him, and try to bring him back again to the fold! I must treat the speech of my right hon. and learned Friend as the speech of a lawyer. I am not disposed to do him any injustice, and I must say that, I heard with the greatest delight the delivery of the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. I must say it more deserved the name of a splendid oration than a speech in debate. I listened with delight to the outpourings of that mind so richly stored with varied information. I marked with pleasure the pouring forth of that profusion of intellectual wealth, which he possesses in such abundance, intermingled with similes drawn from ancient and modern literature, and illustrations from every part of the world, and from the history of all times. I heard all this, Sir, till envy, if I could have felt it, would have been lost in admiration. It was impossible to hear his glowing language—his glittering antitheses—his magnificent periods—his powerful and strong points—so well worthy of attention here or in any other assembly, without the highest pleasure and gratification. But it was rather the oration of a poet, an author, or an orator, than the speech of a great statesman, and I looked and looked in vain, from the beginning to the end of that speech, for anything practical. I heard the right hon. Gentleman complain of everything and everybody; but with all the leisure which he could devote to the subject, he allowed his sympathy for Ireland to expend itself in barren generalities. Perhaps I cannot do more from the position which I occupy; but the right hon. Member for Edinburgh has ample leisure and ample talent to devote to the subject, and yet I looked in vain through his speech for anything practicable—for anything to grapple with. I found in it nothing but meagre details relative to a profession which he professes to have abandoned. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the constitution of the Jury at the late trials, and said that the Crown ought to have been contented with a common Jury. That was repeated by the hon. and learned Member for Worcester, and also by the right hon. and learned Member for Dungarvon. Now, that was never suggested until it was suggested in this House. The counsel for the traversers, fifteen in number, never suggested it; and when the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite now suggests it, I must say that I am not bound to entertain a proposition which was not made at all at the trials, or before them. I do not think it my duty to speculate what would, or what ought, to have been done with a proposition which was not made till the trial was completely over, and, as I before said, never, I believe, suggested until last night. My hon. and learned Friend, the Member for Chester, if I mistake not, did suggest that it might have been done; but if anything in this Debate is to turn upon this point, I have a right to say that it ought to have been mentioned at a time when it could have been acted on, and not at this time. Now, with respect to the question of a special or a common Jury, I am not, Sir, versed in the details of the proceedings in Ireland, and I am unable to say which has been the practice there; but I beg to say, that in this country I should just as soon have thought of trying such a case by a Common Jury as I should have thought of trying a case of High Treason at the Quarter Sessions. I say boldly, that I am not aware of a single instance where a trial of this sort has taken place by a Common Jury. As far as I know, in the history of English jurisprudence, a trial of this description has never taken place except by a Special Jury; and I must say, that if I, as the representative of the Crown, on any occasion consented to depart from that established practice, I should think that I betrayed the duty that I owed to the Crown, without being at all certain that I advanced the security of the subject in the administration of the law. I do not know what may be the practice in Ireland, but I say boldly, in the face of the House and the country, without pledging myself to what should be done in the particular case to which my right hon. and learned Friend referred last night, I should unquestionably have advised a Special Jury, and dissuaded from resorting to a Common Jury; and I should consider myself wanting in my duty in respect of my office, if I departed from the usual course. Sir, that course was the course taken, after deliberate consultation. The law officers of the Crown here were consulted as to the practice, and they gave an unhesitating opinion that the case ought to be tried by a Special Jury. They had not the slightest doubt about it. They advised a Special Jury, and they advised it for this reason, that in the case of a Special Jury you have, to begin with, forty-eight names taken indifferently by ballot from the whole panel, or rather from the entire list of the Jurors' books. In the heat of argument the right hon. and learned Gentleman spoke last night of the Jurors being "selected." Why, Sir, none of them are

"selected." There are forty-eight names drawn by ballot. If I mistake not, the Jury-book for Dublin would furnish more than fifteen times forty-eight. The List is so large, that you could, out of the book, get no less than fifteen complete panels. My right hon. and learned Friend, therefore, ought not to have spoken of the Jurors as "selected." They are all taken by ballot from the List, and they are so taken with a power of objecting to the name of any one when drawn; so that you begin by taking the entire list, and you get forty-eight names which are supposed to be free from prejudice. The noble Lord, the Member for the City of London, appears to deny this: if he will look into the Act of Parliament—nay more, if he will attend to the practice, he will be aware that forty-eight names are taken from the book, but not the first forty-eight that you may happen to stumble on, but forty-eight taken by ballot, and therefore free from any suspicion. There is a power of objection as to the parties as the names are drawn forth; and if any person is incapacitated from serving, as the names are drawn, there is a power of objecting to him. Nay, more, I apprehend there is a full power of applying to the Court to quash the return, and to direct a new panel if any mischance has occurred by which the Court is persuaded that there could not be a fair trial. Well, then, the forty-eight names being selected purely by chance, they are reduced to twenty-four by each party striking off twelve, and then the actual twelve who are to sit upon the trial are to be the result of a further ballot—taking twelve of the twenty-four. In this country we find that this method of selecting juries is free from reproach, free from difficulty, is satisfactory to the public, and is an additional instrument in insuring impartiality in the administration of justice, whereas I must say, that to leave to the Crown the power to set aside Common Jurors—to cast that odium upon the Crown, would be very unwise. Why, my hon. and learned Friend, the Member for Worcester, thought the odium so great in practice, that he said the officer of the Crown would not dare to incur it, and that when it became necessary for the Attorney General to say, "Thompson, you stand aside; Jones, stand aside," such an outcry would be raised, that he would not dare to go on. It was for the purpose of avoiding that;

and, as the defendants in misdemeanor have no right to challenge except for cause shewn, it was the deliberate opinion of the Law Officers at this side of the Channel as well as the other, that there should be a Special Jury : because here it is the usual practice, because it secures—so far as the Panel is impartial—an impartial Jury, and because it places the Crown and the traversers precisely on the same footing. It may be, that when you come afterwards to examine the matter as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dungarvon has done, perhaps correctly—I am sure with perfect correctness as regards his own views and the information he has obtained—there may be particular cases in which the list may be unfavourable to the traversers, and the Jury may not be selected with good fortune to them. That might be a ground of application to the Court, but it is no ground of accusation against the Public Officer who has the conduct of the Trial. I am sure the House will allow me to state what occurred at Carmarthen; and one reason why I have entered so deeply into the character of my right hon. and learned Friend opposite, and into the explanation of the statement of facts made by him, is this, that I was placed at Carmarthen in precisely a similar situation. I went down to Carmarthen, a very small county, with a small population, and a very limited Jury List. I am sorry to be obliged to make these disclosures, but it is necessary in order that the House may understand the difficulty in which a Public Officer may be placed, and I can well understand how my right hon. and learned Friend must have felt the difficulties of his position. Numbers of persons had been out in different parts of that county to such an extent, that when the List of some seventy-two names was placed before me, I was credibly informed that a very considerable number of the persons on the List had been some of them actually out in the riots and outbreaks which they were coming to try, and others, supported by their relations, servants, neighbours and friends, and there were above thirty names on that Panel whom I could not call with safety, nay more, whom I could not permit to remain in the Jury Box without injustice to the Crown. Why, Sir, what was I to do in such a situation? [Mr. Roebuck: "Hear."] I will tell my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bath that I half shrunk from the performance of my duty, and well I might do so, having on one occasion to set aside thirty Jurors. And what enabled me to do so? It was the certainty that if I should be challenged in this House, I should be enabled to give a sufficient answer for my conduct. And why was this? I knew the purity of my own motives, and more than that, I knew that on former occasions there had been those favourable expressions of opinion with regard to my conduct, which enabled me to feel that character was strength, and that I could dare to perform that duty from which another might perhaps have flinched, from a fear of unmerited unpopularity attaching to his name, and destroying his right to the good opinion of his fellow subjects. I consulted the learned gentlemen with whom I was associated—who went that circuit; they were diametrically opposed to me in politics. I mention this for the purpose of saying that I placed the more confidence in their opinions. I felt that they were prepared to discharge their duty, as I was mine. They told me the state of the country, which to some extent they knew, and the habits of the people of that district, where no trial scarcely took place without many challenges on either side, and that I might rely upon the information I should receive on those points from the local Attorney. Well, Sir, having the support of my learned friends, and with the undoubted information that I received, I felt called upon to exercise to the fullest extent the Prerogative of the Crown, and to get a Jury from whom a firm but fair and impartial Administration of Justice might be expected. I will ask my right hon. and learned Friend opposite, could my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland have dared to do so much? I admit that it was almost impossible. I admit that what was done in Tipperary by the right hon. and learned Member for Dungarvon, in 1829, fifteen years ago, could not be done in Dublin in 1844. I think there would have been raised such a clamour, such an expression of public opinion—and there would have been such an appearance—whatever might be the reality—of partiality and unfair proceeding, that no Officer of the Crown ought to have risked placing himself in such a position; and I have no hesitation in saying that it was, therefore, the duty of my right hon. and learned Friend to try the case by a Special Jury. Well, but then it is said that this was all pretence, that there was unfairness in the proceeding. Why, let me beg the attention of the House to the matter for a single moment. There are forty-eight names drawn, each party striking off twelve. The Crown has a right to strike off twelve and no more, and the traversers have just the same right, and they may exercise this right in the most capricious manner, and as my learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland said the other night, if the defendants were to strike off names for their own benefit, and the Crown then to strike off names for their benefit also, this would be a double strike off in their favour. I do not think that could be expected. I am perfectly ready to yield this, that the right to strike twelve names out of the Panel, as it is to be performed either by plaintiffs or defendants, is one of the most absolute rights known to the law. I admit that on the part of the Crown that right is to be exercised with deference to public opinion, but that deference to public opinion is not to be allowed to operate to the prejudice of the performance of a substantial duty. And then I freely admit that, ceteris paribus—if they stand before me indifferent—Catholic and Protestant, and if the attention of the party striking off the names be drawn to the fact, that if he leaves no Catholic on the Jury it may create a false impression, and prejudice the case; under such circumstances having to strike off either a Catholic or a Protestant, I must cordially say, that ceteris paribus, I should be disposed to leave on the Catholic rather than prejudice the case. And here I must be allowed to correct a misconception put by the right hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh upon the use made by my right hon. Friend, the Secretary for the Home Department, of the word prejudice. My right hon. Friend used the word in the sense of false feeling, but the right hon. and learned Gentleman chose to take it up in the sense of injury. But how stand the facts of this case; was it a case ceteris paribus? Why, Sir, I will go further, and say, so much do I feel the importance of consulting public opinion, and observing a respectful deference even to prejudices, that may be abroad, that I would make a concession beyond that. But the question is, how does the matter stand? In the first place, a clamour was raised that every Catholic was struck off, because he was a Catholic. Now, however, that is given up. The right hon. Gentleman opposite, says, that as to eight of the Jury, on that ground he has no complaints to make. He admits that as to the eight it would have been a dereliction of duty if those gentlemen had been left on the Jury. And now, with respect to the others, I believe, there has been a mistake with respect to the actual number of Roman Catholics on the Jury List. I should be very sorry to trouble the House with minute details on this point. I have endeavoured to avoid it, and to compress my observations into as compact a form as is necessary, consistently with the performance of my duty. I believe there was one more than the number originally mentioned, I believe there were eleven, and that of the number nine were Repealers. There was no question about nine of them, but a question arose as to Mr. Henry and Mr. Dunn. With respect to Dunn, I have a paper here in which his name appears as one of the requisitionists for a meeting in May 1842, on which occasion the parties signed one resolution, amongst others, in which they pledge themselves, individually and collectively, to use their utmost exertions, personal, pecuniary, and influential, to forward the sacred cause of Repeal by all constitutional means, and to continue the Repeal struggle as suggested by the Liberator. I will not utter taunts or reproaches on this subject, but I beg to say that a person who was so connected with the case to be tried was an individual, who, if the fact was disclosed, ought to be struck off! He could not stand indifferent as the others; and while it was the duty of the Crown to exercise their right, with deference as to public opinion, I say the law officer would have sacrificed to a perverse and spurious liberality his duty to the Crown if he had left that man on. Then, with respect to the other, Mr. Kemmis distinctly states that at the time when Mr. Henry was struck off, he believed him to be a Protestant and a Conservative. I have a right to ask from Gentlemen opposite, credit for Mr. Kemmis, as a gentleman, and a man of honour, when he declares in his affidavit, that being compelled to strike off one more Juror, he did not know that he was a Catholic, and that he struck him off as the least eligible of those to whom he had no objection. There were reasons for that opinion of Mr. Kemmis. My right hon. Friend, the Secretary for the Home Department, did not think it right to state them the other night, and he not having stated them, I do not think it right on my part. I do not know that they might not be stated without impropriety, but it will be sufficient to say, that there were reasons why Mr. Kemmis might prefer other Jurors to him, although those reasons did not involve Mr. Henry in any suspicion, and although Mr. Kemmis supposed him to be a Conservative and a Protestant. Well, the charge is cleared away, of having struck off all the Catholics for no other reason than that they were Catholics. There were removed eight members of the Repeal Association; a ninth was found to have attached his name to a requisition for a Repeal Meeting; and, with regard to the other, there was not the least idea that he was any other than a Protestant. Really, I must say, if this is true, it is deeply to be regretted, that any feeling should have been raised of any intention on our part, to insult our Catholic fellow-subjects. I beg to say, for my own part, that no Gentleman opposite, not even my right hon. and learned Friend himself, would more deeply regret such a fact, or the suspicion of such a fact, than I should; and I am sure that in this sentiment I have the entire concurrence of my hon. Friends near me. I shall now advert to the speech of my hon. and learned Friend, the Member for Worcester. Some mistakes fell from him, to which I must beg to call the attention of the House. In the first place, I own I was perfectly astonished to hear my hon. and learned Friend put the question, "Where are the liberties of the people of England buried?" and meet it with this answer, "They are buried in the Courts of Common law." "Where, or how is it (asked my hon. and learned Friend) that the rights of liberty are swamped?" "By means of the Common Law." I do not know whether my hon. and learned Friend is in his place or not. I have no intention to utter a syllable which could give him the slightest offence, but I cannot help saying, that if he had drunk of the streams of Common Law, as the great lawyers of old—if he had tasted that spring in the spirit of our ancestors—he would never have made those observations. I hope my hon. and learned Friend, the Member for

Bath, is not prepared to go along with him in that statement. I will not call it a libel on the Common Law. The Common Law, the grave of our liberties! Why, it was their cradle—it was the source from which we derived some of the first principles of liberty which the bold and manly character of our country has since swelled out to the size at which we now find them: if it were not for the Common Law, I doubt that we should have a single spark of liberty in the country. It is impossible; you cannot exaggerate the importance of Trial by Jury, which is part of that Common Law. We owe to the Common Law the collection of twelve men to inquire into the guilt or innocence of those accused, and to pronounce their opinions upon the actions of every one of the subjects of this country. We owe to the assemblage of Juries, to meet and discuss matters submitted to them, more liberty than to any other cause. It is by meeting in this way that we have discovered our strength, and I will add, that Juries have continually worked out those liberties which we are now enjoying. That is one instance. And who was it that pronounced general search-warrants issued by the Secretary of State to be illegal, after they had continued from the Revolution downwards to about 1770, when the Court of Common Pleas, and subsequently all the Judges, pronounced that the Judges could not make law, and that general search-warrants had no foundation in the Common Law—that they were unknown, contrary to the genius of the Constitution, and could not stand; and this after they had existed for upwards of 100 years. No one had called them in question till then; and an opinion of the Judges before that time would have been extra-judicial; but the moment when the matter was brought before them, they gave an opinion in favour of the rights of the subject. But was there no other instance? What was the first effort on behalf of the human race for the extinction of Slavery? The liberation of the negro Somerset, in 1780. Somerset, the negro came to this country, and was re-shipped, to be conveyed to Jamaica. A writ of habeas corpus rescued him from his dungeon in the ship; he was brought into Court, the question was argued, and it was pronounced, that the liberties of every man in this kingdom was commensurate with the shores of the country, that the noxious spirit of Slavery could not exist here, and that the moment a Slave touches the sacred soil of Liberty, the fetters drop from his feet, and he becomes a free man. Why, our own domestic slavery has been entirely removed by decisions of the Courts of Law, time after time. There was a desire to wrest and turn everything in favour of liberty, which the breath of the Common Law inspires from the first to the last maxim it inculcates. I will not dwell upon this point: but it is remarkable what instances are to be found of greater respect given to Courts of Law even than to the Legislature itself. I entirely agree with the hon. and learned Member for Worcester in the argument in which he was so ably supported by my right hon. Friend, on the subject of the privileges of this House. I differ from the practical application of it, but I know, and my hon. and learned Friend, the Member for Bath, knows, that there are plenty of Gentlemen in this House, and many more out of the House, who are glad to have the Courts of Law as a refuge from the possible tyranny of this House; and I will remind the House that our Transatlantic brethren when they founded their Constitution on the basis of the purest Democracy, took care that the Legislature should not spoil it, because they gave the Supreme Court power to annul any Act which it held to be ultra vires, and contrary to the spirit of the Constitution. A complaint has been made that my hon. and learned Friend (the Solicitor General) said that there are certain Acts of Parliament which are not to be discussed in this House. I did not so understand my hon. and learned Friend, and I think it is impossible for any Lawyer to lay down such a proposition. The charge of Lord Loughborough, in the Court of Common Pleas, on the Trial of Lord George Gordon, which the House is aware arose out of riotous and tumultuous assemblages to obtain the repeal of certain Acts in favour of the Roman Catholics, laid it down that those and all other Acts were open to public discussion: but what my hon. and learned Friend meant was, that there are some Acts which so immediately affect the institutions of the country, and go so completely to the root of the Constitution, that although they have the same foundation in point of law, yet, according to the good sense and practice of mankind, are viewed in a different light. My hon. and learned Friend alluded to the Act of Settlement and the Act of Union, and what he meant was, that those Acts ought to receive from Statesmen and subjects a different consideration from other Acts of Parliament. What would be the effect of repealing the Act of Settlement? There is no doubt that any law may be made the subject of discussion and petition; but I ask whether anybody would propose for petition and discussion the Law of Succession to the Throne? that that which is established in this country should be altered for that which prevails in France? There are discussions on certain topics which it is felt that it is wise should be avoided—there are parts of the Constitution which it is well should not be shaken. Now, as to the observation of the noble Lord, the Member for North Lancashire, which has been objected to, that we ought not to discuss the proceedings in the Courts of Westminster, and I am sure the hon. Member for Bath will go along with me in saying this—that unless there be a case of urgent necessity, they ought not to be interfered with, unless there be strong reasons for taking that course, the proper and the Constitutional course is, after the matter has been discussed before the proper tribunal, after it is completed, not before, to complain to this House if wrong be done. And I must say, with regard to an inquiry by the House, even, it ought not to be proceeded with except upon proper notice. For instance, look to what has happened with respect to the Attorney General for Ireland. My hon. and learned Friend, the Member for Worcester, came down here, on the sixth night of the debate, with a variety of papers which he had never moved for, which were in the hands of no Member of this House, except his own, of which I did not know anything, and with respect to which, though I was to reply to him, I had not the slightest notion of the course he was going to take. A period of the evening, too, was selected for his speaking, which precluded an answer being given to him that night. And now, having said this much of him, let me do him this justice—a fairer man, or a juster man than my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Worcester, there does not exist. I would trust my life, and every thing that I had in the world, in his hands. Incorruptible, honest, faithful, zealous, he would do no wrong willingly to any man, least of all would he do an injury to any man, by any course that could be susceptible even of the charge of unfairness. This, Sir, is the sincere, the willing testimony I tender with respect to one, between whom and myself there has lasted a friendship now of thirty years. It began between us at school; it continued at college; it has been matured in manhood. He is, I say, utterly incapable of doing anything liable to the charge of unfairness. And yet, what comments might be made upon his coming here at a late hour of the night, not giving any notice, not letting any one know, even in the slightest degree, the charge he was about to make against the Irish Attorney General? But why do I point to this? For this reason; that we may all learn a lesson from it; not slightly, rashly, suddenly, to impute improper motives to honourable men, who may not at the moment perceive the construction to which their acts may be liable. I ask for myself; I ask for my learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland, a candid and fair construction for our conduct from others, who may not be fully aware of the reasons that have influenced that conduct. My right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh has thrown out a suggestion, and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Liskeard has spoken also of the doctrine of conspiracy as a questionable doctrine. The doctrine of conspiracy is, I believe, as old as Common Law. I know that there is a definition of it in a statute, and in that definition has been found an expression of great import, and which really comprises almost the principle of every case. I have a portion of the statute here, and that statute professes to state what is a conspirator, and like many of our old statutes, as the hon. and learned Member for Bath perfectly well knows, it gives rather an example of a principle than a detailed Code of Law. It is stated in that Statute that a conspirator is one who confederates with others to charge a man with a false crime, and "such as retain men in the country to maintain a malicious enterprise." If then a man combines or confederates with others for the purpose of effecting a malicious enterprise, he is a conspirator. I believe that the Law of Conspiracy was correctly laid down by the Court. As to the Law of Conspiracy itself, I do not feel it necessary to vindicate it from whatever my hon. and learned

Friend the Member for Worcester may have said against it. There never yet has been any attempt to get rid of that Statute; and if my hon. and learned Friend has any objection, any serious objection to the definition of the crime of conspiracy, it is high time for him to legislate upon it. Whether he may succeed or not, I shall not pretend to say, but I can hold out no hope of offering to him any assistance. As an instance of what a conspiracy may be, I refer to the case of a number of officers who all resigned their commissions on the same day for the purpose of compelling a noble Lord (Lord Clive) to resign his government. There a legal act was done by each; the crime there was the confederacy to do that which would place the Commander-in-Chief in such a position that he would be compelled to comply with their wishes, and to do this by a measure that was perfectly legal in itself. Every one of those officers was competent to take the course of resigning his commission; that he might freely do so; but the moment it was done in a confederacy with others, it was pronounced by the Judges to be an unlawful conspiracy. There are general rights, the exercise of the rights of property, and all other rights, free from all control except that which belongs to public opinion, and the satisfaction of a man's own conscience; but when several persons combine together, they have a power which not one of them alone can possess, and the public safety demands that criminal associations for unlawful ends, by acts that may, in themselves, be perfectly innocent, should be punishable by law. It so happens that no man is responsible by law for a departure from the truth. If an inquiry be made of a man as to the character of an individual, his state in trade, no man is responsible; he may answer truly or falsely; but if several persons join in one common falsehood, to raise, for instance, the price of the funds, or to injure the credit of any one; then, though each might state with perfect impunity that which was not true, yet the confederacy with others to propagate a falsehood, makes each become amenable to the law for that combination. There is, too, a passage in Hawkins, where it is said that parties combining together to maintain a matter, whether true or false, makes them conspirators. But I am not disposed to go further with this. Let us, then, see what is the accusation, and in speaking of the accusation itself, let me guard myself against being suffered to utter one word against the accused. I consider the situation of those charged with the offence entitles them to the greatest forbearance. There is the verdict of a jury; but it is open to them to move an Arrest of Judgment, or the Judgment itself may be reversed by a Writ of Error. I, for one, Sir, hope that from my lips upon the heads of the accused not a single expression shall fall of taunt or reprobation, even though I may speak of the acts with which they were charged. The substance of the charge is this—that they combined together to procure a Repeal of the Union, by producing sentiments of alienation in the minds of the subjects of the United Empire, and by the intimidation of the Legislature of the United Empire. They may be guilty or not; but that is the charge against them. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Worcester, has said that the charge in this case is like to the charge against Lord George Gordon. It is no such thing. That was for levying war; this is for a conspiracy. This is not a conspiracy to levy war; but it is a conspiracy to overawe and intimidate the Legislature, and by that means to produce a Repeal of the Union. [Mr. Roebuck: What was Hardy's case?] That reminds me of what is still said in Westminster Hall with respect to that case. After a long trial, and all the parties had been acquitted, it was said that Lord Thurlow, having heard of the proceeding and the result of it, remarked—"the mistake was in indicting them for high treason; if they had been indicted for a misdemeanor, they must have been certainly convicted." What was meant was this—if you had indicted them as conspirators you must have succeeded, but as you indicted them for a levying of war, and could prove no levying of war, you failed. But then it was said, why allow all this to go on? Why not indict them for their illegal acts? Why not indict one man for a libel—why not indict another for attending an unlawful assembly, and why not give some notice of your opinion of these proceedings? Why allow Mr. O'Connell to fall into a trap; why allow matters to go to such an extreme? Now, Sir, I recollect a discussion taking place in this House in May last, with respect to the dismissing the Magistrates who had attended those meetings. Could, I ask, the Executive to have given in a better, a stronger, and in a more marked manner, the opinion they entertained with regard to those meetings, than dismissing the Magistrates who attended at them? What more was wanted? But then you may say, why not have indicted persons for attending those meetings? Why, Sir, the very Jury, who were supposed to have been packed, for the purpose of convicting per fas aut nefas, actually found all those meetings to be legal. The very fact is, at the same time, a credit to the Jury, and a justification of the Government. It shows that the one was discriminating and the other prudent. No doubt those meetings, as they occurred from time to time, were the subject of anxiety and of consideration on the part of the Government. I do not mean that I was called in—that the Attorney General of England was called upon; but I know that it became a subject of considerable anxiety to me as a Member of Parliament, and as a private individual I had the greatest difficulty in forming an opinion as to those meetings. The hon. and learned Member for Worcester has observed, that mere numbers do not constitute the illegality of a meeting. He has said, quite truly, a large number of persons collected together to see a balloon, or a review, or Her Majesty's going to Court, is not an illegal assembly, and, therefore, the mere numbers do not constitute illegality. I admit, then, that this was justly a subject of the most anxious consideration; and it now turns out, that if these parties had been indicted for holding an illegal meeting, it would have been perfectly fatal, for a verdict of acquittal would have stamped them with the character of lawfulness. It is plain, then, that it would not have been right on the part of the Government to have meddled with these meetings. But then it has been said, "Why was not a proclamation issued?" Suppose a proclamation had been issued, how could it be enforced? Were you to send out troops, and disperse the meeting? I cannot entertain a doubt that, with that verdict to sustain it, the prudence of the conduct of the Government ought to be manifest to the whole world. If you could not get a Jury in Dublin to find those meetings illegal, what chance was there that a Jury in other parts of the country would have found them to be so? I ask the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Sheil) what would have been the result with a Jury in Tipperary, if you indicted one of those meetings as illegal? The right hon. Gentleman has said that you cannot get a Jury there to do their duty. The right hon. Gentleman forgets what has occurred. I have not brought Hansard down here; but I looked at it this day. If, however, he says that he forgets he ever uttered such a sentiment, I shall forget I ever read it. I will not pursue the point further. But, then, it has been said, why not punish the libels as they were published? And here, Sir, I must refer to my own practice. I have a great objection to a prosecution for libels. It may be an odd thing for an Attorney General to say, but I do not hesitate to avow my objection to prosecutions for libels. The law itself is in such a state, the administration of it has been in such a state, and the licence that has grown up, when I had no control over it, has brought it to such a state, that I have repeatedly said, when called upon to give an opinion to a private complaint—"What have you been accused of?" The answer has been—"I have been called names and vilified." Then, my reply has always been—"Unless you can show that there has been a distinct allegation against you, charging you with a crime from which you can purge yourself by affidavit, in the name of common sense let the matter rest! Suffer yourself to be abused. Hard names break no bones. You are receiving the same dose in common with the greatest Statesmen on both sides, in both Houses of Parliament, are daily in the habit of receiving." I hope I have not been wrong in this. I speak of what I think a prudent Attorney General ought to practise, and what I have done in that situation, and when consulted by a private prosecutor. Neither am I anxious to prosecute for sedition; for it is difficult to say where fair discussion ends, and where sedition begins. Then as to prosecution for libel, I know no question more difficult to determine than at what period a law officer would be justified in filing an ex-officio information for libel. I have never filed an ex-officio information. But I share that distinction with several of my predecessors. I believe my hon. and learned Friend (Sir T. Wilde) never filed an ex-officio information for libel. I believe Sir J. Campbell never filed an ex-officio information for a political libel—he did for blasphemy. There was also the exception, in the case of F. O'Connor, about whom I shall have a word to say presently. Sir W. Horne never filed an ex-officio information for libel, nor Sir T. Denman, and Sir J. Copley, as Attorney General, never filed an information for a political libel. Since the passing of the Reform Bill there has been no ex-officio information filed for a political libel. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sheil) read a libel from the Nation newspaper. It was a libel, undoubtedly, but who was the author? Mention has also been made of an address to the army; I think, in that case the name was appended to it. [Mr. Sheil: Yes, Mr. Power.] I recollect, too, the prosecution of a person of the name of Barrett, who was tried and convicted and went to prison, as a libeller, for the publication of a letter, and to that letter was appended the name of "Daniel O'Connell." There was not at the time any disposition not to prosecute Mr. O'Connell. The only reason why he was not prosecuted instead of Mr. Barrett was, that they could not prove the letter to have been written by him, although it purported to be signed with his name. In the same way I do not mean to say, that there is any reason for not prosecuting Mr. Power as the writer of the declaration referred to. Do not let hon. Gentlemen opposite suppose that I am taunting the Whig Government in saying this, I am averse at all times to these tu quoque arguments, which I think are mere waste of time. I only referred to the other case for the purpose of showing how difficult it is to sustain such prosecutions. What was the course pursued as regarded Mr. Feargus O'Connor? He was prosecuted by the Whigs for libel, tried at York, and sentenced to fifteen or eighteen months imprisonment. Nearly the last act of the Whigs by the way, before they went out of office, was to let Mr. O'Connor loose. I do not introduce that remark in any spirit of ill-humour; but such was the fact. It happened that some time afterwards the Chartist Association sprang up. I found violent libels published in Mr. F. O'Connor's paper. I found meetings of Chartists of all orders and ranks; and I found another paper published by another person, sending forth libels. With these I found formidable meetings in various parts of the country.

As I have said, I had no desire to put down the liberty of the press—that organ which whether for good or for evil, is one of the most powerful instruments in this country; so valuable, that I should almost be averse to curbing even its licentiousness too much. My object was this—to use these libels to prove the conspiracy of the Chartists. It was a charge in the indictment and not objected to. Though there was every disposition shown at Lancaster to find an exception to everything that occurred; yet I can remember but one exception that was made by F. O'Connor himself. He complained of the length of the indictment. I gave up several counts the omission of which was suggested by the Judge. There was a complaint as to the number of defendants, and that too was removed by me as speedily as possible. At the conclusion of the trial Mr. F. O'Connor stated that the circumstances of the country warranted a prosecution. He did not complain of that step, and in his address he admitted that the prosecutions had been conducted in a manner that did credit to the administration of justice. I know that it is a matter of no little surprise to find that found fault with here, which I did in the case of Mr. F. O'Connor, for there I gave in the libels to show the connection of the parties. In the same way, with regard to the Irish trials, if the charge was true and well founded, then the course pursued in conducting the prosecution was a proper one. Another matter that has been observed upon, is the challenge to the Jury, as put upon the record. With respect to the challenge of the array in Ireland, the substance of it is,—the traversers alleged that the array had been framed by fraud, and to that the Counsel for the Crown demurred, and therefore, it is said by hon. Gentlemen opposite, they admitted the truth of the allegation. I hope I shall not get into much disfavour by what I state upon this; but I am obliged to show that the Attorney General for Ireland did as much, and he did no more than what I myself have done, with the highest approbation. I beg now to state what occurred at Cardiff. Mr. Matthew Davenport Hill, once a Member of this House, appeared as counsel for the prisoners, and he put on record a challenge to the array and the challenge stated that the array was returned by fraud. My hon. and learned Friend (Sir Wm. Follett) and myself did not take so long to consider as they did in Ireland as to the course to be pursued. Within ten minutes we demurred to the challenge. Some hon. Gentleman might say, "What! demur when fraud was alleged?" as was said by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Worcester, with an effect that those who heard him could not forget, though they may have often in Westminster Hall felt his power, which is there equally exerted for the right or the wrong; for my hon. and learned Friend having read his briefs, is always imbued with the spirit of his client. He is a zealous party in every cause; and his zeal is the result of his earnest and manly nature. What! said my hon. and learned Friend, did you demur?—then you admitted the truth of his allegation of fraud. No, I reply, for fraud is only admitted so far as it is properly alleged. We have nothing to do with the allegation of fraud, where there is not the time nor the place for discussing it. If it had been said that there was fraud in the Sheriff, we should have directly taken issue upon it. If it had been said to be fraud in the returning officer, we should have tried it. If it had been said to be fraud in the agent of the Crown, Mr. Maule, we should have put the matter in issue. The allegation was merely this, that the panel was returned by fraud. He did not say by whom. There was nothing to be tried—we could not join issue. We joined issue by the demurrer. If we had joined issue upon the plea, upon the allegation of fraud, we should have given an opportunity for an endless inquiry regarding persons unknown innumerable; this inquiry would have gone on to the end of the year, and the progress of justice would have been altogether defeated on this occasion. The learned counsel opposed to us made no complaint of the course which we took; the Reporters for the Press reported the proceedings in the usual way, and nobody got up in Westminster Hall to complain of our having acted unfairly. Now this was precisely what took place in Ireland at the recent trial. The allegation in the Cardiff case was, that the panel was returned by fraud, not saying whose fraud, or how, or when or where, giving in short nothing whereupon we could join issue. If the hon. and learned Member for Bath has the words under his eye, perhaps he will furnish me with them; but my impression is, that the challenge is for fraud in general, not saying by whom or under what circumstances. [Mr. Roebuck: Certainly. The words were "some person or persons unknown."] Some person or persons unknown. Yes. Then how would it be possible to join issue upon such an allegation not implicating any named parties, without betraying what was due to the business of the public? I ask the hon. and learned Gentlemen what evidence they could bring in support of such an allegation? Did they bring any then? If not, why did they not bring it in the shape of a petition to this House, if they wished this House to take notice of the circumstance? Was it not vain to discuss an allegation which could not be supported by a single witness or by formal statement to this House? With respect to the course which the Attorney General for Ireland pursued in this matter, I entirely approve of it; and nothing will induce me to shrink from my share of the responsibility of his proceedings. I think he did quite right in demurring to the challenge to the array, and that he would have done very wrong if he had consented to have joined issue upon the allegations made in it. The challenger said that he had reason to believe, and was indeed convinced that a fraud had been committed in making up the Panel. But by whom had this alleged fraud been committed? No one was named. I cannot imagine any one against whom such an imputation could be seriously laid. Now, it is as foreign to my nature, as I think it to this inquiry, to cast any suspicion on Mr. M'Grath. I do not say whether there was any foundation even for suspicion; but I do entirely agree with my right hon. Friend, the Attorney General for Ireland, that if the affidavit I allude to were produced in any Court in Westminster Hall, it would not have delayed the proceedings one moment longer than was necessary for reading it. The learned Judge would have said, "Read the affidavit again, what fraud does it disclose? Who perpetrated it? Does the deponent swear he did not practise it himself?" I do not for a moment mean to impute or suggest the notion of the fraud in question having been perpetrated by any of the traversers, or of those privy to them; I am only discussing the bare affidavit as it would probably have been discussed if it had been read in the Courts of Westminster; and all I can say is, if the traversers are not satisfied with the way in which it was treated in Ireland, let Mr. O'Connell and his friends move for a new trial, and so try the merits of the question. That is the best answer I can give to the charges on the other side with respect to the Jury Panel. Don't come and tell us about strong expressions having been used, and about the trial not being a fair one. You come and tell us in Parliament that Mr. O'Connell has not had a fair trial; I say, go and prove it before the Judges in Ireland and have another. The fraud alleged which is supposed to have vitiated the Trial, can only have been perpetrated in one of two quarters, on the part of the Crown or its agents, or by the traversers, or some one in their behalf; and the parties connected with the Crown have all sworn distinctly that they have not been guilty of any fraud. With respect to the policy of adopting these prosecutions, I believe, that the state of Ireland was such as to leave the Government no choice but to adopt them. The question really was, whether we were to have any law in Ireland, or whether Mr. O'Connell was absolutely to supersede its authority. Things were in that state in Ireland, that if this prosecution had not been instituted, we might have awoke one morning and found the Viceroy of Ireland had been shipped back to us, and the Parliament sitting in College-green, without any further intimation or warning; for it was studiously put forth and argued, throughout all these proceedings, that the Imperial Parliament had no right to legislate for Ireland. One word, before I sit down, upon the subject of Ireland. I can assure the House, most unfeignedly, that I enter upon this subject in no spirit of bitterness or vindictiveness. It has been said, that this is a religious question; but in my humble judgment, if it ever was a religious question, it has ceased to be so altogether. It is purely a question of State; the grievances complained of and their remedies are essentially matters of State; and if I were called upon to point out the most likely and easy course to a remedy for those evils, of which this country as well as Ireland has to complain, I would point to the speech made by the hon. Member for Roscommon the other evening. Let hon. Members and other friends of Ireland speak and act in the spirit of that speech, and we should have a short and easy remedy to all the grievances in Ireland. The Motion and the speech of the noble Lord the Member for London, appear to involve the destruction of the Church in Ireland as a remedy for her grievances and distresses. But it appears to me that similar grievances and distresses existed in Ireland long before that Church was established, and to quite the same extent as since. And the hon. and learned Member for Liskeard said, that if the Church were abolished in Ireland the work of improvement will then only have to begin. Now, we cannot legislate for Ireland in this or any other matter, without legislating for England also. Let us see whether we cannot legislate to the advantage of Ireland, at the same time consistently with the interests of England. I hope that much that has passed in the course of this debate will tend to produce a more cordial feeling between the people of the two countries than has existed before, and thereby promote the general happiness and welfare of the United Empire. No doubt, England without Ireland, or with Ireland disaffected, would be robbed of half her strength, and much of her happiness. With this feeling I am prepared to go along with the right hon. Baronet in all the remedial measures which he has proposed for Ireland. On the subject of Education, in particular, I know no limits which should be set to improvements in this matter, but the means of the richer country, and the necessities of the poorer. It is impossible for one who has benefited, as I have, by the splendid endowments connected with Education in this country, not to feel an earnest desire for their enlarged application. With regard, generally, to the aspect of affairs in Ireland, I should regret very much if there were any feeling of hopelessness and despondency on the one hand, or of alarm on the other, as to their eventual state. Those who promote this agitation to dissolve the Union, are trifling with the safety of the mightiest Empire that ever existed on the face of the earth, with interests of more vast importance than were ever before confided by the Providence of God to the wisdom of man. The interests of the whole human race are bound up with the prosperity of this country, a misfortune to this country would be a calamity to the whole world, by arresting the march of improvement, of enterprise, and of discovery; and, above all, arresting the progress of the regenerating influence of those pious endeavours by which we are led to hope "that the knowledge of the Lord shall one day cover the earth, as the waters cover the sea." In the true spirit of kindness, of sympathy, and of candour, I conclude by expressing a sincere hope, that for the sake of all mankind the counsels which we shall adopt may be such as to secure the peace, union, and prosperity of the entire Empire.

Mr. Roebuck said, that no one could have listened to the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down without those feelings of respect and regard which his character always inspired. He could not help observing, however, and with regret, that in the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech—as, indeed, in too many which had been made during the last two or three nights of the debate—there was too much attention devoted to matters of secondary consideration, referring to an incidental occurrence, in which much skill was undoubtedly shown by the contending parties, but in the course of which, unfortunately, the more important considerations involved in the terms of the Motion before the House were entirely lost sight of. The noble Lord invited the House to enter into a consideration of various matters relating to the present condition of Ireland. Hon. Gentlemen, who had spoken from the opposite benches, said to the noble Lord, "This is not the time to enter upon such an enquiry, and you are not the fit person to introduce it." They added, that the propounder of such an investigation ought to be one who enjoyed the confidence of the Government, and that, above all things, it ought not to be undertaken now in consequence of the peculiar circumstances of difficulty which existed at the present moment. But it appeared to him that it was the duty of the House in times of danger to be foremost in making enquiry as to the causes of that danger, and the party who were responsible for having brought on that state of things whereby the horrors of a civil war and the dismemberment of the Empire were threatened. Instead of being allowed to institute this inquiry, however, they were told by hon. Gentlemen opposite to have confidence in those who, being in power at the time, had brought or suffered things to come to this state. Now, he must say that he did not think that this was a sufficient answer to the grounds which had been urged in support of this inquiry. There were two distinct points connected with the condition of Ireland which demanded calm inquiry. First, the physical condition of the great mass of the people; and, secondly, their moral condition, as affected by the legislation of this country. No one could look at the present state of Ireland, without being struck with the remarkable anomalies which she presented. There we beheld a country upon which every good gift of nature had been lavished, a population having every requisite of happiness within their reach,—they found a people with virtues and physical capabilities to apply those means to advantage; and yet, looking beyond the outward features of the case into the actual state and condition of the people, they found convincing evidence that they were miserable—probably the most miserable set of men in the world. And there was this remarkable circumstance which struck one in addition, that these people were situated side by side with a nation which surpassed all others in the skilful application of the productions and agencies of nature, in the means of acquiring wealth—that they were under the rule and government of this thriving nation, and yet, that, with all the seeming advantages of this connection, they were the most miserable nation on the face of the earth. This circumstance alone was sufficient to make men deeply ponder upon this state of things, and sedulously to enquire into the means of relieving a picture of so much misery; and were they, when they proposed to enter into such an inquiry, to be deterred from doing so by a Ministerial injunction not to meddle in the matter? But was there not now a circumstance existing of a still more alarming nature than the physical misery of the people of Ireland? Was there not a feeling of hostility to this country which poisoned all the springs of happiness, and divided as it were the country against itself? He did not wish to exaggerate, but this was a circumstance which certainly was at the root of all the misery in Ireland. The national feeling of Ireland was one of national hostility to this country. An Englishman could look back to the pages of history and the deeds of his forefathers with pride and gratulation; all their great deeds had been deeds of note in the cause of their liberties, and they had been crowned with success. But in Ireland the feeling of nationality was different. In looking back upon the long line of his ancestors, the Irishman did not contemplate a picture of happiness, of great deeds done to forward the well-being of the people, but to a long course of humiliation and miseries occasioned by the interposition of the power of England. The feeling which this recollection must awake, what could it be but that of hatred against the oppressive foes who had occasioned them all these miseries? The common nationality of feeling which ought to exist between the two countries was entirely poisoned by it. Now, in connection with this moral feeling, let the House consider the physical condition of the people of Ireland, and they would form something like an adequate notion of the inherent difficulties which the case of Ireland presented. But to these national and inherent ingredients of disaffection another had since been added. Religious bigotry had been added to national enmity—physical misery unparalleled was aggravated by a relentless religious bigotry. In general words, the condition of Ireland was that described by the noble Lord the other night. England held her only by the force of her arms. Let any soldier look at the map of Ireland, and follow with his eye the way in which our troops were disposed over the surface of that country; he would undertake to say, that no man at all conversant with military matters would do so, and not say that we had got military possession of Ireland. And why was this the case? Why was it that peace was only preserved by force; that fear and alarm were the only ingredients of power in the hands of the Government, and the poor discontented population of Ireland were kept in subjection only by the terrors of a military armament? Search the space of the globe round, he would undertake to say that they would not find another such combination of physical misery and political mischief. But even our arms were not strong enough to secure the peace of the country; that object was attained partly by our arms and partly by the influence of Mr. O'Connell. Was ever a case of the like kind, where the peace of a country was owing in great measure to the forbearance of a single individual? And this, in his opinion, was a symptom of the disease, which alone was sufficient to render inquiry necessary. This circumstance should make us most solicitous about this question. For it should be borne in mind that the nations of other states of Europe and of America were not supposed to be very solicitous to promote the peace and prosperity of this Empire. The preservation of peace at the present moment depended in a great measure upon accident. If the sagacious monarch who ruled the destinies of France were to die to-morrow, peace might be broken directly. And there was nothing so likely to induce the interruption of our peaceful relations as the knowledge amongst our neighbours of the internal weakness the Empire laboured under in the disaffection of the Irish people. The national vanity of France had long induced a party of her subjects to desire to try again the fortune of war with us. A similar feeling, added to commercial considerations, was rife in the United States; and either of the above nations would not be backward, if occasion offered, of taking advantage of our weakness in Ireland to attack us. Let the House mark what was said in the Congress of the United States, let them see how our encroaching oligarchy was spoken of there—men wise in their generation, who would take advantage of any circumstance which seemed to point out the course of coming events. He hoped the lights of experience would not be thrown away upon this House. After the able exposition on the subject which had been made the other evening by the right hon. Member for Edinburgh, he would not now travel back over the past history of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman, in the course of his speech, had given an able exposition, compressed and lucid, of the history of the relations between Ireland and this country. He clearly made out that the misery of Ireland was deducible from two principal sources: first, that we had conquered that people, and, secondly, that before the population of the two countries had become amalgamated we incurred the additional misfortune of imparting religious discord into Ireland. Here we had the origin of all the evils that at present tormented Ireland. They commenced with the conquest, and were aggravated by the Reformation, and we were reaping the fruits of this combination of evils. Contrast the popular feelings of the two countries. In England our feelings and watchwords were all connected with the good points of our Constitution, our liberty and rights; in Ireland they were all mementos of slavery and misery. To put an illustration, the storm that blew at the time of the Reformation had raised a violent commotion, which had not ceased, though the storm itself had ceased to blow; the waves were rolling, though the winds had gone down. In Ireland this agitation had been manifested in hostility, jealousy, and doubt in regard to England; in England it was shown in bigotry and hate towards Ireland; and in later years, though there had been less cause for hate, the bigotry remained unimpaired. The right hon. Gentleman had clearly shown all this; there was no hiatus in the history, until he came to the year 1829, from which to 1835 he made a remarkable leap. It must strike every one at once, that something strange must have happened within this period; and such was the fact. Within that period the Coercion Act had been passed for Ireland. What did he deduce from this fact? This Act had been passed under remarkable circumstances. The English people had recently obtained a measure by which they fancied that their liberties would be better preserved, and the popular voice made to prevail in this House; and the consequence of this seemed to be that the Government of the country would for the future be carried on according to the views of the people of England. This fact was looked upon with uneasiness and apprehension by the people of Ireland, and increased the feeling of doubt, distrust, hatred, and jealousy against the people of this country. And that suspicion, he had no doubt, was not altogether unfounded, when they looked at the circumstances which had attended the passing of that Bill. It had been passed by the overwhelming majority of the Liberal party, which had been first returned under the enthusiasm of the Reform Bill. Then, said the Irish people, if these are the popular expressions of the English, well we know what we are to expect. We see that whatever party is in power, Ireland is to be coerced—we cannot hope for liberty and equality, for those who are at the head of liberty and liberal principles in England are despots when they come to deal with Ireland. The reason he mentioned these circumstances, was to show what he thought the true cause of dissatisfaction, and though they might, and had, produced a sort of lull or calm in the popular mind from 1831 to 1834, they had, at the same time, done that which kept alive and increased the suspicion with which our proceedings in reference to Ireland were viewed, and that suspicion was fanned into flame the moment a special cause arose to ignite it. And what had been the occasion of the continuance of the calm to which he had alluded? The Government, seeing the errors of their predecessors, on returning to office, in 1834, got rid of certain persons, who were the foremost in that House in vindicating the propriety of the conduct of those parties who then ruled Ireland. And it had surprised him that, in the lucid and eloquent history which had been given by his right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Macaulay) of Irish affairs and Irish Government, this period had been wholly passed over. He suspected that the circumstance about which he expressed his wonder arose from the peculiar position of parties in that House in reference to each other. Neither party appeared disposed to say very much about the Coercion Bill. The reason was obvious why it was not alluded to by the other side; and he thought there were equally good reasons for silence upon the subject on that, the Opposition side. But as he was of neither party, he took the responsibility upon himself of pointing out the circumstance to which he referred to the House. As he had said, the Government of that day had pursued a much wiser course than their predecessors in reference to Ireland, viz.—a course of conciliation towards the Irish people. He now came to that which was the cause of much of the annoyance, which right hon. Gentlemen the Members of the present Government were now suffering; and here “retribution followed wrong.” The Opposition which had been created and followed out by the party to the well-intentioned endeavours of the late Ministry to right the Irish people, was recoiling upon themselves. This was the cause of the discord and discontent in Ireland, and of the great difficulty the Government experienced in governing that country. Unfortunately Ireland was always the battle-field for party conflict in England. When the Tories were in power it was found convenient for the party on that side to take advantage of the wrongs of Ireland, and to resort to them as the armoury from which to obtain weapons for attacking the Government; and when the Whigs were in power, the armoury which the position of Ireland furnished was resorted to with equal avidity and advantage by the Tories. The array of this grand attack was Ireland; but in their case it was not the wrongs of Ireland that furnished them with weapons, but the bigotry of their party. Danger to the Protestant faith was the thing with them. Here, said they, is an attack upon our religion. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University said, I am here to vindicate religious truth. Assuming to himself infallibility. [Mr. Shaw: “No, no.”] On the most mysterious and difficult subject of human contemplation, that man of all others, who had so lately had reason to know his fallibility in mere human matters, he who had taken the utmost pains, with the most perfect intentions of arranging some 700 or 800 names, had, nevertheless, fallen into an error in so small a matter—he it was, who, on the point of religious faith, claimed infallibility. [Mr. Shaw: I do not.] This was the manner in which the attacks between the two parties of that House were carried on. There was this, however, to be said against the one party—and it was a circumstance which added to the suspicion obtaining in the Irish mind—that when the Liberal party were in power, with a majority almost unprecedented, and the means of passing what they pleased, but little liberality was shown in their conduct to Ireland; but the moment they fell into difficulties, and, with their party, were in danger of being overwhelmed by their opponents, they fell back to the principles of liberality—they returned to their reform professions when it was too late, and they were driven from power by that combination of circumstances to which they had themselves contributed. One of the main elements of their defeat was the cry raised amongst the people of England, by the opposite party, respecting their consideration of what was termed the favour shown to the Popish religion. In producing this feeling a forced bigotry was created opposed to the spirit of the country. The flame had been ignited, and hon. Gentlemen opposite were now in office, and whatever mischief that flame might have produced, or might yet produce, he had done what he had intended to do, viz., supply the links in the chain of history, which had been omitted in the retrospect of the right hon. Member for Edinburgh. He now came to the consideration of the great cause of the Repeal agitation in Ireland—the circumstances attending the Episcopal Establishment in Ireland—and it was those circumstances so painful to the great majority of the Irish people, that had created the present state of mind in Ireland, and had induced the people to resist in every possible way the Government opposite, and to demand separation from this country. Why, the cause could not be far off when they looked back to what had taken place. The cause of all this discontent and agitation was not the hon. and learned

Member for Cork. That hon. and learned Gentleman's proceedings were merely one of the symptoms. Great as was the individual influence of the hon. and learned Member, his power arose not from himself, not from any act of his own, but from the state of mind of the Irish people, and the wrongs by which that state of mind had been created. The great majority of the people found that a feeling of hatred existed against them in this country on the part of those who were supposed to represent the bigotry which had been raised in this country, and in spite of the good intentions of the Government, which he would speak of as favourably as he could—and he gave every possible belief to the good intentions of the leaders of the party in power—still they were found to represent that bigotry and hatred of the great majority of the Irish people, which did to a certain extent prevail, and which if it was not felt by the leaders of the Government, was possessed by every one of their subordinates in Ireland. The Government had no doubt entered into office actuated by the kindest and most benevolent intentions; but the great evil was the great curse of their Government, that there good intentions were rendered unavailing by that small and bigotted minority to whom Ireland owed all her misfortunes. Say what they would, this was the feeling of the people of that country. It could not be denied that a great number of the appointments which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite had been made in a perfectly fair and honest spirit, but what said the people? They said to the right hon. Baronet, it is very well for you to claim the reputation of being thus liberal and benevolent in your intentions towards us, but we find all our old enemies are in power—all those persons who we recollect, and who our fathers recollect, as the most active enemies of the people and of freedom; and who we remember also as the most active instruments in some of the most furious attacks upon the liberties of the mass of the people of Ireland that ever disgraced a Government. He had a book containing an account of prosecutions for conspiracy, so late as the year 1811, when certain Roman Catholic gentlemen were tried for conspiring together to petition Parliament to remove the political disabilities under which the Roman Catholic population then laboured. And many persons in Ireland were still living who had been present at those trials, defending the Roman Catholics. Many were also living who had been present as their accusers; and the party now in power, in spite of all their intentions, had found, on coming to office, that the persons who had been active in those prosecutions, must be employed as their colleagues in the government of Ireland. And this was a cause of the suspicion with which the Irish people looked upon the Government. Then came the question, was there any means of repairing the mischief, and allaying the discontent which had been occasioned? The cause of the mischief was, the discontent of the Irish people, and the result was the agitation for Repeal. The point to be considered was, could anything be done to relieve the people from the effects of that overwhelming mischief? Could they, in that Parliament, sit and legislate for the benefit of all classes in both countries, and could they do that which should relieve the Irish people from the dire evils under which they suffered, and produce content in that country? Now, the first thing he had to inquire was, would the Repeal of the Legislative Union have that effect? His answer was, that it would not. He believed it would rather aggravate the mischief at the moment, and be followed by still greater danger hereafter. The minority in Ireland were powerful and rich, and if they had Repeal to-morrow, it would be impossible to maintain the connection between the two countries by the mere trifling bond of allegiance to the Crown. There would be two separate people in the two countries, and the Irish people would still have to fight out their own liberty. He said, then, he could not see any one mischief greater to Ireland than the Repeal of the Union, unless it was a continuation of military government. He should be wrong if he did not at once say, that however much he was opposed to Repeal, he should do himself injustice if he did not say, that while he deprecated—no one could do so more than himself—much that had been done, and still more that had been said, by those who had been foremost in the Repeal movement—still the object which those parties desired it was perfectly competent for them to ask. It was perfectly legal for any man to desire the repeal of any Act of Parliament. And here he must repeat what had already been said by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Worcester (Sir T. Wilde), who had asserted, not as the hon. and learned Attorney General had interpreted his words—that it was prudent or wise to demand the Repeal of the Union; but his hon. and learned Friend had laid it down that the demand was a legal one, and might be made. The hon. and learned Attorney General, on the contrary, had asserted that it was an illegal object to seek to attain the Repeal of the Union. Now, with all respect for that hon. and learned Gentleman's authority, he (Mr. Roebuck) contended that the object was perfectly legal—whether the demand were prudent or not was a totally different question. There were matters connected with the government of the country so important in themselves, and involving consequences so large, that to interfere with them, required much care and forethought on the part of those who would touch them without danger. And so it was with the Repeal of the Union. There was nothing more dangerous to instil into the minds of the Irish people than the idea that it was idle for them to attempt to obtain the reform of the miseries under which they were suffering except by a separation from this country; and he was sure the hon. and learned Member for Cork must, during the last few days, have become convinced that it was unfortunate that he had aroused feelings of national animosity on the part of the Irish people against this country, however much those feelings might have been justified in times past. He was sure no good or wise man would attempt to renew those feelings; on the contrary, if it could be done, it would be most desirable that all feelings of national antipathy should be struck out from every man's mind. If that could be done, how much wiser and better would they be; and surely it could not be the desire of him, whose chief object was the benefit of mankind, to revive national antipathies by using the watchwords of national hate. He was quite sure that what had been witnessed by that hon. and learned Gentleman (who possessed so much influence in Ireland) since his arrival in this country, would strike deeply into his mind, and convince him that feelings of sympathy for Ireland did obtain amongst the English people. Then, was he to say that the woes of Ireland were to be remedied only by force? Was there no alternative—force or concession? Now, what could be expected from force? At the best it would but leave them where they were. And what was that? With an army of 25,000 men, or 21,000 men, as the Government returns stated, but which returns did not include the army of the Constabulary, and with a garrison in Ireland from one end to the other, did they expect the people of England would bear the continuance of such a state of things for any length of time? But suppose they did. They had the army in Ireland, which they must maintain there so long as discontent continued; and discontent would continue so long as the causes which had produced it continued to exist. Those causes were to be found deeply set in the institutions of the country, which institutions they had created by force and fraud; and when there was an outbreak against such institutions, the people were coerced into peace by the presence of an army. If this was to be the mode of governing Ireland, what a waste of treasure and of blood would ensue; and even that would fail to prevent feelings of animosity prevailing even deeper than any that now existed; and under such circumstances the last hope and resource would be to get rid altogether of such an unhappy companion. This would be the last consolation of a Government of force. They found in 1843 a strong feeling in Ireland that they had no confidence in the legislature of that House. The man who possessed greater power and influence in Ireland than any other was spreading the opinion throughout Ireland that the only hope of justice was in separation. What course did the Government then take? Did they do anything to soothe the feelings of the people, and to redress their wrongs? Did they do anything by which that equality should really be extended which every man of a dignified and generous spirit not only required for himself, but for his fellows? Equality did not and could not exist, while the present Church Establishment remained. No step had been taken—nothing had been done—to convince Ireland that, in the opinion of this country and of Parliament, equality was necessary for the Irish people. They had not yet reached the point for which the hon. Member for Wakefield contended, who had asked the House to deal with the Church of Ireland as they would deal with the question of Free-trade. On that subject they acknowledged the true principles, and took their own time to carry them out. The hon. Gentleman's suggestion was an useful one, and, if adopted, might be attended with beneficial advantages to the Government themselves. But upon the question of the Irish Church, "no surrender" was still the cry—and the motto of the other side—and expressed in terms as offensive as any that had been used in former times. But he had not thought the liberal spirit of the right hon. Baronet would have taken up that doctrine, and that he would have stood up for what was called the maintenance of religious truth by means of the institutions of that country. For the moment they did this the State Church was no longer a Church of political necessity, but a persecuting Church. He could understand the man who said, "I am obliged to maintain it as a political institution. I do not say which religion is right, but I am obliged to uphold this." The feeling thus created was different from that which was produced by the man who said, like the right hon. and learned Recorder (Mr. Shaw), "I maintain those Institutions and this Church as the best;" and with that dogged feeling which showed the party to which he belonged, and from whence he drew his opinions, said, "I will maintain the true religion by means of the State Church;" and carrying out his principles by being a persecutor in reality. This persecution was only narrowed in its consequences by the want of power. The spirit of bigotry existed, but it was deprived of much of its mischief, because those who maintained it had lost their power. There was not a man on that side who would go with the right hon. and learned Gentleman. It was easy to assert such an opinion, and then, when the natural inference was drawn from it, to say that was not my meaning. He was not pressing on the right hon. Gentleman what was his intention, he had merely repeated what he had said. The right hon. Gentleman had said he would maintain the Church, because it was the supporter of religious truth; and he contended that any man who maintained a Church Establishment as a means of upholding what he considered religious truth, was a persecutor in spirit. It was infallibility, and no longer State necessity, that was his motive. Then the State necessity ceasing, persecution coming into its place, the people of Ireland had a right to rise up against it, and say, "we also have an infallible religion," and that religion, which had seven to one of the people in its favour, had, he imagined, seven claims to one in its favour. The right hon. Gentleman ought to have some charity for others. He believed the feelings which had been created by the system of persecution to which he had referred was precisely that which would continue all that religious animosity which had been the bane of Ireland, and was the means of perpetuating that national hate which all condemned. Now he wanted to know what was to be done under the circumstances? The Government had employed force to govern Ireland, and they had used the law; he would not say they had wrested the law; legal forms had been maintained with very great nicety: but what he did say was, that in spite of every explanation that had been given, it was quite clear that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had mistaken the functions of his office, and had, in the conduct of the late trials, supposed himself to be a mere nisi prius advocate, whose business it was to obtain a verdict, and that only; instead of saying, "I am here, the minister of the law, and uninfluenced as the Judge who is to try the cause; I go not to convict, but should be happy if it could be proved that the traversers were innocent; but it is my duty to maintain the law, and I will do that in such a way as shall create for the law feelings of respect from my manner and my conduct; nothing that I do shall militate against the law, for I am here its minister, and as it were its incarnation." But the charge he made against the right hon. Gentleman was, that from the beginning to the end of the proceeding he misconceived his office. From the very commencement of the trial the right hon. and learned Gentleman had permitted feelings of personal animosity, to mix with his judicial duties, and while he was complaining of delay on the part of the traversers, he was himself guilty of indecent haste. This he would prove from the right hon. Gentleman's conduct; and it was proper the country should hear something in answer to the charge. The right hon. Gentleman had commenced his explanation by repeating a great portion of his own conduct in reference to certain refusals he had given to requests made by the traversers, and asserting that those refusals were the result of the conduct of the traversers themselves; and he spoke of two instances, the one in reference to certain interference with the witness, Mr. Bond Hughes, and the other with respect to the Jurors and to certain notices which had been served. First, he said the witness had been persecuted, and then the Jurors. Now, with regard to the witness, it was clear that Mr. Hughes had seen Mr. Barrett at Mullaghmast, and rightly attributed to him a certain speech. Therefore it was supposed Mr. Hughes knew that party. Afterwards Mr. Hughes attributed two other speeches as having been uttered at certain meetings, at which it appeared subsequently that Mr. Barrett was not present. This, then, was a palpable mistake. There was a reason why Mr. Barrett should be included in the information, he being an editor of one of the papers which advocated the Repeal movement. Then was there anything wrong on the part of the accused in saying this is an unsafe witness? He is to give evidence of what he has heard and seen, and we show you he has twice been in error; and we have a right, under the circumstances, to charge him with being so wilfully. And it was remarkable, that when it was attempted to bring this witness to trial for his conduct, the Crown Lawyers, though they knew he had made a mistake (for he had told them of it), did not acknowledge or explain the fact to the traversers, but allowed the charge of perjury to go on, and the witness to remain under the imputation. The fact was known by Mr. Kemmis, and he thought also by the Attorney General. The former was deeply culpable, and if the Attorney General was aware of the facts, he must also share the blame. As to the Jury Notices, no objection, except on notice served, could be taken. By the Act of Parliament this was imperative. The right hon. Gentleman the Recorder, in reference to the Jury List, had a two-fold duty—first, he had that of a judge, and then as a ministerial officer. In the first character he was to vindicate each man's right to be on the list that was finished the 23rd of November. Then came his ministerial functions, and it appeared the right hon. Gentleman had neglected this duty and had left it to a subordinate. The affidavit of the traversers had not been denied, and until the facts there stated were contradicted, he had a right to assume they were correct. One of the officers in the right hon. and learned Gentleman's office was Mr. McGrath. Now, let them remark the way in which this Gentleman had been dealt with by the Attorney General for Ireland. The Attorney General insinuated that there was something wrong in his office, and he had pointed pretty distinctly and very significantly to Mr. McGrath. Now, mark how the spirit in which these trials were conducted sprung up on every side, and in every possible shape. Mr. McGrath was a Catholic, and, therefore, he must be utterly regardless of the duties of his office, and must do—what? Must abstract fifteen

Catholic names from the Panel which was about to try, or rather from which Jurors were to be selected to try, Catholic traversers. So that the Attorney General makes out this, that the Catholics are so in love with grievances that they were determined to strike off their friends from the Panel, in order to have an opportunity of complaining to the House. And upon that species of statement, on no better ground, the right hon. Gentleman chose to make an insinuation which should subject Mr. McGrath, were it well-founded, to instant punishment, for having filched fifteen names from the list to serve certain purposes of his own. Now, when he recollected all the attacks which the right hon. and learned Gentleman had lately made upon those who were opposed to him, surely he had at least a right to say that he was not very careful or prudent in his accusation, and that there was not much trust to be placed in his judgment, he said nothing of his honour. On Saturday, the 28th of December, the right hon. and learned Gentleman returned to Ireland. On that day he stated that he had given the jury-book to the Sheriff; and on the previous day (the 27th) the notice had been served on the traversers to strike on the 3rd of January. So that this notice had been served before the book was in the hands of the Sheriff, and the book was not given to the traversers themselves until the 3rd of January. During the whole period therefore, from the 24th of November to the 28th of December, there was nothing done by which the List should be made out and communicated to the traversers; but, on the contrary, every thing was done to keep it back until the last moment; and then, of course, hurry and confusion ensued. What were the consequences? Why, one consequence was, that when the 3rd of January came, the copies having only just been furnished, an objection was taken, and it was said, "We cannot strike, we have only just got the copies." And yet the complaint was made on the part of the Attorney General that there was a great delay sought for by the opposite party. Yes there was a delay sought, and very properly sought too, and what was that delay? He took the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself. The Jury Panel of 1843 was, according to him, wholly unfit for the purposes of the trial. But the Attorney General made a motion to the effect that the day fixed for the trials should be the 11th of December. What was the duty of the Counsel for the traversers? It would be to say, "It is clear that this is not a fair trial—will not the law allow us the means of fighting off the trial until we can get a fair panel?" And he asked every man who heard him whether this procedure was not justifiable? Were the persons who conducted the late trials to be allowed to turn round and say that the spirit of haste and precipitation which they had manifested had arisen out of these applications for delay? These applications were not only justifiable, but desirable—desirable not only on the part of the traversers, but on the part of the Government; for, had the traversers been tried under the Panel of 1843—a Panel stigmatised by the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself—what would the world have said? Why, it would have said, that even the Recorder for Dublin admitted that the Panel was an unfair one. And yet the imputation of struggling for undue delay was cast upon the traversers. Now he repeated, and he challenged any man in the House or out of it to deny, that there was anything which was not fair, perfectly justifiable, in the traversers using any means which the law allowed them to take advantage of it in order to fight off the evil and injustice of being tried by that Panel. But what happened next? The traversers applied for certain names. Here came the answer of the Attorney General. He would not give names, because of the manner in which they had treated Mr. Bond Hughes. One of the Judges said that the names ought to be given; another that he did not agree that the traversers had an actual legal right to demand them, but that they should have them; and a third said that the application was merely made too soon. The traversers said they would be content if the names they wanted were supplied ten days before the trial. The application was rejected. Now, he would show the spirit in which the thing had all along been carried on. Had they a man of kind and enlightened mind, how differently would these trials have proceeded. He could fancy a way in which the proceedings could have been conducted, which would not have rendered them liable to the imputations which had so deservedly been cast upon them. There were four days allowed to plead. The indictment was found at five o'clock in the afternoon; a copy was not handed to the traversers until seven o'clock; and yet the Attorney General wished to have that day counted as one of the four. Take that as a specimen of the man. Again, on the demurrer, the Attorney General wished the traversers to join issue upon all the points instant. What said then this mild personage—this kind man, who was to represent all the kindness of his sovereign—why he immediately said, "I stand here on my prerogative, and I demand that this one day—that on which the indictments were found—shall be considered as one of the four on which the traversers are to plead." He asked what any fair man would think of such conduct? "I stand here upon my Prerogative!" He supposed that the Queen wished her subjects to be tried by a beneficent law, and not in this vindictive spirit. But the Judges, acting on a proper sense of their own dignity—feeling that that dignity was involved in the question—overruled the "Prerogative" of the Attorney General. Why did he mention these things? He did so in answer to the statements of the right hon. and learned Gentleman as to the traversers having struggled so hardly for undue and unnecessary delay. Yes, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had made a grand point as to the unfair fighting for delay; but he repeated solemnly that the fighting for delay was as justifiable on the one side, as the struggle to hurry matters to a crisis was indecent on the other. Now the motion on the part of the traversers to quash the Panel was made on a statement of fraud positively attested by an affidavit. But his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for England asked, by whom was the fraud committed? Why, the traversers replied that they did not know, but that they would show that a fraud did exist, or, at all events, they would show that there were such circumstances connected with the Panel that, if there was no fraud, there had been a degree of culpable negligence; and, that if there had not been a degree of culpable negligence, there had at all events been a degree which very much militated against them, the traversers. And what did Judge Perin say? That the case was one of grave suspicion. Now he wished to know why the fraud had not been denied. Certain parties were charged on affidavit with fraud, which it was denied that the parties making the affidavit had anything to do with. A similar case occurred to a predecessor of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General in 1812. There was then a demurrer similar to the late one, and a challenge to the array, stating fraud on the part of the Sheriff. Now, what had been the reply? Why, that the allegation was so flagrantly untrue, that they were ready to join issue upon the facts. But in the present case the conclusion that they could draw from the conduct of the Attorney General was, that the allegation was not flagrantly untrue—that he was afraid to take issue upon the facts. The justice of the case was tarnished by the constitution of the Panel. But that was not all. The Attorney General for Ireland stated, that he had no alternative in this case but to go back to the Panel of 1843, or to put off the trials until 1845, and that, therefore, he had persevered in the course which he had taken. Now for a moment admitting this, could the traversers have been worse off with the List of 1843 than they were with that of 1844, when by a fraud so many persons had been struck off the Panel that the traversers were deprived of a fair chance, and had none but enemies upon the Jury, so that, under the circumstances, they could not have been worse off, but they might have been better off. But, supposing that there was no other alternative, was there no ground for hesitating as to the trials after a fraud had been charged and proved with respect to the constitution of the Panel. Common prudence might have whispered, “put off the trials upon any condition. Go forward to 1845, or go back to 1843, but don’t let trial go on under the stigma of fraud.” But the Attorney General had another alternative—he had the alternative of a Common Jury. What happened? The leading Counsel for the traversers offered that if the Attorney General would discharge the Special Jury, that they would consent that the Court should direct its officer to return a Panel of respectable persons from the Jury List, from whom the Jury might be selected. That offer was refused. But there was this course which might and which should have been pursued. The Attorney General should have moved for a discharge of his rule, taken a Common Jury, and tried by that Jury. He might have challenged that Jury as he thought proper. He might have said, that such a man was a Member of the Repeal Association, and as such have challenged him. As to the fact of a man’s entertaining opinions favourable to Repeal, he would remark, he did not think that constituted any ground for his being challenged. Was it not clear that the persons who were left on the List were of very opposite character—persons hostile to the hon. and learned Member for Cork? Parties were left on the List to whom there was as much objection on the one hand, as there was to Repealers on the other. He would draw a very wide distinction between Repealers and Members of the Repeal Association. The fact of being a Member of the Repeal Association was included in the indictment, but the fact of being a mere Repealer was not, and he (Mr. Roebuck) could conceive a man unconnected with the Repeal Association, and yet who entertained favourable opinions towards Repeal, being a quite unobjectionable person to serve on the Jury. Now he wanted the right hon. and learned Gentleman to explain why the Common Jury had not been taken. Pending such clear explanation he could only come to the same conclusion as his learned Friend the Member for Worcester, that they did not take the Common Jury because they did not dare to strike off from it those whose names they wished to get rid of, and that they took the Special Jury because they believed that that course gave them a better chance of getting a Jury such as they desired, than they would be likely to obtain by taking a Common Jury. After having condemned so much of the constitution of the Jury Panel, he would not trouble the House with further detail upon the subject, but he thought that he had said much that went to show that there were great causes for distrust and suspicion about the whole of the proceedings of those prosecutions. He did not say whether it happened by fraud or through accident, but it was unfortunately the fact—most unfortunately for the prosecutors—that there were circumstances connected with them which utterly destroyed their moral influence in Ireland as in this country. England would not bear to see the forms of law thus trifled with—thus perverted—thus subjected to abuse. And they might depend upon it that after all their array of Judges, of jurors, and of counsel, they had at last exalted the hon. and learned Member for Cork into a species of martyr, and had turned the tide of English feeling in his favour, just at the moment when his own imprudence had turned that tide most strongly against him. Before those trials—he spoke for himself—all his feelings were strongly against the hon. and learned Gentleman; but he had since seen such oppressive measures taken—he had seen the forms of law perverted in such a disgraceful way, that his feeling of indignation with respect to the former proceedings of the hon. and learned Gentleman had undergone a complete change. He still deeply disapproved of and lamented the unwise, the imprudent, and the mischievous course which the hon. and learned Gentleman pursued; but, in putting a stop to that course as they had done, Government had acted in a more mischievous and imprudent manner still. When it was said, that the late proceedings were trials fit for the occasion, he met them on the principle of the Attorney General for England, who said that it was a difficult thing to draw the distinction between the time when the prosecuted proceedings were legal, and when they were wrong and mischievous. It was very difficult to do this; to point to the moment when the meetings became illegal, and mischievous, and dangerous. When they were persuading men to be of their opinion by means of argument—so long as peace was maintained, so long as all the meetings held were perfectly peaceful—he wished to know how the traversers had acted illegally? What had made the meeting of those great multitudes illegal? Their own construction of it. The object of these meetings was legal—the means adopted for its attainment were legal, but they had construed from them, they had drawn by inference from them the conclusion that they were intended to overawe the Government by a display of force. And this, not because force was employed, but merely because a vast number of meetings were held. He quarrelled with the principle. It was difficult to say when this mode of persuading the people became illegal—how soon it became illegal to attempt to convert all people to one opinion. All had been done by persuasion. There was no force; all had been accomplished by meetings, by talking, by using moral influence. The Ministers admitted that all was done in peace, and with propriety. He wanted them to show him how, and when, and where the illegality commenced. Imprudent and mischievous much of the language used throughout the late proceedings undoubtedly was; he deeply deplored and condemned this, but still no case of illegality was made out. The persons accused were not convicted, or only convicted by a Jury whose verdict carried no moral influence. They had convicted the traversers, but they had not convinced the world. What was the moral effect of that conviction? It carried none. And what was the Government to do now? Where were they now? Were they not upon the very verge of those difficulties which they had always foreseen? Were they not beholden for the peace of Ireland at this moment to the man whom they had brought into the toils of the law? And what were their means of getting rid of the grievances complained of? He wished the physical misery of Ireland to be relieved; but that misery could not be relieved until they first got rid of civil dissensions. Let them produce peace and they would soon create happiness. They could not produce peace by the course which they had taken. As to his own opinion, he was for putting down the present system pursued with respect to the Church of Ireland. He would wish, as livings became vacant, that the proceeds should be put into the hands of Government, and that they should be expended upon the great cause of education. [Hear.] He wished to know from those who cried hear, the objection to this course. He would take no notice of the argument that the Church should be maintained because it was based upon religious truth. He wished to know why it should be maintained, doing nothing which a Church should do, but being the fertile source of misery and discontent. He would say, put it down, and let happiness and content be restored. Why did they not do so? He would tell them why: they were afraid that the principles which in such an event they would apply to Ireland, would one day be applied to England. But they might take this difference with them—the Church of England was not the Church of merely one-seventh part of the population. It was really the Church of a very large proportion of the people—a Church which they loved and venerated; but the Church of Ireland was at once a dominant Church, and a sinecure Church—hated by six-sevenths of the population. The great grievance was the Church of Ireland, and if the time should ever come when the Church of England should be the Church of only one-seventh of the population, he thought he knew his countrymen well enough to be pretty sure that under such circumstances it would not be maintained a day. It was maintained now because it was the Church of a large body of the people; but the Irish Church could be maintained by the bayonet, and the bayonet only. He would ask, were Christian feelings—were Christian truths in any way forwarded by such an institution; and could they, desiring the peace and happiness of not merely Ireland, but of England, and not merely England, but of the whole world—could they persevere in maintaining such an institution? Could there be any doubt as to the course which they should pursue? No; the path was clear—it lay straight before them—to pursue it, only required some man who should have that in him which should teach him the way to lead the people—it only required a man who could teach as well as govern—who would put himself above the prejudices of his time, and by incurring that responsibility, receive the great reward of his magnanimity, the admiration of posterity.

Mr. O'Connell spoke as follows: Sir, I hope that there is not an individual in this House who will suppose that I have risen to say anything about myself, or that there is an individual in this House, who, after I have said what I intend to say, will have discovered—had he not known it by other means—that I had any personal interest in the late trials: Sir, I rise for another purpose: I am here to make a protestation, I am here to ask a question, I am here to protest in the name of my country, and on behalf of my countrymen, against the commission of one additional injustice to Ireland; and I am also here to ask the simple question of how is Ireland to be governed? I don't ask who is to govern it. I may have my preferences on that point—probably I have—but I ask, how is it to be governed? Sir, there is one fact which no man can deny; and that is—that there is no one country in the world which ever inflicted so much oppression, which ever committed so many crimes against another, as England has committed against Ireland. That, Sir, is an undeniable truth. It did not require the talents of the hon. and learned Gentleman, the Member for Edinburgh, to elicit that fact—every page of history teems with it—every page of history trumpets it forth to the world, that the greatest crimes that have ever been committed by one nation against another have been those of England against Ireland. But I do not mean to go through the history of Ireland to prove this point—I do not mean to go further back than the period of the Union. But for the misgovernment which has existed since the Union to the present day this Parliament is clearly responsible. You ought to think of the situation of Ireland at the Union, and compare it with its present state. If Ireland was then in a condition of distress and destitution, and if it has since arisen to prosperity and comfort, then applaud your Government, talk of your wisdom as statesmen, and refer to the fact of the transition from want and misery to plenty and comfort as decisive evidence of the wisdom of your councils. But is it so? Is that the state in which the facts are before the world? No, Sir, directly the reverse is the fact. At the period of the Union there was considerable prosperity in Ireland. For eighteen years before that time it had enjoyed the benefit of self-government, and it is a portion of history that no country in the world ever rose so fast in prosperity as Ireland did during those eighteen years. In the year 1800, when Mr. Pitt proposed the Act of Union, what were his arguments? He did not inform the House that Ireland was in a state of want and misery, and that, therefore, it would be advantageous for it to be connected with this great country, and to enjoy a participation in its commercial and manufacturing prosperity. No, Sir; the case he made out, the case which it was his duty to make out, and which the facts only warranted him in making out, was, that Ireland had advanced most rapidly in prosperity for years previously—that she exported three millions' worth of manufactured goods, and imported one million's worth of manufactured goods—that her prosperity had thus accumulated when she was separate from England, and that it was clear that if she were connected with a country so much richer than herself as England, that prosperity would be multiplied beyond calculation. He admitted, of course—he admitted, even against his own interest—that Ireland was in a state of prosperity; and the same thing was declared by the other side by one of the most powerful statesmen in Ireland—Lord Clare. Both concurred in the material point; but not content with letting well alone, not content with allowing that prosperity to go on progressing, they thought they could accelerate its progress by joining Ireland with England. How few there were informed of the fact, that at the time of the Union, Mr. Pitt thought that Ireland, prosperous as she then was, would multiply her prosperity in an incalculable degree by the carrying out of that measure. Sir, has the fact borne him out?

Is he justified in his prophecy? Is Ireland in a state of prosperity? I am not here to talk of claims for political, and what, in some cases, may be fanciful rights. I am not speaking of the franchise—or of corporate rights—or of Municipal rights—or of Parliamentary rights; but I am speaking of material and actual prosperity. Sir, what is the condition of Ireland? You talk of demagogues having power there. Oh! see the materials of their power—the poverty and distress of the country! I suppose many Gentlemen have read the Times newspaper of yesterday. I assure the House that it was not through any influence of mine that it published the paragraph which I refer to. I did not procure it for it; but if I did, I could not get one better for my purpose. I mean the notice of a work upon Ireland. There is a German traveller, Kohl, who has visited all the countries of Europe, and who has published accounts of his travels. He is unconnected with Ireland, he has no sympathies with Repealers; on the contrary, he showed a distrust towards them. That man, in his book on Ireland, has declared having travelled through all the countries of Europe—that, in none of them did he find distress such as he saw in Ireland. There was no such thing known in other countries; and this, Sir, forty-four years after the Union! But I may refer to another witness: there is a Gentleman of the very euphonious name of Wiggins. He is agent to Lord Headley; he was examined before Mr. Spring Rice's Committee, in 1830, to show that there then existed a good prospect for the prosperity of Ireland. He said, certainly the Union was not very useful as yet, but as we are coming to a period of tranquillity, by means of the adjustment of the Catholic claims, he conceived that there was every likelihood of future prosperity. He even quoted instances of this incipient prosperity. He has now published a book. Fifteen years after his prophecy he has published a book; and, being a man familiar with Ireland, and with the condition of the people, he has declared that poverty has increased—is increasing—that everything is growing worse—that the sufferings of the people are hardly pronounceable. Those are the materials on which a popular man in Ireland grows powerful. But I have still further evidence. Look again, at what the Poor Law Commissioners state. They enumerate 2,300,000 of the population, as being in a state of destitution, throughout a considerable portion of the year. Considerably more than one-third of the population were in a state of destitution throughout the year. It is not Kohl or Wiggins, or any other particular individual alone, but every one who has examined into it, that has found these facts. You have enumerated the population of Ireland—you did in 1821, again in 1831, and again in 1841. Captain Larcom, of the Artillery, superintended the enumeration in 1841. A Government report was made not only of the population, but of the state of the country too; and what facts do I find there? That out of the agricultural population 70 per cent. are in a state of poverty, living in cabins having only one room; and that 30 per cent. of the town population are in a similar state, no family having more than one room, and in some cases several families in the same room. That is Captain Larcom's testimony. And there is another fact, he gives, which will convince every one who reflects how horrid the state of distress must be. Between 1821 and 1831 the population increased rapidly. Between 1831 and 1841 the ratio of increase was 70,000 per annum less than in the previous decennial periods. There were consequently 700,000 persons less in 1841 than ought to have been, and could have been found in Ireland, if the ratio had gone on from 1831 to 1841 as it had from 1821 to 1831. Can any man who hears these facts—can any one who goes across the Channel and looks for himself deny them? And these are the effects of party—this is the situation into which we have been brought by your Government. I have shown that Ireland was prosperous before the Union. I have given you a faithful picture of her at present. Now how do you mean to govern Ireland? You can, to be sure, take legal proceedings against some of her people. You have sent an army over; but will that remedy the evils under which she is suffering—will it mitigate them? Will it ease the deplorable poverty in which the mass of the population is sunk? How little I should care for any thing that occurred at these trials, if I could rouse this House—if I could rouse the people of this country to a due sense of the condition of Ireland, and, by inducing you to give up past contentions, I could lead you to ameliorate the state of the people. And for this end the discussion you have had on this Motion is not wholly fruitless. I may be permitted to say, that I have felt the effect of it personally. With all my delinquencies on my head, the generous sympathy I have met in this country I shall never forget or conceal. I shall proclaim it from one end of Ireland to the other. This, then, is your time. Rally now for the elevation of the Irish people. Ah, but what little hope have we that this wise course will be taken? Is there any expectation of it? Is it prejudice to deny the probability of a better spirit actuating you? Has the Union been what it ought to be, the amalgamation of the two countries? It ought to have been an identification of the two Islands. There should have been no rights or privileges with one that should not have been communicated to the other. The Franchise should have been the same—all corporate rights the same—every civic privilege identical. Cork should have no more difference from Kent than York from Lancashire. That ought to have been the Union. That was Mr. Pitt's object. He distinctly obtained the sanction of the Sovereign to the measure on the ground of identifying the two people, which could not be done if a dominant religion was to be maintained. Emancipation was, therefore, part of the terms of the Union. The moment it was carried some ill-advisers of the Crown—some exceedingly conscientious men, who deemed their own religion the sole depository of religious truth, induced the King to withdraw his consent. The minister withdrew from office; but what folly, what absurdity it was not to complete a measure then ripe for adjustment! Is there any man living who will say the Union was completed? Is there any man on the other side of the House so besotted as not to admit that the Union was nominal and not real? See what an opportunity you then had of settling the differences which now beset you. There were eleven or fourteen of the Bishops—I don't exactly remember which—who were willing to receive salaries from the State, and to give the Crown of Great Britain the power of nomination. You could have made your own arrangements; everything might have been settled according to your wish. But unhappily "the Church in danger" was the cry raised. The Union took place—an identification which was no other than that which Lord Byron speaks of as the shark identified with his prey by swallowing it. And what was the first Act of your Imperial Legislature? An Act for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act, and abolishing Trial by Jury. That was the first Act passed by the Imperial Legislature, and it was emblematic enough of the spirit in which it was intended that the Union was to be worked out. In 1805, Mr. Pitt was a party to the rejection of the Catholic petition. He lost his honour, but he reserved his place. Immediately after his death, the Whigs came into office, and carried one great measure. They abolished the Slave-trade with the West Indies. They were able to do nothing for Ireland. They brought in a Bill, however, to the effect that the Crown should have the power of raising to high rank in the Army and Navy those individuals who were the proper objects of Royal appointment. We were in the midst of a tremendous war—our opponent being the most powerful Individual that had appeared on the globe for centuries. The Bill I have alluded to conferred nothing on the Catholics—it was a mere increase of the Prerogative of the Crown. There was no compulsion on the part of the King to appoint a single additional officer. And here, Sir, I cannot help putting it to the gallant Officer on the other side (Sir H. Hardinge), how he should have felt it, for the bravery which he displayed on the part of his country and the personal sacrifices which he cheerfully made, if he had had no hope of reward because his religion happened to be different from that of his Commander-in-Chief. Never forget that there was as gallant spirits in that Army, whose chivalrous courage must have been depressed because they were conscious they could never have reaped the reward of their valour on account of their religion. And what a paltry and short-sighted policy was yours, not to use every inducement to inflame the public ardour, and to make the love of glory subservient to the interests of the Empire. Yet what was the wise and sagacious policy of England? The Popery cry was raised to an extent that seems now almost incredible. Some of the Whigs, who had been Representatives of counties and open towns for half a century before, lost their places. Was ever popular insanity carried to a height so absurd? You have now an opportunity of acting in the spirit which the Whigs manifested in 1805, neglect it and you will exhibit still greater absurdities than were exhibited in 1805 and 1806. Mr. Perceval then came into the Ministry. He proclaimed perpetual hostility to the Catholics, and said that the spirit of the Union was to preserve the Protestants and never to relieve the Catholics. Just as now, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw), and the noble Lord (Lord Stanley), say that the Established Church is one of the Articles of the Union, and Catholic subserviency a necessary consequence. You have at last however, outgrown the No-popery cry. Are you very sure that your Church cry is more likely to stand the test of time? Will this discussion—will the sentiments announced by the noble Member for Sunderland, a man of high rank and station, born I may say one of the leading statesmen of your country, will the sentiments of the Glasgow meeting, which echoed the opinion of the noble Lord, tend to strengthen the position of your Church? When Mr. Perceval declared that concession could not go further, the Catholics were determined they would not take him at his word. They saw no chance for success but in their own exertions. Two prosecutions were instituted; one succeeded, the other failed. But the combination went on; the power of Napoleon increased, and its stimulating influence extended to Ireland. But through that war the Irish went with you. The Catholic priesthood, astounded by the infidelity of France, and seeing how the Revolution was marked by the hideous progress of crime which spread its lava over continental Europe, stood by you, gave good counsel to the people, prevented many and many a revolt, many and many an uprising, and demonstrated that over such a population France, with her principles, could never hope to rule. Napoleon committed a great mistake; he was blind to the value of Ireland for his purposes. Let me rather say that a providential care preserved these countries from the frightful spread of revolutionary infidelity. As the career of Napoleon progressed and the English grew wiser, and the battles of Lutzen and Bautzen having been fought, his power was supposed to revive; the House of Commons declared that, in the next Session, the claims of the Catholics should be considered. In the interval he fell, and his name became a bye-word of contempt. The English nation was safe, and the House of Commons did not hesitate to slight its own pledge.

The Catholics were again ill-treated. They rallied—a six years' struggle took place, and the Catholic Association was formed. We had Monster meetings of various descriptions—provincial meetings, general meetings, simultaneous meetings of parishes—all these we had by our Catholic Association. You attempted a prosecution—there you failed; but you revenged yourselves by a Coercion Bill. That was in 1825. Well, you neglected the opportunity you then had of conciliating Ireland. Recollect that all the leading Agitators, the Bishops, persons of every class influential amongst the Catholics, repaired to London. We threw ourselves upon our knees before you—we begged, as a beggar would ask, that you would take the state of Ireland into consideration. Did you want securities? Then you could have had them. Could you get them now? Do you expect the Thames to flow backwards? Emancipation would then have been received with gratitude. You would have been looked on as benefactors, organization would have ceased, and the elements of opposition would have dissolved in society. You had the opportunity, and I was sitting here and heard the right hon. Baronet speak of the majority with which he carried the Coercion Bill, and but for the House of Lords it would have been carried. No one did more to conciliate Ireland by the hope of Emancipation than I did in 1825. You rejected it. We returned to Ireland. There was nothing left us but to say—

“ Hereditary bondsmen, know you not Who would be free, themselves must strike the blow?”

That was our motto: we assembled: the people were roused, indignant at this treatment: we made offers, and we should have been grateful had they been accepted: they were refused, and Emancipation was carried. You attempted to return a supporter of the Government in the county of Clare. The freeholders turned out; they returned me for that county in 1828 by a majority of 1,900. Emancipation necessarily followed. You granted it in an undignified way. That which you might have given to entreaty you yielded to necessity. That which would have been received as a favour was esteemed as a triumph. Perhaps I am wrong in saying we rejoiced at it, for I am bound to say that not one atom of the insolence of triumph was shown by any of our countrymen. But your Union was full of mischief,—a fraudulent—not compact—but it was a fraudulent surrender—terms of capitulation granted by superior force. You had 175,000 bayonets in Ireland to carry it; you expended 275,000*l.* in bribery and corruption, and yet you did it in a spirit of the sheerest dishonesty, taking away 200 representatives from Ireland and leaving her but 100, when every calculation that was directed to that purpose demonstrated that she was entitled to at least 150. When you did grant Emancipation you did it at a sacrifice of the poorer classes of voters. You sacrificed the 40*s.* freeholders, and raised the suffrage to 10*l.*, and you indemnified yourselves by an act of the grossest injustice on the other side, all because the Church was in danger. [Hear and conversation.] I understand that whisper. The noble Lord is mistaken. I did not consent to give up the 40*s.* freeholders. The noble Lord will find it in that book. I will open the book for him. I insisted that the 40*s.* freeholders of perpetual tenure should not be meddled with; but the 40*s.* freeholders for a single life or death, as it would be called in Ireland, who were made for an election, I consented to give up, and I wish I could have found the same spirit elsewhere; but, that could not exist on account of this unjust Protestant Church. It is the scapegoat of all your iniquity. You think it makes your Protestant Church sure, and the hon. Gentleman opposite is ready to die for it, and has surrounded it with lines of circumvallation. Every oppression in Ireland, every iniquity perpetrated on the people of that country, every right you deprive them of,—corporate reform, a limited Reform Bill—everything is placed outside as a buttress to defend and support that Church. And at the present moment what is it that prevents perfect justice to Ireland but the Established Church? Well, but Emancipation having been carried, the Reform Bill, I think, was its necessary consequence, and I take some credit to myself for having assisted in carrying it. But what did the Irish get by it? You added to the Representation of the counties of England—you gave Scotland eight additional Representatives—you gave five to Ireland; and yet Scotland has only a population of 5,000,000, whilst that of Ireland is 8,000,000. You gave to every one of your English counties having a population of 150,000, on the scale of population alone, an increased representation. When the population was above 100,000 you gave two additional Members. To Anglesea you gave two, being an additional one. You gave to Cork, with a population of 700,000, not one Member additional. I not only spoke in this House until hon. Gentlemen were weary of listening to me, but I relaxed from my studies by writing letters for newspapers demonstrating this iniquity. I put them in the shape of a pamphlet and placed one in the hands of every Member of this House. We remonstrated at the iniquity—we showed the injustice, and that, considering the species of franchise you were to give us, and the short representation we were to have, it was impossible Ireland should have justice done her; and if there were 150 Members for Ireland in this House, do you think you would be able to get an exclusive scheme of Government in that country? But the noble Lord opposite was one of those who were too careful of the Church to do justice to Ireland. His piety exceeded his love of his neighbour—his principle of doing to his neighbour as he would be done by, did not exceed his attachment to the Established Church. Then we complain of the limited state of the Franchise. I am not going into statistics at any length, but in the county of Mayo there are 380,000 population with 900 voters. In Cork there are 750,000, an agricultural population, with 1,500 voters. Wales, with 800,000, very little more than Cork, has twenty-seven Representatives in that House, and 36,000 voters. Does any man imagine that the Irish are so stupid that they would contentedly live under such a scheme of Government as that—that every preference should be made against them, every insulting restriction should be enacted against them? But this was not enough. We were in this limited state of Franchise when, an effort being attempted with the then Government to increase that Franchise, out came the noble Lord upon us, and he brought in a Bill the effect of which would have totally annihilated the Franchise we had. Though in opposition, he carried that measure through two readings in this House, and many who voted with the Ministry on every other question, voted with the noble Lord against Irish rights. Under these circumstances we thought it right to bring the Repeal question before the House. It was debated by the House in 1832; there was a division, we had just one Englishman with us,—forty-two Irish and one English; 500 and odd voted against us. But there was, at least, this done,—there was a solemn pledge given to this House, re-echoed by the House of Lords, and assented to by the King, declaring that, although they were determined to maintain the Union, they would, notwithstanding that, redress all the grievances of Ireland. I wish the House to recollect, that instantly Repeal Agitation was given up. We accepted that pledge in 1834. An attempt was made to realize it, but the Members who attempted it were overruled, partly in this House and partly in the House of Lords. You redressed no grievance. Will any man show me that one grievance was redressed? We lay by for four years; still no grievance was redressed. If we commenced agitation, it would have been said, "We gave you a solemn pledge, to which the King, Lords, and Commons were parties, having the moral effect, though not the legal effect of an Act of Parliament, all branches of the Legislature being parties to the pledge. You would not believe it—you refused to credit it—and we therefore have not been able to redress your grievances." We passed four years without stirring, in the hope that something would be done for Ireland; and something, it appears, was done, for the noble Lord brought his Bill through two readings in this House. I do not wish to trouble the House by reading documents, but as one which I hold in my hand contains a good deal of what I should otherwise have to state in a less condensed form, I shall take the liberty of reading it, and I implore the House to observe from it what our conduct was with respect to this subject. Before we took any further step to procure a Repeal of the Union we formed what was called the Precursor Society, and I presented this petition from that society, and moved upon it myself in this House. The hon. and learned Gentleman then read the petition as follows:—

"The Petition of the undersigned Natives and Inhabitants, Electors and Citizens of the City of Dublin,

"Humbly sheweth,

"We, the undersigned, respectfully demand the attention of this honourable House to our claim for full and equal justice to Ireland.

"Equal justice means a perfect identification of rights, privileges, and franchises for the people of Ireland, with those enjoyed by the people of England.

"We respectfully but most firmly demand and insist upon that identification. The people of Ireland are entitled to, and must have an equality of Political and Religious Freedom with the people of England. They seek nothing more—they will not be content with anything less.

"They are entitled to the identification and equality of rights.

"First, as British subjects, contributing to the extent of their means equally with the British people to the revenues of the State.

"Secondly, As the associates of the British people in all the perils, privations, and sufferings of naval and military life—contributing, as they do, more than their proportion to the ranks of the army and navy.

"Thirdly, They are emphatically entitled to this equalization by reason of the Act of the Legislative Union, which to have any rational and equitable meaning, must be construed as intended to terminate all invidious distinctions and preferences between one portion of the British Empire and the other.

"They are also entitled to it by the determination expressed by both Houses of Parliament to perpetuate the Union between both countries.

"Our present object is to render the Union complete and irreversible, by making it a real instead of a nominal Union, by changing it from an Union of parchment to an Union of interest and affection, by giving to the Irish people the benefit of the Union principle, and by abolishing the monstrous absurdity of considering both countries united only when the one is favoured and exalted, and the other oppressed and degraded.

"That to render the Union complete, and in order to carry out the principle of that Measure with practical effect, we respectfully demand the following Measures:—

"First, We demand a perfect equalization of the Elective Franchise in both countries, by extending the rights of voting of each country to the other; and we respectfully, also, submit that these rights ought to be enlarged in both.

"Secondly, We demand an immediate Corporate Reform, equal in every respect with that which England has obtained.

"Thirdly, We demand an adequate number of Representatives for Ireland, in the United Parliament, deeming the injustice of the inferiority of Ireland to the other parts of the United Kingdom, in respect of the quantity of its Representatives, as one of the greatest grievances imposed by, and as the most unjust part of the Union Statute.

"Fourthly, We demand an equalization of religious freedom with England and Scotland. The people of England are not burthened with the Church of the minority; the people of Scotland are not burthened with the Church of the minority. In order to place the people of Ireland on a just equality with those of England and Scotland, they ought not to be burthened with the support of the Church of the minority; and our demand is, that they may be disembarassed of that burthen, by the application to public purposes—especially to purposes of education and charity—of the temporalities of the Protestant Church in Ireland.

“Such is the extent of our demand—

“The equalization of Municipal Reform.

“The basis of our demand is identification. We are one nation, or we are not. If we be not, it is absurd and unjust to call the present political connection a nation. If we be one nation, then it is profligately iniquitous to treat us as aliens, either in blood, in language, or in religion.

“Should the just prayer of our respectful petition be granted, we who have signed this petition are bound, by integrity and good faith, not to seek the Repeal of the Union Statute. We do not put the case in the alternative. We menace nothing. We threaten no ulterior measure; but we may venture to prophecy, that if the justice we require be refused us, the social elements of Ireland will never settle into tranquillity whilst the Union is a mere mockery and delusion, insulting and oppressive, by the inferiority which it inflicts upon the people of Ireland.

“We tell this honourable House, that there are elements in the moral and physical energy of the Irish people, which will hereafter cause many to regret that they did not avail themselves of the present opportunity of consolidating the Union? We respectfully inform this honourable House that the Irish people will laugh to scorn the pretences under which justice is refused to them. Even if the Protestant Church in Ireland were in danger from the concession of the just rights of the Irish people, that danger should be incurred.

“We believe that the real danger to that Church consists in its being obtruded, upon all occasions, as the motive for refusing to the people of Ireland the rights and privileges which the people of England enjoy. We deem those persons false and foolish friends of the Protestant Church, who put forward Protestantism as the shield and protector of corporate iniquity and political oppression in Ireland; and as there is no other excuse for withholding the rights of the Irish people, save the alleged danger to the Protestant Church, from doing us justice, we do loudly and firmly, though respectfully, call upon this House not to debase religion by making it the cloak and accessory of crime, but to act now at length justly, and even generously, towards the people of Ireland, and to indemnify them for past oppression, by giving them full guarantee for future freedom.

“May it, therefore, please this honourable House to identify the Elective Franchise in England and Ireland—countries in which the tenures of land and houses are similar—and to give to Ireland as complete Municipal Reform as England has obtained, and to give also to Ireland her adequate proportion in the representation, and finally to place Ireland on a footing of equality in religious freedom with England, by allocating the temporalities of the Church of the minority in that country to purposes of charity, education, and public utility. And petitioners will pray.”

I moved, Sir, on that petition, for an increase of the Franchises in favour of Ireland; but what success had my Motion? It was seconded, certainly; but that was all. It was opposed by the Government then in office—it was opposed by the Government now in office. It was opposed by both sides of the House alike. I will say that reasonable—that fair—offer ought to have been accepted; or if all the relief I demanded were not acceded, I submit that the House ought at least to have instituted an inquiry into the grievances of Ireland. Something ought to have been done. Nothing was done. We were scouted out of the House with contempt; and he knows little of the feelings of the Irish heart who thinks that we should not regard ourselves as degraded, if we acquiesced by our silence in the injustice thus perpetrated against us by those who sanctioned every grievance of the Union. Recollect that I should have been comparatively powerless if I had not a strong case of physical suffering in the country backing me. The poverty—the destitution of the people of Ireland, might be laughed to scorn in this House, but when you had declined affording us any remedy, was it not our duty to look for that remedy from ourselves, and to endeavour, by our own acts, to mitigate the physical sufferings of the country? I have entered more at length than I intended to have done into the history of the crimes which England has perpetrated against Ireland since the Union. I have but little more to say, but I have, in the name of the people of Ireland, and I do it in their name only, to protest against your prosecutions. In the name of the people of Ireland I protest against the whole of that prosecution. Forty-one public meetings had been held, every one of which was admitted to be legal. Not one of those meetings has been impeached as being against law—each made in the calendar of crime a cypher, but by multiplying cyphers you come, by a species of legal witchcraft, to make a unit. This, that, and the other meeting were each legal, but the three together made one illegal meeting. Do you think that the people of Ireland understand that species of arguing? I tell you that they do not, and that though you may oppress them, you cannot laugh at them with impunity. Secondly, I protest, in the name of the Irish people, against the striking out of all the Catholics from the Jury panel. There is no doubt about the fact that there were eleven Catholics on the panel, and that every one of them were struck off. The fact is certain; it is undisputed. There were excuses, to be sure, offered for it, but there are always excuses made for wrong committed. Oh, but the noble Lord said he had a precedent, and he quoted a case in which I had acted in a similar manner. To be sure I did not hear him say the words, as I happened not to be present in the House at the time, but I perceived by those “ordinary channels” through which matters that take place in this House reach the public ear, that he charged me with having packed a Catholic Jury. Perhaps he did not use the word “packed.” That is not so refined a word as the noble Lord would employ, but it is equally significant. He said that I had “arranged” an exclusively Catholic Jury to try a Protestant gentleman. I admit that to be a very serious charge indeed; for though I had no public responsibility vested in me on the occasion, I had that responsibility which every Gentleman at the bar feels to rest with him—namely, that of not outraging decency and justice by any act of his in the discharge of his professional duties. The case to which the noble Lord alluded was that of General Bingham, a gentleman who, as a politician, was favourably disposed towards the popular party, and who was a very distinguished officer. He happened to enter into an altercation on the high road, and to drive against his opponent. The assault was not very serious, and yet that is the great case—that is the “State Trial” on which I am charged with having packed a Catholic Jury. I am literally stating facts, but, perhaps, the hon. Gentleman opposite has an objection to facts. The counsel with me in that case were John Bennett, a Protestant, and Feargus O'Connor, a Protestant, and it was by them that the proceedings connected with the formation of the Jury were conducted. I am not shrinking from any responsibility, either direct or remote, that may be attached to my conduct; but the fact was, I happened to be engaged in another court until the moment when the last Juror was in the act of being sworn. But, then, was it a packed Jury? There were two Protestant gentlemen on that Jury, and as all the Jurors must be unanimous before the prisoner could be found guilty, it could not be regarded as a religiously packed Jury. It happened, besides, that after I had commenced my statement of the case, Mr. B. Travers, one of the Protestants upon the Jury, was seized with sudden illness, and had to retire, and I then allowed Mr. O’Hea, a Protestant Magistrate, to be sworn in his place. I admit, that if I had the baseness of packing a Jury of a different religion from the prisoner, to try one who had been a violent political partizan—if I had packed a Jury of Catholics to try a man who had felt it to be his duty through life to take an active and vigorous part in sustaining what are called Protestant principles against the Catholics—there is no possible degradation that I should not think myself deserving of. But General Bingham was not opposed to the Catholics or popular claims; and the Jury before whom he was tried was not exclusively composed of Catholics; and I think I have, therefore, vindicated myself from the charge which the noble Lord thought fit to bring against me. They have also sent me lists of two other Juries along with that which I have just referred to. One of these was a Jury of five Catholics and seven Protestants, that in the year 1838 tried a Catholic priest on a charge of conspiracy; and what was the verdict of the Jury so composed? Was it an acquittal, or did the Jury disagree? No; but found the prisoner guilty without leaving the box. The other case has been sent to me from Middleton. It was a case of sedition that had been tried there. The prisoner was a Catholic, and the Jury which was composed of ten Catholics and two Protestants, found the prisoner guilty also without leaving the box. I mention these cases to the House, because they enable me to spurn with indignation the base insinuation, that ten or eleven Catholic Jurors would perjure themselves in any case on which they could be empanelled. Protesting in the name of the people of Ireland against that accusation, and knowing it, as they do, to be utterly untrue, I leave it as a stigma with you for the mode in which you constituted the Jury in the recent Trial. They have also bid me complain of the diminution of the Jury List, which, whatever insinuations may have been thrown out against the man M'Grath, has not been, I think, by any means clearly accounted for. A challenge was put in to the array—not set forth generally, as in the Welch case, but averring distinctly, that the omission of the names was fraudulently done with intent to injure the traversers. I was not here when, as I have been informed, it was said by the very learned Attorney General for England—than whom I do not think any Gentleman ever conducted a prosecution with more perfect accuracy and propriety than has been exhibited by him on every occasion in which he has been concerned, that there could not be, as he thought, a reply to that plea, because the names were not set forth. But surely he cannot forget, that a man may be tried for murder where the name of the person murdered is unknown, and if the law were otherwise would not the effect be that crime would escape with impunity if it could not be punished where, though the crime was witnessed, the injured party happened to be unknown? But would it not, I ask, have been prudent and wise, when a fraud with such an intent was set forth as the ground of challenge, for the Attorney General for Ireland not to have shrunk from the proof, but to have met it boldly and openly? The Attorney General did act wisely and well according to his mode of proceeding in declining to meet that proof, because he knew the case which he had to sustain, and he has claimed credit for having done so. I have but one observation more to make on the subject of that Trial. It is one which I would make with some regret if it were not the fact, that I make it with some peril to myself. It is with reference to the charge of the Chief Justice, and I fearlessly assert, that since the time of Scroggs and Titus Oates, there never was delivered so one-sided a charge. These are the complaints that I have to make on the part of the people of Ireland, and I now turn from them and ask you what is it you propose to do for the people of Ireland? You probably intend to keep an army of some 22,000 or 23,000 men there, but can you continue to do so consistent with the necessary demands upon you from the colonies? But there are some proposals of amelioration made, as I have learned through the same channels through which I discovered what the noble Lord had said of me. The first of these is the enlargement of the grant—I do not know, is it to Maynooth? [No, no.] Well, it is for education generally, and I have to express my gratification at any aid given to education, as I think you cannot educate the people too much, though you may educate them to a formidable purpose against yourself. The next measure of conciliation is the introduction into Ireland of the English Catholic Charities Bill, known as Mr. Lamb's Bill. I do not know any measure that would do a greater amount of mischief in Ireland, than that would effect, though it had been introduced originally for England by myself. The hon. Member for Oxford, however, took care to be most punctual in his attendance whenever I had it in the list; and I had at length to complain to the then Administration of my inability to carry it, and they got Mr. Lamb to introduce it in his own name. The Statute for Superstitious Uses, passed in the reign of King Edward VI., has never been extended to Ireland, and even in England it was a mere retrospective Act, though, singularly enough, Lord Eldon treated it as being also a declaratory Act. The old Statutes of Mortmain do not apply to the Catholic Clergy in Ireland, as they are not recognised as corporations, and Catholic charities have accordingly been administered by the Equity Courts in Ireland at all times as efficiently as Protestant charities. What I would suggest would be the introduction of a Bill making the Catholic Bishop in each diocese a quasi corporator, so as to enable him to take any quantity of land, the extent of which you might, if you wished, fix within certain limits and give him power to leave it to his successor without the intervention of trustees, heirs at law, or executors. There is another point—that which relates to Fixity of Tenure. Now I say you are doing immense mischief by not acting expeditiously with reference to that matter, sonal nature, affecting the position of those Gentlemen who have been the subject of criminal proceedings, which should be maintained. If I transgress the rule which I lay down, it will be contrary to my intention, as I wish to conduct the defence of the Government with a perfect recollection of the position of the hon. Gentleman who spoke last. I wish the hon. Gentleman instead daily of agitating the passions of his countrymen on the subject of Repeal, would give us here an opportunity of meeting him and replying to his arguments, and I should not doubt as to what would be the result. I beg you to bear in mind what were the arguments and statements on which the hon. Gentleman has this night rested his appeal for the Repeal of the Union. What a perversion of history is necessary to vindicate his demands for what he calls justice to Ireland! The hon. and learned Gentleman said, that for eighteen years anterior to the Union, Ireland had the happiness of enjoying an independent Parliament. An independent Parliament! What! the Parliament that sat from 1782 to 1800 an independent Parliament, providing for the social happiness of those for whose interests they legislated! Why, I thought one of the gravest allegations of the hon. and learned Gentleman was, that through the corruption of that Parliament the Union had been effected, and that the rights and liberties of the people of Ireland had been sacrificed through the corruption of that Parliament. And was the condition of the people really happy under that Parliament? What said Mr. Grattan? He asked after 1782—long after, if I recollect rightly—"What has the independent Legislature effected for us?" He said, "We have got a Police Bill, we have a Riot Act, we have got pensions without end, we have a privileged traffic in the sale of Peerages." That was Mr. Grattan's account of the virtue of that independent Parliament. He said, in fact, that Ireland was reduced to the condition of a province; and is it true that the condition of the people of Ireland was happy? Look at the statements presented of the condition of the City of Dublin and other cities from 1795; look at the accounts of the trade of Ireland; look at the diminution of trade and the shipping interests for the ten years preceding the Union, and you will see whether the hon. and learned Gentleman proved his statement that Ireland was in a state of advancing prosperity. Was the condition of the people happy—was their social state perfect—was Ireland governed without insurrectionary Acts, or other Acts against the liberty of the people? Talk of the state of Ireland between 1783 and 1800—why, the Rebellion and all the terrible consequences of it occurred during that period. The Rebellion broke out in 1798, and was but just suppressed at the time of the Union. But if this Irish Parliament did as greatly conduce to the happiness of Ireland, as the hon. and learned Gentleman has stated, how, I ask, was it constituted? If the hon. and learned Gentleman's statement was true, how completely did it show that that happiness is entirely independent of, and unconnected with, the social institutions of its Government. For at any rate the hon. and learned Gentleman cannot deny this, that that Parliament which he now says promoted the happiness and prosperity of the people of Ireland, was a Parliament returned by small boroughs; that that Parliament was composed exclusively of Protestants; that during that whole period, at any rate, there was the Established Protestant Church. Yes, during that period, when the hon. and learned Gentleman says the social state of Ireland was almost perfect, the Roman Catholics were subject to disabilities, the Parliament was exclusively Protestant, and the Established Church was in its full efficiency. I leave therefore the hon. and learned Member the choice either of admitting that it is consistent with the interests of Ireland that the Established Church should be preserved, and even that the civil disabilities of the Roman Catholics should have remained in force; or he must admit to me, which is the real fact, that you only carried on the Government of Ireland with the Parliament which existed from 1782 to 1800, through the instrumentality of corruption and venality. But history proves that the social condition of Ireland was not a happy one, and that that Parliament did not promote, and was not calculated to promote, the peace and welfare of Ireland. The hon. and learned Gentleman must also admit to me, if there be truth in history, that there never existed a Legislature less entitled to the character of independence, in any sense of the term, than the Parliament which he now says was the pride and boast of Ireland, and had contributed more to its happiness and prosperity than any other institution. I think the hon. and learned Gentleman would better consult the interests of his country, and take a course more corresponding with his own permanent fame, if he would give us the opportunity here of examining his statements, and of encountering his arguments, instead of inflaming the passions of the ignorant by misstatements like these. We may judge what the nature of those misstatements of the hon. and learned Gentleman must be on such an audience by those he has ventured to make in the face of a British Parliament. Having reluctantly been diverted from the consideration of the Motion of the noble Lord by the new topics introduced by the hon. and learned Gentleman, I now pass from them, and proceed to address myself to the merits of that Motion. With respect to the Motion itself, I think the noble Lord will admit to me that it is a Motion exclusively—I won't say exclusively—but one deserving strictly the name of party Motion. It is a perfectly legitimate Motion, and one in conformity with ancient precedent, and a perfectly constitutional mode of trying the confidence of the House in the Government. That it is a party Motion the noble Lord, I think, will admit himself. It is not a Motion for inquiry into the state of Ireland. The noble Lord might have pursued this course. He might have said, "I won't mix up the considerations of party with the higher consideration of the Government of Ireland. I will challenge your conduct. I will put you upon your defence; but I will support my charge against you, not from party considerations, but for the more important consideration of the social state of Ireland." But the noble Lord has not taken that course. Has the noble Lord moved for a Committee on the whole state of Ireland? No such thing. But as if he were afraid of the possibility of success; as if he shrunk from the risk of being compelled in that Committee to explain in details what were his own views with respect to the policy to be pursued in Ireland, at the moment he gives his notice he publicly declares—"I mean to move a Resolution strongly condemnatory of the conduct of the Government, and I will make it impossible for the Government, consistently with their own honour and character, to acquiesce in my Motion, and will force them into a declaration of policy that shall render it impossible for them to govern Ireland." Not so the noble Member for Sunderland. His speech expressed strong opinions, from which, however, I may differ, I will say I am sure are sincere. I never was more convinced in my life, from the tone and manner of the noble Lord, that the opinions he submitted to the House without any regard to the consequences, were his real opinions. But I think that the speech of the noble Lord the Member for London was quite of a different character. He was in a difficult position. He was solving a great question in political fluxions, and undoubtedly he did come to the solution of it like a great mathematician. He had to reconcile the maximum of crimination against the Government with the minimum of inconvenience to his supporters. Quod erat demonstrandum. Now, the only thing I can extract from the noble Lord's speech is this sentiment—"Remove the present Government, and place me in office." He dealt plentifully in impeachments and accusations against us, but when he came to explain his own views with respect to Ireland, and the policy to be pursued in that country, he said nothing whatever which could compel him when in office to adopt any course different from that of the present Government. Did the noble Lord say, "If I could realize my own wishes I would divide the funds of the Church Establishment in Ireland, and give one portion to the Roman Catholics, another to the Presbyterians, and a third part to the Protestants?" Did he say, "These are great projects, but I fear that at present the prospect of consummating them is most remote? I see no chance of its arriving for a considerable period, but I will make some progress to meet it; and I think the first step towards it is doubling the grant to Maynooth?" Should the noble Lord succeed through this Motion, and be reinstated in power, his success will involve him in less of inconvenience and difficulty with regard to the Church question than any public man was ever in before. I rejoice at this—I rejoice that the noble Lord has not committed himself on his return to power to any measure which may very materially endanger the support of the Established Church. With respect to the accusations of the noble Lord against the Government, allow me to say that I think it would have been better far for him to have abstained from attacking us in such an acrimonious way as he did. I think, considering the exposed position of the house in which the noble Lord lives, and looking to the very brittle materials of which it is composed—with a Coercion Act and an Appropriation Clause—I think, I say, that the noble Lord might have been far less dangerously employed than in throwing stones at us. I do not mean, however, to follow that example, I will ward off the blows of the noble Lord as I can; but I will not disturb the temper of calmness and moderation in which I wish to consider the affairs of Ireland by seeking any opportunity for recrimination. The first charge made against us is a very serious and a very unjust one, which I scarcely expected would have come from the noble Lord. It was to the effect that the Government, that is, I, who, as the head of it, am mainly responsible for its acts, had selected the present Lord Chancellor on account of his hostility to the Irish people. The noble Lord denied his talents. [No, no.] The noble Lord certainly denied that the Lord Chancellor efficiently discharged his duties. He asserted that the appointment should not have been made, and undertaking to answer not only for the conduct but the very motives of other men, had declared his opinion that I had selected Lord Lyndhurst for the Chancellorship because of his enmity to Ireland—nay, worse still, on account of his offensive language to the people of that country. The noble Lord absolutely asserted, that I had so far disgraced myself as to have selected for the highest office in the Law Courts of the Empire a man whose qualifications for that situation consisted in enmity and the use of offensive language to the Irish people. I am sure that escaped the noble Lord in the heat of debate, and I ask him in his cooler moments whether he does not think that this is an accusation which he had no right to prefer except upon some stronger evidence than mere suspicion? I have been in the administration of affairs twice before—now, three times, and in every instance have been connected with Lord Lyndhurst. In 1829 Lord Lyndhurst held the office of Lord Chancellor. In the short administration of 1835 he held the same important post. In 1841 I was called upon by Her Majesty to form an administration: and the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) thinks that it would have been just that I should have said to Lord Lyndhurst, “True, I have twice been connected with you in office; true I was associated with you at that critical time when the Roman Catholic Disabilities were removed; true, I asked for your assistance and influence in mitigating the objections of the House of Lords, and I received your cordial support; but you have used some hasty expressions at which offence has been taken, and I must now exclude you from office, and make you the sacrifice in order that I may court popularity in Ireland.” Lord Lyndhurst would have replied to me—“I deny the use of any such expressions. In the face of the House of Lords I have denied them. When I used them they were not challenged. A fortnight afterwards I was taunted with them by those who had heard them at the time, and this was my reply”—This was the language which Lord Lyndhurst used—

“Now as to the charge itself, what is it? It is this—that I stated, as a reason for not granting municipal institutions to the Irish people, that they were aliens by descent—that they speak a different language, and that they have different habits from ours—that they considered us to be invaders of their soil, and that they were desirous of removing us from their country.”

That was the charge. Lord Lyndhurst’s answer was—

“I made no such statement, nor did I say anything at all resembling it. No expression ever fell from me upon which any person not of weak intellect, or not disposed to misunderstand or misrepresent what I stated, could have put such a construction. The noble Marquess (referring to the Marquess of Lansdowne) referred to these words, regretting that I had used them, and hoping that I should explain them. I replied that I had nothing to explain, and that I would satisfy your Lordships that I had never made the statement.”

That hasty expressions should have been thus construed, no one can regret more than myself, except Lord Lyndhurst; but would it have been fair, when he had explained the offensive interpretation put upon them, if, six years after I had said to my noble Friend, “I cannot advise the Crown to appoint you, in consideration of some hasty expressions in debate made use of by you six years ago?” When I look at men like Lord Lyndhurst, who have raised themselves from the position in society in which they were born to the occupation of the highest office of the State—when I look to the manner in which the office of Lord Chancellor has been filled within the last eight or ten years—when I see that it has been occupied by such men as Lord Eldon, Lord Brougham, Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Plunket and Sir Edward Sugden—when I recollect the origin of such men, and their elevation by the force of merit from comparative obscurity to the highest civil station next the Throne—this is, I conceive, the proudest homage to the democratic principle of the British Constitution. It affords the strongest practical contradiction to the remark of the Roman satirist—

"Haud facile emergunt quorum virtutibus obstat

"Res angusta domi."

In this country, the res angusta domi has been no impediment to the elevation of men of talent, who, by the force of their own energy and character, have raised themselves to the highest stations in the Empire. I had difficulties to encounter, which I know the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) had not to deal with, in overlooking the claims of candidates for the appointment of Lord Chancellor. The noble Lord has exhibited examples of resolution and virtue in respect of that office of Chancellor which since the atrox animus Catois, have hardly been equalled. It was, I know, in the noble Lord, virtue, and no meaner motive. The noble Lord had the good fortune to be connected with a man who had long been a faithful friend of the Whig party, the pride of the Bar of Ireland, the ornament of the British Senate, the friend of Grattan. He had the happiness of being connected with Lord Plunket, whose name will go down to remote posterity as one of the brightest stars that shine in the constellation of Irish eminence. Lord Plunket was the son of a Presbyterian minister: he raised himself in his own country to the rank of Chancellor, and the Irish Bar rejoiced in his elevation. The noble Lord opposite thinks it necessary to consult the prejudices and feelings of the Irish people; he taunts us with overlooking Irish claims—with making English appointments. The noble Lord had a Chancellor, the most eminent man the Bar of Ireland ever produced; and six weeks before the noble Lord quitted office he, so sensitive to Irish feelings—he, so jealous of offence offered to Ireland—he, so jealous of the preference of Englishmen—he, having that man as Chancellor whose connexion with his Ministry was the pride and boast of the Whig party—he signified to that Irishman, to Lord Plunket, to that Chancellor, that it was expedient for him to retire. And for what—so far at least as the public is apprized? In order that he might gratify the vanity of, certainly an eminent and distinguished lawyer, of whom I wish to speak with the respect that I feel for him—but, in order to gratify the vanity of a Scotchman. In order to gratify that noble and learned individual with a six weeks tenure of office the people of Ireland were subjected to an affront which, whatever the noble Lord may think of my disposition towards that country, I declare if I had offered them, I should have been unworthy to have retained office for a single hour. The noble Lord quitted this question relating to Lord Lyndhurst, and what was the next topic to which the noble Lord referred? The noble Lord, the representative of a great party, when expatiating on the wrongs of Ireland, thought right to occupy his time in raking in the kennels for the refuse of election dinners; and the noble Lord quoted a speech which was made at the Canterbury election, in order that he might charge me with participation and adoption of the sentiments there expressed. Why this would be a hard rule for public men. It is hard to make me responsible for expressions either used by, or attributed to Mr. Bradshaw, the Member for Canterbury. The noble Lord is followed by a powerful party, confederated with him in promoting political objects, who will vote to-night, naturally and justifiably, with him for the purpose of removing us from office, and replacing us by the noble Lord. But the noble Lord would think it exceedingly unjust if I imputed to him any sentiment that may have been uttered by one of his supporters at a dinner or at a meeting. Whether the noble Lord disavowed the sentiment or not, he would say,—“It is unjust of you to ransack the records of Anti Corn Law meetings, picking out some violent or offensive expressions, charging landlords with cold-blooded insensibility to the distresses of the country, and then saying, that because I vote on the same side with the persons who used them, and may be united with them in general political sentiments, you will therefore make me individually responsible for their language.” But suppose I had always disclaimed the sentiments which the noble Lord imputes to my hon. Friend—suppose I had said, “I will not countenance these prejudices”—suppose I had declared, as well in Opposition as in Government, “I approve the appointment of Catholics to office; I think the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. M. O’Ferrall), at one time the Secretary to the Admiralty, and afterwards Secretary to the Treasury, was entitled to the place he occupied; I make no objection to the appointment of Mr. Wyse; I think the Roman Catholic Relief Bill has removed their disabilities, and I conceive that the Government was justified in their appointment;”—suppose I had said this, as I did say it, in public, would it not be unjust on the part of the noble Lord to say to me—"I make you responsible for what passed at the dinner at Canterbury?" I do not carry the doctrine of conspiracy quite so far as the noble Lord seems disposed to do. Here is the noble Lord protesting against the injustice of making one man responsible for the acts of another, and yet he says—"It is convenient for party purposes that I should make you responsible for an election speech delivered at Canterbury." Sir, I consider this to be a most important matter, on account of the use the noble Lord makes of it. Says the noble Lord—"These are the men entertaining those feelings with respect to Roman Catholics. These are those men,"—speaking of the Government—"offering to you, their Roman Catholic fellow-subjects, those insults; speaking in that language of your ministers of religion." Then the noble Lord says,—“Will any Roman Catholic of honour and spirit consent to receive favours from such a Government?” Sir, what the noble Lord wants to do, is this; he wants to make it impossible for a Roman Catholic to accept favour from the present Government and then to turn round upon the Government and say, “Why, how unequally and unjustly you distribute your patronage: here are twenty Protestants and not one Roman Catholic.” Is that just? First to create an impediment by raising unjust prejudices against us, founded upon unjust accusations and then to make it a charge against us, when you have succeeded in deterring Roman Catholics from accepting favour, that we are guilty of having withheld favour from them. Sir, I have often said in this House publicly what my opinions were on the subject of the position of Roman Catholics, and I am taunted, and it is said, “Yes, these are fine declarations you make in debate but you don’t practically adopt them.” Allow me to say, and I say it with perfect frankness, that the subject is one of great difficulty. I recognise that where there are equal qualifications there ought to be no practical disabilities. I say this with respect to every office. I care not what prejudice I may create against me: and I say now, in the possession of power, what I said when I was not in office, that with respect to the judicial office, with respect to the Privy Council, to every office there ought to be no impediment whatever to the appointment of a Roman Catholic upon the ground of his religious opinions. Sir, since Parliament last met, there has been one, and I think only one office of a judicial nature vacant in Ireland; it was an office in the Ecclesiastical Court; I apprehend no one will contend that any body but a member of the Church of England ought to have been appointed to that situation. The appointment was placed at my disposal by the Lord Primate. I determined to place in that situation the most eminent man at the Bar of Ireland, with reference to professional attainments and nothing else; and I think it will be admitted that I did so when I appointed Mr. Sergeant Keating to that situation. Mr. Sergeant Keating vacated the office of third Sergeant, which it was necessary to fill. A communication took place between the Government of England and the Government of Ireland upon the subject of that appointment. And now, as I want to destroy those prejudices which the noble Lord is trying to create—to show to the Roman Catholics that I don’t participate in the opinions delivered at election dinners—and to show them that I am not delivering these sentiments upon the impulse of the moment in debate, I shall take the liberty of reading to them, unjustly accused as I am, the letter which I addressed to the Lord Lieutenant on the subject of that appointment, addressed, be it observed, not now under the pressure of debate, but in the course of last year. It is dated August 22, 1843, and is as follows:—

“I admit that political considerations would not justify a bad appointment of any kind, still less a bad judicial appointment; but I must, on the other hand, express my strong opinion that considerations of policy, and also of justice, demand a liberal and indulgent estimate of the claims to the favour of the Crown of such Roman Catholics as abstain from political agitation, and take no part in politics offensive to the dispensers of that patronage. What is the advantage to Roman Catholics of having removed their legal disabilities, if, some how or other, they are constantly met by a preferable claim on the part of Protestants, and if they do not practically reap the advantage of their nominal equality as to civil rights?”

I can with truth say I wrote this letter with reference to the appointment then vacant, and without reference to this debate. The letter continues—

“I can readily believe that for nearly every office that may become vacant for ten years to come, there may be found a Protestant candidate with at least equal claims in point of qualifications, and superior on account of professed attachment to the Church. If that claim is always to be admitted, there is still a practical disqualification; and what motive can we hold out to Roman Catholics to abjure agitation and the notoriety and fame which are its reward, if honourable appointments, and legitimate distinctions, be in fact withheld from them? I fear they will not be satisfied with the answer, 'true it is we have made fifty appointments, but for every one a Protestant had a preferable claim.' Why have Protestants a preferable claim? Because they have had for a long series of years the advantage of a monopoly of privileges secured to them by law, and have been thrown in constant contact and intercourse with the Government. The policy of the law has been changed, and surely we ought not to allow the effects of the preceding policy to remain in full force, and ought not to plead the inferiority of the Roman Catholic as a conclusive reason for preferring his more fortunate opponent."

I have read that letter as indicative of the spirit with which the Government was anxious to treat Roman Catholics. The result was, that Mr. Sergeant Howley was appointed. I have not the slightest doubt, had there been a wish to exclude a Roman Catholic from the appointment, that it would have been easy to have found men of at least equal professional abilities in the Four Courts. But Mr. Sergeant Howley, a Roman Catholic, was appointed. Now, just to show the spirit that actuates that system of declining every appointment when we do make it—of trying to persuade Roman Catholics into a refusal, in order that you may found a claim for your own rise to political power—I will read what was the impression sought to be raised by your party organs. Hear what this paper, the organ of Gentlemen opposite, hear what it says upon making the announcement of a Roman Catholic appointment by a Conservative Government. ["Name."] Oh, this is the Morning Chronicle. We are often made liable for indiscreet expressions in other papers over which we have no control, and I think it is quite fair that I should quote from this. Well, it says—

"The present Government have, during their career of office, made many bad and some absurd appointments; but we do not remember any one so curiously infelicitous as their last legal promotion in Ireland. The dignity of Sergeant-at-Law is one of much more importance in Ireland than it is in this country. The Irish Sergeants, three in number, act from time to time as Judges of Assize, and the coif is generally regarded as a preparation for the ermine."

It goes on—

"How this extraordinary appointment came to be made is a question which has produced no little speculation. The explanation, however, does not seem very difficult; it is only necessary to suppose a little shallow cunning and a large share of blockheadism on the part of the Government, and the whole matter will be accounted for."

That's the encouragement they give us. Then,—

"Whatever motive may have dictated the selection of Mr. Howley, the result has been most damaging to the Government. The exasperation of the Irish Tories was, of course, expected."

Yes; but they give us no credit for that.

"But it was not anticipated that the Liberal members of the Bar would regard Mr. Howley's elevation as an insult, and take pains to disclaim him as a political friend. It is quite clear that Sir Robert Peel's Government cannot govern Ireland."

Now, what is the truth with respect to this Mr. Howley, totally unconnected with us in politics, whom we never saw, of whom we never heard, except from the respect attaching to his name, who had the manliness and courage, notwithstanding the denunciations of the noble Lord and his party organs, to receive the proffered advancement from a Conservative Government? What took place on his appointment which was said to be an insult to the Bar of Ireland? As soon as his appointment was known, from the county in which he had acted as a Judge most honourable testimonials to his conduct, ability, and integrity, were received, and more honourable testimonials were never received by any man. Here is an address to Mr. Sergeant Howley, the man whose appointment is an insult to the people of Ireland, and whose appointment proves that the present Government is not fit to govern Ireland. To Mr. Sergeant Howley was presented this address from the Magistrates of the county of Tipperary. They say:—

"It is with heartfelt pleasure we take this opportunity of expressing the deep sense of the gratitude we feel to be justly due to you from all classes of the community in this county, for the admirable manner in which you have for so many years administered the duties of the arduous office of assistant barrister."

That address is signed by no less than 105 Magistrates, all coming forward to bear testimony to the integrity and ability with which Mr. Howley had discharged his functions. There is also an address to him from the Grand Jury, and an address to him from every practising solicitor in the county of Tipperary. Is this then fair warfare to the Government? It may be fair towards us, but is it fair to the individual? Is it fair to the character of an honourable man, so soon as we give him the proper reward of professional merit, to turn round upon him and injure his character, and depreciate his merit, in order that through him you may strike a blow at the Conservative Government? Sir, I think that is an answer to the attempt of the noble Lord to involve me in the responsibility of expressions hostile to the Catholics used by Gentlemen with whom I may be joined in party politics. And now as to the disposition to encourage offensive or hostile expressions used to the Roman Catholic body. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sheil) made an appeal to me last night on that subject. He referred to an address of a Protestant Operative Association in Dublin presented to my noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant, and asked me if I approved of the expressions and sentiments it contained, offensive to the Roman Catholics, and he read an answer of my noble Friend to that address. He did not state that that answer referred merely to the approbation expressed in the address, of the conduct of my noble Friend. [Mr. Sheil: I read it all.] Yes; but the right hon. Gentleman dropped his voice after he had read the words "warm acknowledgments," which were followed by a loud cheer, that prevented the rest of the passage being heard. It very often happens, that when a public man receives in the press of business one of these very long controversial addresses, he does not read them all, and a common official answer is returned; and is an answer of that kind to be brought forward against him in the House of Commons as the written answer of a man who approves of expressions offensive to Roman Catholics. I am sure the House will allow me to do myself and the Government justice on this part of the charge preferred against us. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sheil) referred to me; and I have had memorials addressed to me, to the same effect, from Protestant Operative Associations. I had one before the agitation begun, addressed to me in the year 1842. It was from the Cork Protestant Operative Association. It began in this manner:—

"We, the members of the Protestant Operative Association of the city of Cork, feel called on by a sense of duty to ourselves, to our country, and to our God, to address ourselves to you on a subject of the first importance, namely, National Education."

It then went on—

"If the homilies be true (and their authors sealed their truth with their blood, and raised a testimony against error which can never be overthrown), then are the priests of the Romish Church the priests of Anti-Christ—then are they the special instruments of the Devil."

I must state that the climax improves as it proceeds; but I think I have read enough to show what was the tenour of that address. Now, what was my answer? It was sent in December, 1842. This was the answer:—

"Sir—I have received your letter accompanying an address to me from the members of the Protestant Operative Association of the city of Cork. I am sorry that they feel themselves called upon by their duty to their God to express uncharitable sentiments in offensive language."

Have I shown to the right hon. Gentleman what was my feeling on this subject? [Mr. Sheil: I said I was sure this was not your feeling.] Yes; and I am trying to confirm your opinion. I thought I made them rather a sharp answer. I must in justice say of them they certainly received it in a very becoming manner. It is but justice to them that I should read the way in which they received my rebuke:—

"We feel great pleasure in acknowledging the receipt of your letter (really it is a most charitable and becoming answer) in reply to an address of the Cork Protestant Operative Association. We feel it necessary to make a few observations, which are called for by the manner in which you have expressed yourself towards us: We first offer our warmest thanks for the prompt and gentlemanly manner in which you answered our communication. It was what we expected, and what from your universally known courteous disposition and kind demeanour, even to the humblest individual, we might have anticipated; while the reply itself has not disappointed our expectations."

Now, Sir, there was an address from the Dublin Protestant Operative Association to Her Majesty. [Mr. Sheil: Was that subsequent to your answer?] Yes. This was transmitted to my right hon. Friend (Sir J. Graham), with a request that he would lay it before Her Majesty. I hold in my hand the answer of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department to that address. I really had better not read it. He says:—

"I will not comment on other passages in the address; but I find the expressions 'millions of factious Irishmen,' and the general expressions of that address, if not intended to be insulting, are, at any rate, so open to misconstruction, that I cannot be a party to laying the address before Her Majesty."

Now observe, that was in the year 1842; and I do think that these things are indicative of the spirit in which we were desirous of administering the Government of Ireland, and that we were content to relinquish support rather than to gain it by fomenting jealousies. Sir, I come now to the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in respect to the recent Trials. We took office in September, 1841, and up to March, 1843, there appeared certainly no great dissatisfaction with the manner in which the Government was conducted. As I have shown you, we had been desirous of abating religious animosities; we had done what we could to rebuke attempts at offence or insult to the Roman Catholics. You charge us with a desire to govern Ireland by military force. You confound the necessity which has led us to increase the military force in Ireland with our own disposition and wishes. Yes, I want to know who is responsible for the military force in Ireland? I want to know to whom it is owing that our expectations and hopes of presenting reduced Estimates have been defeated? I want to put that fairly before the country—before the intelligent reasoning classes of the community—to make an appeal in this House to impartial men, whether opponents or not. We took office in September, 1841. In March, 1843, so far from having evinced any disposition to govern by military force, we then had a smaller number of regular forces employed in Ireland than there ever had been before, except on one or two occasions. The total number of forces in April, 1841, when the hon. Gentlemen opposite were in power, was 14,000 men. On the day on which we took office, the last day of August, 1841, we found the force in Ireland to be 14,843 men. On the last of September, after we were in office, the force was 16,267 men, and in March, 1843, there were 13,900 men; the number in September, 1841, 16,267 men, having been reduced in March, 1843, at the commencement of these troubles, to 13,900. That shows no disposition on our part to govern Ireland by military force. In March, 1843, began this systematic agitation. Was that in consequence of any act of the Government? Were we charged with any injustice—any undue partiality? No; but my belief is, that it did not suit the purposes of some that the Government of Ireland should be successful. It was, therefore, determined to have recourse to agitation. There were also at the time other causes of excitement. The Poor-rate imposed by an Act supported by and perfected by the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) began at that time to be levied, and through many parts of Ireland, occasioned great dissatisfaction. That Act was most unfortunate, for it subjected every occupier, whatever might be the value of his holding, almost without exception to the Poor-law. There were thousands of instances in which people in the west of Ireland were called upon to pay a rate—some of three farthings, and some of more. This occasioned great dissatisfaction. It became our duty to remedy, I will not call it the negligence, but the unfortunate mistake made in drawing up that Act. [Lord J. Russell: That mistake was adopted by the present Government.] Yes; and the noble Lord shall hear no more from me on that point. I shall not endeavour to repay him in the coin he offered to me. Henceforth, there shall be no more recrimination. That Act subjected the poorest occupiers to the payment of the rate. Concurrently with that Act was a period of great agricultural depression, and there was no part of the United Kingdom where that depression was more severely felt than in Ireland. Concurrently with that depression was the alarm that the new Tariff would cause a reduction in prices, and that alarm alienated the minds of many from the Government. These things gave great facilities for agitation. The country then was in a peculiar state. There was great agitation and great excitement in the west of Ireland. Great congregations of men assembled in some parishes—not against the Government, but against the Ecclesiastical claims. In Sligo there were meetings of large bodies of men at the chapel door for the purpose of demanding a reduction of those claims. The people of those districts, and probably of other parts of Ireland, began to feel that the payments to their Priests were exceedingly oppressive—at least so they were disposed to represent them—and they took such measures as might be expected from persons in such circumstances. There was, at this time, as I have already said, great distress, and the resistance to the demands of the Romish

Priesthood becoming formidable, the agitation for the Repeal of the Union was set on foot. We deeply regretted that agitation; we did all in our power to discourage it; but when it arose, we lost no time in determining upon the mode of meeting it. There was nothing in the mode that we resolved to adopt which at all laid us open to the charge since brought against us of having encouraged those meetings, or at least of having avoided to discourage them with the view of entrapping eminent men into a violation of the law, and then turning on them, and subjecting them to its penalties. I declare here publicly that that charge is utterly destitute of any foundation. There was one thing on which we determined from the first, and that was not to apply to Parliament for any new powers. I declare, after my long experience in public life, there is nothing I deprecate more than an application to Parliament for extraordinary powers. I do not think there is anything that has a greater tendency to impair the real efficacy of the ordinary law, than suddenly to take it into our heads that it will not be efficacious, and, listening to some appeal, founded on local alarm, to procure some Bill, destructive of the ordinary liberties of the subject, by surpassing the ordinary powers of the law. This I hold to be most injudicious; so far from adding to the authority of Government, there is nothing more calculated to paralyze a Government and weaken authority than a recourse to extraordinary powers. Let the ordinary law be relied upon; for if we get into a habit of listening to such applications, people by-and-bye will not resort to the ordinary law at all to suppress what they think wrong, in the hope of driving the Government to extraordinary measures. With such feelings as these, we made up our minds, whatever the risk, to take the chance, relying with confidence upon the inherent vigour of the ordinary law. It is not as a matter of reproach to them, but in justice to ourselves, that I remind the House that our predecessors in office did not pursue this course. There was the same agitation in 1833. The noble Lord, in reviewing the conduct of public men, asked that we should begin the consideration of his own, at a very convenient date for himself, namely, in 1835, just at the very time when he formed that compact with Lichfield House. The noble Lord says, "I claim the right to review your lives without any such restriction;" and the noble Lord goes back to the year

1829. The noble Lord says, "Look at all your pledges from that time, it is impossible for you to do anything for Ireland at variance with those pledges: but at the same time," says the noble Lord, "let me be exempt from any reference to that part of my life," from the year 1831 to the year 1835. That part of my life," says the noble Lord, "must be exempted from your notice." I shall, on my part, beg leave to trace back the noble Lord's proceedings somewhat beyond the period he has himself selected as the limit of that zone of his political life to which he wishes to confine us, and refer to some matters occurring between 1831 and 1835. I have observed, that the late Government did not feel that reliance upon the ordinary powers of the law upon which we have acted. The House cannot have forgotten that the noble Lord was in office during that period, that Lord Althorp was the colleague of the noble Lord opposite, and that then an Irish Coercion Bill was introduced into this House. You, who tell us, who charge us with having acted with supineness at the beginning, and unnecessary vigour at the close—you were not content to take the course we have taken, or to rely on the force and operation of the ordinary laws; but you made your demand on Parliament for additional powers, and I supported you in your demands, because you, the Government, solemnly assured us that to comply with it, was essential to the well-being of the country. I did not try to aggravate your difficulties. I entered into no confederacy with those who were disturbing the peace; and you, the Liberal Statesmen—you, the devoted, special, exclusive supporters of the rights and happiness of Ireland—proceeded to pass for Ireland what may be safely described as rather a strong enactment. Really, the noble Lord must think the House has forgotten all these matters, or he would have somewhat moderated the attacks he has been, right and left, making upon us. That Act was an "Act for the more effectual suppression of certain local dangerous disturbances in Ireland." To suppress such disturbances, the noble Lord—the friend of Ireland—thought it essential to have recourse to extraordinary powers. For my own part, I think the bolder course would have been for the noble Lord to rely on the ordinary law. The Act is, as will be seen, a very strict Act of Parliament. The Preamble runs thus:—

blies, inconsistent with the public peace and safety, and with the exercise of regular Government, have for some time past been held in Ireland; and whereas the laws now in force in that part of the United Kingdom have been found inadequate to the prompt and effectual suppression of the said mischiefs, and the interposition of Parliament is necessary for the purpose of checking the further progress of the same."

And then the Act went on to subject all persons committing delinquencies under the Act to be tried by a Court Martial, consisting of not less than five officers. And as to signals, why what said the Act of the noble Lord? It subjected to the operation of the Act all persons guilty of making signals by "fire, bonfire, flash, blaze, smoke, or who were present at such signal making by bonfire, flash, blaze, or smoke;" and it further enacted "that the onus of proving that such signal had not been made should lie on the person charged." Such was the Act of the noble Lord—the Act which he impressed upon the House as indispensable for the safety of the country. We asked for no such Act: we all concurred in deeming it unnecessary to pass a Coercion Act for Ireland, such as her peculiar friends required at our hands; we relied upon the ordinary law, and the support of that party, Protestant and Roman Catholic, which was averse from disturbance and agitation. We determined to accept no assistance, which I am bound to say was liberally offered, from any yeomanry corps in Ireland which might have the effect of arousing a spirit of religious animosity. We could not have embodied the yeomanry corps—we could not have called them to aid the Government, without risking the engendering of animosities that it might require a great lapse of time to efface. We were determined, unless in case of the last necessity, to waive the assistance, though we thereby discouraged and dispirited many of those who were ready to support us. Our only reliance was on the ordinary powers of the law, energetically but prudently exercised. The charge that you make against us is, that we were supine and inactive, and that we first entrapped those men into the commission of crime. Now, to that charge I give a peremptory denial. But, it is said, we issued no Proclamation in time. To this I answer, that we did give a public expression of our views as regarded this agitation for the Repeal of the Union. At the end of last Session, Her Majesty expressed her disapproval of that Repeal Agitation. You say we issued no Proclamation on the subject, but I ask what Proclamation could have been stronger than that declaration of Her Majesty's disapproval of the agitation which was then going on in Ireland? In what more emphatic terms could that disapproval of the agitation have been expressed than it was expressed at the Prorogation of Parliament? Her Majesty, in Proroguing the Parliament last Session, said:—

"I have observed with the deepest concern the persevering efforts which are made to stir up discontent and disaffection among my subjects in Ireland, and to excite them to demand a Repeal of the Legislative Union."

Her Majesty added:—

"I have forbore from requiring any additional powers for the counteraction of designs hostile to the concord and welfare of my Dominions, as well from my unwillingness to distrust the efficacy of the ordinary law, as from my reliance on the good sense and patriotism of my people, and on the solemn declarations of Parliament in support of the Legislative Union. I feel assured that those of my faithful subjects who have influence and authority in Ireland will discourage to the utmost of their power a system of pernicious agitation, which disturbs the industry and retards the improvement of that country, and excites feelings of mutual distrust and animosity between different classes of my people."

That was the Proclamation of the Crown with respect to the Repeal agitation; and, as Ministers of the Crown, we felt it to be our duty to dismiss those Magistrates who took part in that agitation. Was not that a sufficient indication of our opinion? But we went further: we dismissed the Magistrates who took part in the Repeal agitation: and I ask was that no significant expression of our opinion on the subject? But we are blamed for having dismissed them without any previous Proclamation on the subject of the meetings. I believe the noble Lord opposite considered himself entitled to dismiss Frost, whom he had made a Magistrate, because he was a Member of the National Convention, without having given any Proclamation previous to his dismissal. The noble Lord wrote to Frost to know if he were a Member of the National Convention whom he had appointed a Magistrate. The noble Lord at first thought the answer of Mr. Frost satisfactory. But Mr. Frost made a comment on the noble Lord's letter, and Frost was dismissed for attending those meetings, at which violent and inflammatory language was used, although the noble Lord did not prosecute those who attended them. We dismissed the Magistrates who took part in an agitation which we believed was calculated to endanger the peace of the Empire and to sever the two countries, and we gave these instructions to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland:—

“The moment you are entitled by law to interfere with meetings that endanger the public peace, that moment we authorize and desire you to do so.”

I state this to show that the charge against us, that we remained dormant, with folded arms watched the progress of these meetings, is utterly without foundation. Our intention was clearly expressed, that whenever the law enabled and required us to interfere, then we would do so. But at first these meetings were not considered illegal, though there were great doubts of their legality. Separately taken, they were not considered illegal. Suppose, then, we had issued a Proclamation, while these doubts yet existed, to disperse these meetings by military force, and there should have been resistance and bloodshed, and homicide had ensued, in what a position should we have been? But there were occasions in the progress of these meetings when there did appear a possibility of interfering in conformity with the law. There was a great meeting at Cashel on the 23rd of May. We wrote to the Lord Lieutenant that we had received alarming accounts as to that meeting, and we directed him to send down to the Lieutenant of the County to confer with the Magistrates, and if affidavits were made by respectable and trustworthy persons, that they apprehended danger to the public peace and safety, they were then to interfere. There was great doubt whether, without affidavits of that nature, there could be any reason for interference; and we said, let the affidavits be voluntary; do not hunt them out in order to warrant interference; but, if trustworthy men of firm minds come forward and testify their alarm at the numbers that are expected at the meeting, and the military organization of the people, in that case we advise you to interfere. My right hon. Friend (Sir J. Graham), wrote and said:—

“We held a Cabinet to day, and the Lord Chancellor and the Law Officers were present. The statements of ——— and ——— in the absence of depositions and of official information, are too vague to form the groundwork of a safe decision, much less of a positive instruction. We think that you should direct the Lieutenant of the county to repair to Tipperary without delay; to consult the Magistracy and resident gentry; and to ascertain, as far as possible, the probable character and numbers of the intended meeting. If these inquiries should satisfy the Lieutenant that the apprehensions are not exaggerated, and that Processions of large multitudes from distant points, with bands and banners, may be expected to flock to the meeting, thereby creating reasonable alarm in the minds of firm and trustworthy men, these statements should be supported by affidavits to be transmitted to you without delay; and in concert with the Lord Chancellor and your Law Advisers, it will then be safely open to you to issue a Proclamation warning the public of the apprehended danger, and calling on all loyal subjects to abstain from attendance, and from giving any countenance to such an assembly. On a careful consideration of the affidavits in the case supposed, you must determine whether it may not be prudent to prevent the assembly by occupying the ground, and even by dispersing it, if they persevere, after notice, in coming together. This last step should be avoided if possible, since it may lead to a serious collision and loss of life.”

That was the course which we took with regard to a meeting at which it was supposed that interference might be called for. There was to have been another meeting, at which we had every reason to expect that, had it taken place, there would have been a collision between the people and the military, and these are the orders we gave that the meeting should be prevented: this is an extract from a letter dated the 18th of May:—

“But the most important subject is the intended Repeal Meeting at Enniskillen, summoned by the Roman Catholic Priest, to be held in the Chapel Yard. There can be no doubt whatever, that such a meeting in that place, in present circumstances, would lead to a most serious affray. It is the duty of the Magistrates, if there be affidavits deposing to apprehension of danger, to transmit them to the Castle; and to me it is clear that, if these affidavits set forth the just apprehensions of firm and reasonable men, the Government is bound to interpose and to prevent the assembly. Whatever the event may be, law is on the side of the Authorities, which seek to preserve the public peace.”

Why did we not interfere then with that meeting? Because, in consequence of the peculiar circumstances, those who intended to hold it decided on not meeting, and accordingly it did not take place. A meeting was held at Clones, in the county Monaghan, at which a life was lost, and a meeting was afterwards to be held at Dungannon, at which a collision was apprehended. Well, did we want to provoke a collision? Were we mad and wicked enough to wish to see bloodshed? Badly as you think of us, we wished to be forbearing; we wished to avoid a conflict; we wished to prevent a collision of physical force; we saw thousands and tens of thousands of men, organized and assembling together, obedient to the commands of the leaders, and acting in concert together. Still, while all was peaceable, while there was no apprehension of danger, we determined, if possible, not lightly to interfere—not to issue out a special Proclamation—not to call for the interference of the military. But when actual danger was apprehended from the calling of various meetings, then we felt it our duty to interfere and to prevent such meetings as were pregnant with danger from being held. A meeting was to be held in the North of Ireland, at which it was anticipated there might be just cause of alarm as to its effect on the public peace. That meeting was to be held at Dungannon, and we gave orders to have care taken to prevent any collision, but the meeting was not held, and any interference was therefore unnecessary. I stated that if affidavits were made as to the chance of a collision or danger to the public peace, by persons capable of forming a correct opinion, then the authorities ought to interfere, but they ought not to interfere on vague intelligence. Why did they not interfere with respect to the meeting to be held at Dungannon? Because the Repealers did not hold their intended meeting at that town. We made no parade of the intention to interfere, in order to prevent a collision, and the good sense of the people prevented any riot or collision. Have I not now satisfied the House, that there was no covert design on the part of the Government to entrap men into the commission of crime? We witnessed, it is true, the attempts made to keep up the agitation, but we had hopes that it would subside; but the Irish people, with all their good qualities, are a mercurial people, and liable to be excited by such appeals as were made to them, and we accordingly took those precautions which you now consider proofs of a design to govern Ireland by a military force; but we were most desirous to avoid any necessity for resorting to force to prevent any of those meetings. When those meetings assumed a dangerous character, it was necessary to interfere. I am trying to make no comments that are not absolutely necessary; but what friend of peace would advise a meeting in the county of Tipperary, and would choose as the day of meeting the Anniversary of the Irish Rebellion—a meeting to be called in a county in such a disturbed state, and in which soon afterwards was perpetrated the most horrid tragedy to be found in the records of crime—the murder of Mr. Waller—who, I say, would advise hundreds and thousands of the people to be invited to hear inflammatory speeches, and that the day selected for such a purpose should be the Anniversary of the Irish Rebellion? And what were the scenes selected for these meetings? The Hill of Tara, the Rath of Mullaghmast, Clontarf—these were the spots that were selected; and every appeal was made by some to revive the bitter animosities of barbarous times, to throw back the tie of civilization, and to evoke the bitter spirit of former times, which distinguished and exasperated the different races that prevailed in Ireland. Look at the days that were chosen for these objects. Look at the scenes which were selected for the meetings, and I ask you is there not evidence—as far as anniversaries of days and places can furnish evidence—of a conspiracy to effect a legal object by illegal means—not by the present use, but by the display of physical force? Well, but you say, “Why did you interfere at all at Clontarf?” Sir, those who act with forbearance are always liable to that taunt. You forbear from acting, and when the necessity for acting arises you certainly expose yourself to that imputation. Having forbore so long, why did you act then? We interfered at Clontarf on this account—Clontarf was the second meeting in the Metropolis. There had been a previous meeting in Dublin. Clontarf followed on the meetings of Tara and Mullaghmast. Clontarf had this distinguishing character, that there was a military array. The Repeal cavalry was invited to be present. I apprehend that cavalry are hardly necessary for the purpose of petitioning. The cavalry were invited to attend under a Proclamation which formed them as a military body. Military terms were made use of, and that Proclamation issued from the Corn Exchange. [Mr. E. B. Roche.—Not from the Corn Exchange.] The first Proclamation came from the Corn Exchange. [Mr. E. B. Roche.—The second did, not the first.] I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon. I am pretty well versed in these documents, and I think I am correct in stating that the first Proclamation came from the Corn Exchange. The hon. Gentleman says only the second Proclamation issued from the Corn Exchange; but I have the most confident belief that the first Proclamation issued from the Corn Exchange too. There is the same proof that the first issued from the Corn Exchange that we have as to the second—both are dated from the Corn Exchange. I think I am right in what I state. The Proclamation says—

“All mounted Repealers are to muster in the open ground, and to form into troops, each troop to consist of twenty-five horsemen, to be led by one officer in front, followed by six ranks, four abreast, half distance, each wearing wand and cockade, distinguishing the number of his respective troop. The Committee will meet at the Corn Exchange, every day in the ensuing week, from four to five o'clock. (Dated Corn Exchange, September 13, 1843.)”

But it is asked why we proceeded in this case when we had issued no Proclamation to prevent the previous meetings? Because having consulted the Lord Chancellor of England, having consulted the Attorney General, and the Solicitor General, we put this question—“independent of affidavit, does this summoning of a meeting in military array, and with military organization, of itself constitute an illegal meeting, because if it does, we are then determined to interfere by Proclamation?” The answer was, that that one particular individual meeting did differ in its character from the meetings of Cashel, of Mallow, and others; that that meeting, not on account of its numbers, but on account of its military character, was in itself illegal, and the Government was warranted in issuing a Proclamation. We then resolved on issuing a Proclamation. The circumstances under which that Proclamation was issued have already been fully explained to the House, and I shall not again travel over them. We lamented the shortness of the notice, but if we attempted to interfere with that meeting, the shortness of notice was inevitable. It is said we did not issue the notice till late in the day. It is said we did not issue it till five in the evening, when it was too dark to read the Proclamation, I have here the Counter Proclamation—and, which is a matter of great importance, I refute that statement by a reference to this document. The Counter-Proclamation of Mr. O'Connell is dated Saturday, October 7, 3 o'clock, p.m., and this Counter-Proclamation begins by stating,

“Whereas there has appeared, under the signature of ‘E. B. Sugden,’ a paper being, or purporting to be, a Proclamation,” &c.

Now, observe, this Counter-Proclamation is printed and dated Saturday, 3 o'clock. There was, therefore, time to print this Proclamation after they had seen the Proclamation which was issued by the Government. I lament the shortness of the notice, but don't, for the purpose of aggravating the charge against us, depart from the facts, and make the notice shorter than it really was. We determined, therefore, to disperse the meeting at Clontarf, or rather to occupy the ground, and make such a demonstration as would prevent the meeting taking place, giving the earliest notice, and taking every possible precaution to prevent the possibility of collision. We determined also, after the notice given by the declaration of Her Majesty at the close of last Session, by this Proclamation, and after the notice given by the dismissal of Magistrates—we determined to prosecute the parties who had been instrumental in causing these meetings to be held, and adopting these acts—we determined to prosecute them for that conspiracy of which we conscientiously thought them guilty. The right hon. Gentleman asks, why did we not prosecute the printers. My hon. Friend has given the answer. We might incarcerate the printers, but even where the name of the author of the seditious paper was attached to it, there were no means of getting at the author. Printers had been prosecuted before, and Government was covered with ridicule for not striking at the causes of the danger, but contenting themselves with the punishment of the mere instruments. Sir, I ask the House to put together these facts—the references to the United States—the publication of the speeches which the son of the President thought it decent to make—the declaration of the son of the chief executive officer of the United States, that “the libation to freedom must sometimes be quaffed in blood.” I ask you to bear in mind that these newspapers were not individual publications, and unconnected with the parties to this offence which we call conspiracy. The reason why we read the extracts from newspapers, and made the defendants responsible for those newspapers, was this—that they belonged to an association which undertook the circulation of them—that those newspapers contained appeals to the Army—that they contained appeals to every prejudice which could be raised in the mind of the Celt against the Saxon. I ask you to bear in mind the scenes chosen for the meetings, for the express purpose of reminding the Irishmen attending them of events in past history which you cannot reflect on without the deepest lamentation—bear in mind that the 23rd of May was chosen as the anniversary of the Irish insurrection—remember the songs that were distributed and introduced by some, I know not by whom, into the barracks of the troops. Who was responsible for circulating such songs as this?—

"Who blushes at the name?"

"When cowards mock the patriot's fate,

"Who hangs his head for shame?"

"He's all a knave, or half a slave,

"Who slights his country thus;

"But a true man, like you, man,

Can you mistake what the object was of the studious circulation among an inflammable people of songs like this? Who are the really responsible parties? The printer who printed them? Was it not he, whoever he may be, who belonged to an association which had officers, subordinate officers, whose duty it was to circulate the newspapers containing such songs and appeals, because of the subscriptions they received? Should we have been justified, in the state in which the country was, in refusing to appeal to that which was our only instrument—the ordinary law of this country—for the repression of such proceedings? I will not enter into the subject of the trials themselves; the House must be completely exhausted on that topic. We determined to appeal to the law. We did appeal to it. I declare that it was far from our wish that the Jury should be constituted on any other principle than those which are consistent with public justice. Our advice was, "Don't strike off a Roman Catholic in his capacity of Roman Catholic," thus acknowledging the perfect equality between the Roman Catholic and the Protestant. We appealed to the law. We succeeded in proving that the offence charged was within the law. It is impossible, certainly, to satisfy those who object to our course. The right hon. Gentleman opposite says, you have only convinced us that there should have been no prosecution. We had only one instrument; we had no Coercion Act. We determined not to avail ourselves of the Protestant feeling existing in Ireland; but we had only the Common Law; and then, when we use that instrument, you turn round upon us, and you charge us that upon us rests the responsibility of all these affairs, as promoting the discontent which we would suppress. But was, I ask you, the country in that state that you could forbear? You charge us with seeking to govern Ireland by military law. See, you say, how the Army has been increased by 7,000 men.. Let me now put the House in possession of the state in which the country was placed by this continued agitation. In the South of Ireland, night after night there appeared the most extraordinary display of signal fires on every eminence in the country. Here are some of the accounts we received. On the 20th of October, 1843, the account I am about to read is dated from the county of Tipperary.

"Last evening, about eight or nine o'clock, the hills in this part of the country, through nearly an entire district, were lighted simultaneously, and they continued so for nearly an hour. We have not ascertained the object of these fires, but they seem to be in connexion with the Repeal movement. Much excitement prevails, particularly amongst the Protestants, many of whom congregated at my quarters next the police-barracks in self-defence. However, the night passed quietly by."

Another letter from Tipperary describes a similar state of things, and adds,

"We could hear the shouts of the people. The Protestants of the town and neighbourhood are in great alarm, fearing that the town will be attacked. About ten young men armed themselves, and came to the police-barracks, in order to render assistance."

From Galway there were the same accounts. One letter says,—

"Last night there were more signal fires, and in the adjoining counties of Clare and Tipperary. We could hear the blowing of horns and the shouts of the people. Candles were lighted in all the houses in Woodford, except three, and the inhabitants thought an insurrectionary movement was about to take place."

Sir, were these things for the purpose of petition? Were not these things the result of that fearful system of agitation which left us at last no alternative, if we wished to prevent collision and insurrectionary outbreak, but to appeal to the only instrument left to us, and to call on the chief movers of the agitation to answer to their country for their conduct? We preferred the charge—not lightly, as I have shown—not, as I have shown, having trapped the parties into the offence; we preferred the charge under the ordinary law—under the same law in which you prosecuted Vincent, under the same law to which you appealed when you read newspapers that had been published at a previous period, and made Vincent responsible for their publication. We charged those persons under the law of conspiracy, because we did not wish to proceed against subordinate agents; we proceeded against those who told us that our “do-nothing” policy would not do—who declared that the Queen had the power to Repeal the Act of Union—who boasted that they would drive a coach and six through all our Acts of Parliament—that they would evade and defy the law. We stepped forward, not in consequence of these taunts, but because of the state of the country, brought on by this pernicious agitation; we went to the Court and asked whether such proceedings were tolerable in a country where Civil Government prevails. The Bench were unanimous in their opinion as to the law, the Jury brought in a discriminating and considerate verdict, and the parties charged were convicted of the offence laid in the indictment. We have done this without coercion, without appealing to the excited and irritated feelings; and having done this, and having at least succeeded without the effusion of blood, without conflict, without collision, then comes a powerful party in this House to arraign us for the course we have pursued. The whole indignation of that party is directed against us—sometimes for our forbearance, sometimes for our vigour. Wise after the result, every step we have taken during this painful and anxious effort to maintain the law by the ordinary powers of the law—every step, I say, is now tracked with the sagacity of party, to fasten on some little error or mistake—to charge us with being reckless of life—to allege against us an indifference to liberty, and a desire to govern Ireland by the sword instead of by the law. If we had taken some other course—if we had been too precipitate in our interference—if we had dispersed a meeting when we were not legally empowered to do so—if we had charged illegality as against a single individual meeting, and had failed to prove it—had we selected some poor printer and shut him in gaol—had we done either or all of these things, I appeal to the House with what very different sounds, with what very different accusations, would these walls now have been ringing. You would have told us that we had interposed without a necessity—that we had evinced a desire to interfere with the right of petition—that we had not the courage to select the favourites of the people—that we had pursued the unmanly and paltry course of inflicting vengeance on a printer. But we had the courage to face the difficulties of the case, to apprehend and bring to trial the powerful among the leaders of the people. Sir, I must say, in the face of the country, that in repressing this agitation we have had no assistance whatever from the other side. At the same time, I can say with perfect truth, that you (addressing the Opposition) know what it is to be exposed to the same painful trials. You have had organized meetings against the public peace; it has been your fate—your painful fate—to have had to deal with the fires at Bristol, the attack on Newport, and the insurrection in Canada. If you had then found a powerful party ranged against you,—if we had taken up Mr. Papineau and espoused his cause—I beg pardon, you took him up,—if we had watched all your proceedings in Canada,—if we had brought forward a Motion inculcating you, when the Grand Jury ignored the Bills, and you sent ex officio informations against the disturbers of the public peace,—if we had tracked you at every step, expressing a faint disapprobation only of the “hardly justifiable conduct” of men engaged in the cause of liberty;—had we done these things, then, let me tell you, you would have found it a much more difficult task than you did to vindicate the law, and protect the authority of the Government. Sir, this is the defence which I offer on the part of the Government—for our forbearance at first—for our determination to make use of no other instrument than the law—and for our application of the law, when considerations of the public safety left us no alternative but to pursue a course of repression. Sir, I have still to make some observations on that which will be remembered, when these party conflicts shall have been forgotten. By far the most important part of this great question is the policy to be hereafter pursued towards Ireland. Sir, I do not hesitate to declare, upon this occasion, that I shall consider it my first duty to consider what in the present state of Ireland—the public interests require. I shall not be driven by the fear of any taunts, or by any quotations from Hansard, from freely and fully expressing my opinions as to the course which should now be pursued. I should be utterly ashamed of myself if I was prevented by the fear of being charged with inconsistency, from advising and adopting any measure which I believed would be conducive to the restoration of peace, and the advancement of the general interests of the whole country. Sir, this is a comprehensive and difficult subject; it embraces the position of Ireland with respect to her physical and material interests; it concerns the civil and political rights of the people; it refers to matters connected with their religious sentiments and their religious instruction. Sir, the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. O'Connell), attached great, but not undue importance to the physical condition of Ireland; he stated, and with truth, that political grievances would be less felt if the material condition of the people were less miserable; but if his be a true representation, I wonder that when the hon. and learned Gentleman demanded an identity in the Franchise—when he claimed at least an equality of the Franchise proportionate to the amount of property and population—I wonder it did not occur to him that if wealth be taken into the calculation, supposing his statement that 70 per cent. of the whole population are involved in pauperism to be accurate, that a Franchise in exact proportion to the population would be full of danger, and involve a hazard which it would be most unwise to encounter. Sir, whatever may be our differences in other respects, in one thing, at least, we all agree, in the endeavour to improve the social condition of Ireland apart from political considerations. Sir, Her Majesty's Government gave to that subject, during the continuance of the late excitement, their fullest consideration. In the course of last Session a Bill was brought in by a benevolent Member of this House—the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. S. Crawford), to improve the Law of Landlord and Tenant in Ireland. I promised, on the part of the Government, that all due consideration should be given to that Bill; that promise I fulfilled: but upon reflection, we felt that the subject was so vast, and the evils connected with it so various and complicated, that no legislation upon it could be beneficial except it were founded on the very fullest information as to the actual circumstances of the case. I therefore advised Her Majesty to appoint a Commission composed of landlords in Ireland, whom I took care should be men equally distinguished for their character and intelligence as for the extent of their property. In order to shew that we wished no religious feeling or prejudice to creep into this inquiry, if our wishes had been fulfilled, the Commission would have consisted of four Gentlemen, besides the Earl of Devon, two of whom should have been Protestants, and two Roman Catholics. One of the Gentlemen, however, to whom I applied, was prevented from agreeing to my request, not from any unwillingness to forward the inquiry, but from the circumstances that his health or the calls of other duties would prevent him; and I then proceeded to form the Commission in such a way as I thought most likely to render it efficient for the object in view. I desired that the whole state of the relations of landlords and tenants in Ireland should be ascertained and made clear. It is, I am aware, a very difficult question. A very strong, and I do not hesitate to say, a very unfair and unjust prejudice exists against the whole class of landlords in Ireland, as though they were of a different class of men, and actuated by different motives and feelings to the landlords in England, no account being taken of the peculiar and unfavourable circumstances in which they were themselves placed with regard to their property. I thought it better, therefore, that we should institute an inquiry into the state of those connected with land in various parts of the country, rather than depend upon the information received casually from particular districts; as for instance, in some parts of the North, where the condition of the tenant is said to be an improved and improving one. Above all things, I thought that this inquiry would do good, by bringing to light the conduct of landlords, and so restraining them from the habit of perverting the law to do wrong. I thought it would be of use to bring to light and contrast the conduct of the good and judicious landlord with that of the harsh and overbearing landlord. In bringing all these facts to light, I thought we should be taking the best means to draw attention to the subject, and to lead to a practical amelioration of the tenantry of Ireland. The noble Lord opposite has referred to a book entitled "A Cry from Ireland." I have read that book, and it is impossible for any man to read it without being shocked at the manner in which the legal powers of the landlords are too frequently used in Ireland. The noble Lord suggests that a short Act of Parliament might at once be introduced to remedy this evil. Then why does not the noble Lord bring it in himself? Will he allow me to ask him—I do not speak for the purpose of crimination—what he has been doing for the last ten years, if legislation on this subject is so easy? Is there not, indeed, a greater danger that when altering the legal exercise of rights as they at present exist, by the interposition of a new law, you may not be incurring new evils as great as those which you so attempt to remedy? Just see how conflicting are the opinions. The noble Lord says that Commissions are dangerous. I know they are. But I have heard a good deal more said about this Commission than some others that I remember. I know the expectations which such Commissions always excite. We could not enquire into the disturbances in South Wales by means of a Commission without exciting the most ridiculous expectations. In short, it is impossible to detail the extraordinary delusive expectations which are derived from inquiries of this kind. But the noble Lord says, “I wish for a small Bill,” not explaining what is to be the character of it. Now, this is exactly the course which has been adopted for the last ten years. Some Member not connected with the Government asks leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law relating to Landlord and Tenant in Ireland. The Chief Secretary for Ireland gets up and says, “This is a subject full of difficulties, but I do not object to the hon. Member bringing in his Bill.” The Bill is brought in and read a first time. The second reading is moved; the Chief Secretary does not object to that, but reserves himself for the Committee. The Bill gets into Committee, and on the first Clause the hon. Member is met by ten thousand valid objections; the Bill consequently stands over, the Session closes, and nothing is done. That has been the course for the last ten years. Sir, we have done precisely this:—We allowed the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. S. Crawford) to introduce his Bill; we allowed it to be read a second time, and then on some Wednesday, when the Committee came on, it was inevitably postponed and laid over until the Session closed. Could it be otherwise? Is not that the way we should have been obliged to redeem our pledge to the hon. Member of giving the Bill our consideration? Then says the right hon. Gentleman opposite, “I will take the opinions of two Irishmen supposed to be particularly versed in the subject of the relation of Landlord and Tenant in Ireland.” Says one of them the hon. and learned Member for Cork.

“I anticipate the greatest objections to the Landlord and Tenant Commission. There is one simple remedy for the evils of Ireland. Repeal all the laws that have been passed since the Union. That will restore Ireland to the happy state in which she was under that Parliament which was so celebrated for its purity, and integrity—the last that sat in Dublin.”

This is the opinion of one of two authorities. What says the right hon. Gentleman, Mr. Sheil? He was determined to give warning beforehand.

“I understand,” says he, “that you intend to interfere with the Bill introduced by that consummate master of the law of Landlord and Tenant, Mr. Lynch, who is actually a Master in Chancery. I warn you to take heed how you tamper with a law which is the Magna Charta of Landlords and Tenants in Ireland.”

That, then, is the contradictory advice of two eminent Irish Members. One says that we must not touch the last Act which has been passed on the subject, for by so doing we shall compromise the rights of Landlords and Tenants, and he is followed by his hon. and learned Friend, who says that the only thing is to abolish every law that has been passed since the Union. Sir, I ask the House, is it not wiser to adopt that course which has met with the approbation of the very high authority of two Roman Catholic Members who have spoken in the course of this debate, in a spirit which entitles them to the highest respect—I mean the Members for Louth and Roscommon? Those hon. Members, in speeches in which was not infused one particle of party spirit, have declared their approbation of the Landlord and Tenant Commission, stating that they thought the motives of Her Majesty's Government in appointing it were honest, and that the course pursued was, in all the difficulties, the wisest course. Sir, we have been influenced by no other motives in appointing that Commission than because we believe it will form the foundation of permanent and useful legislation—protecting the rights of property, encouraging no vain expectations; but being fully convinced that we cannot probe the evil to its bottom, except through the instrumentality of extensive local information. So much for a measure upon which we depend, not so much for the purpose of immediate improvement, as because it will lay the foundation of future improvement in the moral and physical condition of the people, so far as that is mixed up with the relation of Landlord and Tenant. And now, Sir, as to the Franchise. I have no hesitation on the part of the Government in declaring their desire that every privilege given by the Catholic Relief Bill, and every vote given by the Reform Bill should be fully and fairly exercised. I do not know what the noble Lord's opinions may be on this point. I am certain, however, it would be unwise now to disturb the relative proportions of Members fixed by the Reform Act for the two countries. But, as to the Franchise on principle I think it ought to be one of substantial equality between Ireland and Great Britain. I do not say identity—that would be impossible. I do not say nominal equality—that would be unattainable; but I cannot contend against this principle—I willingly indeed admit it—that there ought to be substantial equality of civil privileges for Protestant and Catholic, and that the Franchise should be really equal in the two countries. That there ought not to be identity nor nominal equality many even on the opposite side will, I suppose be foremost to contend; for on that side in the course of this Debate there has been the most anxious endeavour to deprecate the extension to Ireland of the “Chandos clause,” it having been said that the application of that clause to Ireland would encourage landlords to refuse to grant leases for years or lives, and to require tenancies at will. I give, Sir, no opinion on that subject. I refer only to arguments used in this Debate, to show that Gentlemen on the other side do not contend for identity or nominal equality of Franchise. Nor, Sir, do I mean that in the case of any Irish Franchise which may have been abolished on account of the manner in which it has been abused, that it should be restored merely because it exists in England. But I hope I shall not be misunderstood when I say—(it is sufficient for the purposes of this Debate)—speaking of the Franchise—I think the principle on which we ought to go—I will not recur to the past on this subject; I will not be deterred by fear of taunts about Registration Bills, from freely avowing my opinion—the principle which we wish to apply is that of substantial equality between the two countries. It is enough for the purpose of this Debate, to deal with principles, and I abstain from entering into details. And now, Sir, I approach by far the most important subject connected with Ireland, namely, the course we ought to take with respect to the Established Church in Ireland. On that I will without reserve, with the same explicitness as my noble and right hon. Friends, declare my opinion; and, if the House permit me, I will state the reasons for that opinion. I find in Ireland the Protestant Reformed Religion and the Episcopal Church established in that country. I find that they have been established for a period of above 250 years, and I find that Establishment ratified and confirmed by Acts of Parliament, partaking of the nature of a solemn compact, so far as an Act of Parliament can. I believe that will hardly be denied by hon. Members on the other side. It was the intention of Parliament at the time of the Union, to give an assurance to the Protestants of Ireland and to the Protestants of this country, that the passing of the Act of Union should not endanger the existence of the Established Church, and that its endowments should be secured to it. I am stating as far as possible what were the intentions of the Legislature. At a subsequent period, in 1829, I am bound to say, the intentions of those who passed the measure of that year—of those who invited Protestants to waive their objections, and who used all their influence to combat those objections,—their intention was to give assurance to the Protestants, and if they acquiesced in the removal of Catholic disabilities, there should be a guarantee to the Established Church. Now, I must say, that so far as compacts can have force, the Union and the Emancipation Act were such compacts. Precisely the same compact was established with Scotland at the time of the Union. At that time a guarantee was given that the Presbyterian Church should be the Established Religion—or rather at an earlier period that assurance was given; but it was confirmed by Queen Anne at the time of the Union. I was rather surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Edinburgh, (Mr. Macaulay) in the course of his eloquent and very able speech, advert to what took place on the Abolition of the Slave Trade, with the view of justifying our departing from the compact entered into at the period of the Union with Ireland. “Men have changed their opinions on many important points,” said the right hon. Gentleman; and then he described the scene graphically, in which he said Mr. Wilberforce had “pulled down the present Duke of Northumberland when rising to propose the Abolition of Slavery.” Those who recollect the relative size of the two individuals must admit the picture of the right hon. Gentleman to have been purely imaginative. And the right hon. Gentleman drew not less upon his imagination for the debate than for the description. I have referred to it since, and this is really what took place:—So far from Mr. Wilberforce abjuring the notion of the Abolition of Slavery, he said he did not press it then, he expressly said,—

“ I have never been of opinion, that slavery should not be ultimately abolished. I wished to postpone the period of Abolition until the time when the mind of the negro shall have been prepared by education for the blessings of freedom.”

And this the right hon. Gentleman considers a parallel case to that of the guarantee given at the Union for the perpetuation of the Established Church! All I say is, that so far as national compacts can have force, that compact does exist for the maintenance of the Established Church in Ireland. But, again, so far as authority can go, I can refer to the highest in favour of its maintenance. I will not quote men prejudiced in favour of the Church. I will take those than whom I could not name men whose opinions you would sooner take on matters affecting the comprehensive interests of Ireland, and particularly with respect to the Church and the Catholics—I will cite the opinions of Mr. Burke, Mr. Grattan, Lord Plunkett, and Sir J. Newport. Mr. Burke, the earliest and the ablest of the advocates of Catholic claims—entertaining the keenest sense of the wrongs inflicted by the penal code, and whose speeches showed that he then maintained principles subsequently carried out, but which at that time excited little attention—Mr. Burke did not conceal from himself any part of the truth as respects the Church:—

“ You have in Ireland an Establishment which, though the religion of the Prince, and of most of the first classes of landed proprietors, is not the religion of the major part of the inhabitants, and which, consequently, does not answer to them any one purpose of a religious Establishment.” “ It is an Establishment from which they did not partake the least, living or dying, either of instruction or of consolation.”

Therefore Mr. Burke did not conceal from himself any of the objections which are now urged against the Established Church; but at the same time he went on and said,—

“ Not one of the zealots for a Protestant interest wishes more sincerely than I do, perhaps not half so sincerely, for the support of the Established Church in both these Kingdoms. It is a great link towards holding fast the connection of Religion with the State. I wish it well, as the religion of the greater number of the primary land proprietors of the Kingdom, with whom all Establishments of Church and State, for strong political reasons, ought, in my opinion, to be firmly connected. I wish it well, because it is more closely combined than any other of the Church systems with the Crown, which is the stay of the mixed constitution. I have another and infinitely stronger reason for wishing it well. It is, that at the present time I consider it as one of the main pillars of the Christian religion itself.”

Now, these are the opinions of Mr. Burke—with all the objections to the Establishment clearly before him, and placed on record by himself. With respect to Lord Plunkett, he said he would fling the Roman Catholic question to the winds if he thought the removal of the Roman Catholic disabilities would compromise the existence of the Established Church. The dying bequest of Mr. Grattan to his country was an earnest wish that the removal of the Roman Catholic disabilities might be combined with that which he thought essential, namely, the maintenance of the Protestant Church in Ireland. The opinion of Sir J. Newport was, that the Protestant Established Church, at the time he was speaking, required extensive reforms, and it was also the opinion of Sir J. Newport—a man inferior to the others in point of intellectual grasp, but not in devotion and tried fidelity to Ireland—that the Roman Catholic disabilities ought to be removed—that there ought to be perfect equality of privilege and franchise, but that the Protestant Church in Ireland ought to be maintained as the Establishment of the country. I think, therefore, I am not going too far in saying, that as far as compact and authority are concerned, they have as great weight as they possibly can have in favour of the Established Church. But it may be asked, are compact and authority to be conclusive and decisive? If we are now ourselves convinced, that the social welfare of Ireland requires an alteration of the law, and a departure from that compact, and a disregard of that authority, are our legislative functions to be so bound up, that they must maintain the compact in spite of our conviction? I for one am not prepared to contend for such a proposition. But at the same time this compact is a most material element for our consideration:—Nothing would have a greater tendency to lower the authority of Parliament than not to keep the faith you have pledged; to make these compacts, and then, within ten years, to revoke them. While I do not think they impose on you a paramount obligation, to which you are bound at all hazards and at all risks to defer, yet I do think that nothing would be more unfortunate, and nothing more prejudicial to your authority—nothing so destructive of the prospect of future legislation, as a departure from such compacts. How can you hope to persuade parts of the population of this country, having strong feelings and opinions, to relinquish them in consequence of your guarantee and assurances, unless you are prepared to maintain them, or prepared to show that there is a positive overwhelming necessity which obliges you to depart from them? I maintain the Church in Ireland not only on compact, not only on authority, but I maintain it on that higher ground which is convincing to my own mind. After the most dispassionate consideration I bring reason and conviction in aid of both compact and authority. I therefore will not defend the Church merely on the comparatively narrow ground of compact. I will not say, "I wish I could alter it, I think it is for the interest of Ireland to alter it, but I am bound by a compact." That is not my impediment. My impediment to the destruction or undermining of the Protestant Church is derived from the conviction of my own mind. I do not believe it to be for the interest of Ireland, or any portion of Ireland, that I should acquiesce in the destruction of the Protestant Church; and I will assign my reasons for this conviction. I am not now to determine what is the best condition in respect to a new state of society in which more than 7,000,000 profess a religion different from the Protestant Church, and not more than 2,000,000 profess the faith of the Protestant Church. I am not considering what is the best constitution for that society. I am to deal with a country in respect to which these compacts and guarantees exist, and with respect to which there is a prescription of 250 years—and with respect to which the landed proprietors, the great mass of them Protestants, are identified in feeling with the Established Church. I am now to consider what, under all the circumstances of this case, is the best arrangement to make? First of all, I contend for the necessity of an Establishment. I apprehend, that without infringing on the privileges or conscience of any man, I have a right to maintain this opinion. I think, with the example of Establishments in England and Scotland, and with my conviction as to what is necessary for the purpose of religion, that in Ireland an Establishment of some kind is necessary. [Hear.] Do not take advantage of an expression. I am now addressing myself to the first step in the argument—shall there be an Establishment or not? You say I am wrong, for that an Establishment is not necessary. You may cavil at my expression, but I am considering the great question, is it for the public interest to have an Establishment? One of my reasons for maintaining an Establishment in Ireland is because I think it important for Ireland. I think if you had no Establishment in that country you would have bitterer religious animosities. I look at the question, first, as it affects Ireland; and, next, of this I am certain, that if you establish the precedent of having no Establishment in Ireland, little time will elapse before the precedent will be referred to as a principle applicable to England. How long a period do you suppose would elapse? The other night an hon. Friend of mine, the Member for Pontefract, gave notice of his intention to move a resolution in favour of a provision for the secular Roman Catholic clergy; and immediately the hon. Member for Sheffield gave notice of his intention to move, as an amendment upon that Motion,

"That no provision for the maintenance of the secular Roman Catholic Clergy in Ireland can be just or expedient, or will tend to the re-establishment of tranquillity in that country, unless based upon such a revision of the whole Ecclesiastical system as will place the Clergy of all religious denominations upon a footing of perfect equality."

And the hon. Member for Montrose was so impatient that he would not wait for the introduction of the Bill, or even for the discussion of the Motion; but, on hearing the Notices given, was good enough at once to signify his intention to apply the same principle to this country as his hon. Friend intended to apply to the Establishment of Ireland, and gave notice of a motion for an Address to her Majesty—

"That she will be pleased to institute an inquiry whether the number of Her Majesty's subjects dissenting from the doctrines and discipline of the Established Churches of England, Ireland, and Scotland, are now more in number than those who belong to and attend the Established Churches; and, if so, whether the time is not arrived when all the public property granted by Parliament for the support of those Established Churches; should be withdrawn from them, respect being had to the existing interests of the Clergy and other persons actually employed in the service of the Established Churches; and whether it will not be more just and useful to the people of this Kingdom to apply the Revenue of the Church for the purpose of educating the people, or for such other national purposes as Parliament may think fit."

If you apply this principle in Ireland it will be referred to as a rule for England; and, therefore, my opinion is decidedly in favour of an Establishment, and it is decidedly in favour of continuing the Protestant Church as that Establishment. I cannot conceive a more important question than that which will arise as to the nature of the relations between an Established Church and the State. The Roman Catholics say they will submit to no regulations. In the case of the Protestant Church—when you made it a State Establishment—when you gave it endowments—you subjected it to great restrictions. You controlled the meeting of its convocation; you expressed great anxiety regarding its authority: you displayed considerable jealousy of its acts; and you subjected it to the restraints of the law; at the same time that you also subjected it to the milder restraints of patronage, and gave to the Crown the right of preferment to its highest offices. It is difficult to estimate the influence of these circumstances over the Church. It is difficult to decide how it may have affected its position. But what do the Roman Catholics say? They tell you—If we take our endowments, we will not submit to your power. We will not be subjected to your restraints; we will refuse to concede you any control; and the appointment to our highest offices shall be vested in a spiritual, and not a civil, functionary. Said the hon. Member for Kildare the other night, speaking with great decision and much authority, if you try to interfere with our arrangements with the Pope, if you take the course that other countries take, I tell you that your authority will not prevail—that your regulations will not be observed—that the Ecclesiastical Authorities in Ireland will rebel. That is the opinion of the hon. Member for Kildare. Will he tell me, then, what equality there can be in giving the endowments of the Church, which is now under our control, to a form of religious faith which refuses to submit to our regulations? On the part of all Churches there is a disposition to remonstrate against the exercise of the civil power—there is an impatience, a great impatience, of civil control. You have thought proper to control the Church. You have ever been jealous of those who claimed more than ordinary exemption from secular authority. In Scotland within the last two years, you have found a party in the Established Church claiming exemption from civil control, demanding to be subjected to spiritual authority only, and requiring that the boundaries between spiritual and civil control should be defined. You have not conceded these demands. What would you do with your own, the Protestant Episcopal Church, supposing she was to ask for the same immunities and exemptions now demanded on behalf of the Catholics of Ireland? Would you grant her supreme authority in spiritual matters? I am sure you would not; and I ask, therefore, what right has a Church which refuses to submit to your control to claim for itself the transfer of those privileges which now belong to a Church which submits to control? The noble Lord (Lord Howick) said, that it was an objection to Establishments that the selection of one form of worship was an insult to the professors of another faith.

Lord Howick.—No, no. The learned Recorder said, that he defended the maintenance of the Established Church because it rested on the eternal principle of religious truth. What I said was, that if you declared it to rest on the eternal principles of religious truth, you implied that others rested on principles of religious error.

Sir R. Peel.—I don't admit that as a consequence, and I tell the noble Lord at once, that I do say, that in this country a preference is given by the Legislature to the Protestant Church from a preference—a decided preference—to its doctrines. Yes, and I say more; I say that the preference to its doctrines implies no insult to those who dissent from those doctrines, and that it is extravagant to say that because I prefer my own form of religious faith, I am involved in the necessity of insulting or persecuting those who differ from me. I say, too, that as far as this objection goes, the principle of an Establishment does not depend on majorities or minorities. You may think it right to establish a form of religion on account of the majority adopting and professing that form; but the fact of your establishing that form gives you no right to insult the minority who dissent from it. Every one has a proposition on this subject, and the hon. Member for Sheffield has his. I consider the proposition of the hon. Member tantamount to a total suppression of all Churches. He proposes to divide the Revenue into three parts, according to certain proportions. He gives 70,000 to the Presbyterians, 70,000 to the Episcopal Church, and 430,000 to the Catholic Church. I say it evinces no equality to give 70,000 to a Church which submits to your control, and 430,000 to a Church which does not. To do that would be, I think, to reverse the principle of justice. If you follow out the principle of numbers, the mere analogy would lead you to establish the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. Is the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) prepared for that? Are you prepared to admit those who owe their promotion to another power than the Crown to sit on the Bishops' Bench in the House of Lords? If you are not prepared to do that, you must admit that your principle of equality requires modification. What is the proposition? "On account of those difficulties which you say exist, permit us to relieve you from them and to destroy the Established Church." I must say, a more unreasonable and unjust proposition was never made. Here is a religion guaranteed by solemn Acts of Parliament, by long prescription, the Protestant religion, which is in alliance with the State, which has endowed it for 250 years. I am told I cannot maintain it, not because they want the Roman Catholic religion to be established, but because it is inconvenient that an Establishment should contain what will promote religious peace in Ireland. Do you believe it will promote mutual concord to say to the Protestants, "Civil disabilities have been removed, equality of Franchise has been granted, we now tell you we cannot maintain the Established Church any longer, and you must relinquish it?" You don't know to what extent you would then go. Would you stop with the endowments? What will you do as to the places of worship? Do you mean that you would confer religious peace on the country by calling upon the Protestants to sacrifice their endowments, and to transfer their churches to the Roman Catholics? You must do that if you adopt the principle of analogy, on the principle of the hon. Member for Sheffield. Very little, indeed, do you know the spirit you would provoke. I believe that a proposition more calculated to insure discord could not be imagined, and, therefore, I am prepared to offer just as decided an objection to the proposal of the hon. Gentleman, as I am to transfer the revenues to the Roman Catholics. There is another course that may be pursued, not to stand upon compact, not to stand upon authority, not to venture at once to destroy the Church, but to take some course for the purpose of undermining and impairing its foundations. I think that course is just as fatal as any other. I think that not to destroy life, but to infuse some slow poison into its veins, which shall ultimately lead to its destruction, is a course as little in unison with religious or social peace as any of the others. Therefore I come to the conclusion, founding myself upon compact, upon authority, and upon the conviction of my mind, that the best course—and the course which I, for one, as far as my humble powers can be exerted, will pursue—is to maintain in its integrity the Protestant Church. When I say in its integrity, I do not mean to exclude all such reforms as may increase the efficiency of its Establishment for the purposes of the Church; but I do mean that I will neither consent to the overthrow of the Church, to the establishment of three forms of religion in Ireland, to the division of the revenues between Protestant, Presbyterian, and Roman Catholic; nor can I consent to any of those similar devices which mean nothing, if they do not mean the ultimate destruction of the Church. I have stated, therefore, the grounds on which I propose to act with respect to the religious Establishment. Does that compel me to exclude altogether from consideration the position of the Roman Catholic Church? Am I to consider that Church altogether as an outcast, and to refuse the consideration of any regulations which may improve its condition? Endowment from the State you absolutely reject. We have been assured that the voluntary endowment by individuals might be provided for without any violation of conscience, and would be considered as a great boon. The noble Lord, the Member for Tiverton, threw out that suggestion in the course of last Session. The noble Lord, if I mistake not, declared opinions as to a Protestant Establishment little different from what I have stated; but at the same time he said he was prepared to treat the Roman Catholic religion with every consideration compatible with the maintenance of the Establishment. He desired us in a friendly spirit to consider whether there could be any objection to permit voluntary endowment by individuals, Protestant and Roman Catholic, for the purpose of making a provision for Roman Catholics. We professed our readiness to consider the subject, and the moment we profess our readiness to consider it, we are met as usual by the declaration that it will not be of the slightest advantage, unless brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman opposite! Certainly we undertook to consider it, and I believe there were many landed proprietors, Protestant as well as Roman Catholic, who would have been disposed, for the sake of promoting peace, for the purpose of improving the condition of Roman Catholic Ecclesiastics, to make a voluntary provision for endowment. The absence of such endowment used to be dwelt on as a great grievance. In a work which must be familiar to the right hon. Gentleman, "Scully on the Penal Laws," he describes the state of the law as to charitable endowments:—

"It is, therefore, not too much to affirm," he says, "on a view of all the circumstances, that no person can safely give or grant any land, money, or other property, to or for the permanent support of any Catholic Priest, house of worship, school, or charitable edifice, or foundation of any charitable description, subject, as such donation must be, to serious doubts and difficulties. That these donations would be diverted to Protestant institutions, directly contrary to the donor's interest is a prospect sufficiently discouraging to deter every person from making them. This may be taken to amount to actual and positive prohibition."

The actual and positive prohibition we are willing to remove, accompanied with such securities as may prevent abuse; and certainly I am surprised that our proposition should in this debate have been met in the manner in which it has. We persevere, however, in our intentions, and are perfectly prepared to consider the means. There only remains the subject of Education. I must refer to the course which we have taken on the subject of National Education as sufficiently indicative of our determination to adopt those measures which we believe to be for the welfare of Ireland, even at the risk of offending many of our countrymen. We propose, in the present year, to make a considerable increase to the grant for National Education. I should be very sorry to refuse to consider the means of still further increasing the Revenue. It has been suggested that instruction in the science of Agriculture might be usefully given in Ireland, and grafted on the present system of National Education. I should be sorry to exclude the consideration of matters of that sort; I should be very sorry to exclude the consideration of the means of providing some system of academical education for higher classes than those educated in the National Schools; but for the present we intend to give an increased vote; to a considerable extent, for the purpose of National Education. I have now completed what I had to say, and I thank the House for the indulgence. I trust they believe I have only trespassed upon them at such length in the performance of a public duty. I have stated our general views of the policy and of the measures which we propose to adopt. In themselves they may not be immediate and effectual remedies for the evils under which Ireland labours; but I trust at least I have said enough to show the spirit in which the Government is prepared to consider the question of Irish Legislation. I was reminded by the hon. Gentleman, the Member for Shrewsbury, in the course of the very able speech which he made the other night, a speech not the less to be admired because it departed from the ordinary routine of Parliamentary eloquence, and touched on more comprehensive and general views,—I was reminded by him of a declaration which I made, that I thought Ireland was a subject of too much importance to be sacrificed to our party feelings. I say, and say with perfect truth, in a friendly and not in a hostile spirit, that if any Gentleman, however attached to the party of the Government, should consider that the state of Ireland requires more efficient remedies than we are prepared to adopt, should consider that we are not the instruments by which good can be effected in Ireland—I say, and say it with perfect truth and sincerity, that I think this is a subject of such paramount importance, that all ordinary party considerations should give way, and that any Gentleman who thinks that by a vote hostile to the Government, he will be promoting the permanent welfare of Ireland, I give my opinion that in that vote he would be justified. I declare, for myself, that upon that opinion I would act, that I would make no sacrifice of judgment, no sacrifice of conscientious feeling to party purposes or personal ambition, where the welfare of that part of the Empire is concerned. I think I may say, I have some

right to hold that language, I have made sacrifices before for the purpose of restoring peace to Ireland, the least of which was the loss of official power. I have encountered reproaches, the more bitter, because they came from friends and not opponents. I suffered the loss of private friendship and the alienation of private esteem. Why am I not at this moment the cherished representative instead of the rejected candidate of the University of Oxford? When we proposed in 1829, the removal of the Roman Catholic disabilities, the loss of office was a mere secondary consideration, and in the hope of securing peace in Ireland, I sacrificed that which was the greatest distinction I ever aspired to—the representation of that honoured institution where I had slaked the thirst of early ambition. I am asked whether I consider the present state of Ireland satisfactory. I confess that I consider it any thing but satisfactory. But I certainly hope that Civil Government, without resorting to the use of military force, may be maintained in that country. While we retain office, we will maintain the law. We will exert all the authority and power of the Crown—at least we will advise its exercise, and exert the authority of the law temperately, firmly, and moderately—for the purpose of resisting agitation. We hold ourselves not responsible for the increase of military force. We deprecate the necessity for it. We only applied it for the purpose of averting calamities of which we were not the authors. But, having done this, I am bound to admit that this is, I think, an unsatisfactory tenure of power. Our policy has been to maintain peace, to restore friendly relations with great powers, and to increase commerce. We have succeeded in improving the revenue, in restoring the balance between income and expenditure. We have witnessed with the highest satisfaction the gradual improvement of trade, and we trust the revival of prosperity in the commercial and manufacturing districts will be permanent. But at the same time, we cannot but confess, that with this intestinum et domesticum malum—this unfortunate condition of Ireland—we cannot look upon the picture with unmingled satisfaction. I trust, however, that that alternative which party suggests—that we are unable to govern Ireland except by force—I trust and believe there is no foundation for that assertion. If indeed party influence be exercised for the purpose of making Ireland ungovernable, it may possibly succeed; but without the

exertion of such party influence, I do not believe that it is impossible to govern Ireland by the ordinary rules by which a country should be governed—with a continuance of the principles which we have always professed. Sir, I see much cause for entertaining bright hopes for the future. By the wonderful applications of science, we are about, I trust, still further to shorten physical distance. I should not be surprised if, even during my own life-time, we are able by its aid to bring Dublin nearer to London than many towns in England now are. I shall not be surprised, seeing the rapid improvement in science, and in the application of machinery—I shall not, I say, be surprised, if the interval between London and Dublin shall be shortened to twelve hours. You have prospectuses before you, some drawn up by eminent engineers, which contemplate the shortening of that interval to fourteen hours; and my own belief is that with the progress of improvement the interval will be still further reduced. I cannot help thinking, too, that there is in the higher classes of society a growing disposition to obliterate old partizanship—to forget all animosities. I never hear a debate of the present day upon the state of Ireland, and compare its tone and spirit with those which animated the old debates upon the same subject, without marking the prevalence through the House of a strong disposition to forget differences of opinion, and to obliterate the recollections of the effect which these differences produced. From this side of the House feelings are frequently expressed favourable towards Ireland, and they are met on the other side by many Roman Catholic Gentlemen in a spirit corresponding to the temper in which they are uttered. I do earnestly trust that the influence of public opinion, as well as that of the law, may control this agitation—may convince those who are concerned in it, that they are prejudicing the best interests of Ireland—impeding its improvement—preventing the application of capital—and hindering the redress of those grievances which can, I think, be better redressed by the application of individual enterprise, than by almost any legislative interference. Sir, I have the firmest conviction that, if there were calmness and tranquillity in Ireland, there is no part of the British dominions which would make such rapid progress as that country, for I know that there are facilities for improvement—opportunities for improvement, which would make

objection to permit voluntary endowment by individuals, Protestant and Roman Catholic, for the purpose of making a provision for Roman Catholics. We professed our readiness to consider the subject, and the moment we profess our readiness to consider it, we are met as usual by the declaration that it will not be of the slightest advantage, unless brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman opposite! Certainly we undertook to consider it, and I believe there were many landed proprietors, Protestant as well as Roman Catholic, who would have been disposed, for the sake of promoting peace, for the purpose of improving the condition of Roman Catholic Ecclesiastics, to make a voluntary provision for endowment. The absence of such endowment used to be dwelt on as a great grievance. In a work which must be familiar to the right hon. Gentleman, "Scully on the Penal Laws," he describes the state of the law as to charitable endowments:—

"It is, therefore, not too much to affirm," he says, "on a view of all the circumstances, that no person can safely give or grant any land, money, or other property, to or for the permanent support of any Catholic Priest, house of worship, school, or charitable edifice, or foundation of any charitable description, subject, as such donation must be, to serious doubts and difficulties. That these donations would be diverted to Protestant institutions, directly contrary to the donor's interest is a prospect sufficiently discouraging to deter every person from making them. This may be taken to amount to actual and positive prohibition."

The actual and positive prohibition we are willing to remove, accompanied with such securities as may prevent abuse; and certainly I am surprised that our proposition should in this debate have been met in the manner in which it has. We persevere, however, in our intentions, and are perfectly prepared to consider the means. There only remains the subject of Education. I must refer to the course which we have taken on the subject of National Education as sufficiently indicative of our determination to adopt those measures which we believe to be for the welfare of Ireland, even at the risk of offending many of our countrymen. We propose, in the present year, to make a considerable increase to the grant for National Education. I should be very sorry to refuse to consider the means of still further increasing the Revenue. It has been suggested that instruction in the science of Agriculture might be usefully given in Ireland, and grafted on the present system of National Education. I should be sorry to exclude the consideration of matters of that sort; I should be very sorry to exclude the consideration of the means of providing some system of academical education for higher classes than those educated in the National Schools; but for the present we intend to give an increased vote; to a considerable extent, for the purpose of National Education. I have now completed what I had to say, and I thank the House for the indulgence. I trust they believe I have only trespassed upon them at such length in the performance of a public duty. I have stated our general views of the policy and of the measures which we propose to adopt. In themselves they may not be immediate and effectual remedies for the evils under which Ireland labours; but I trust at least I have said enough to show the spirit in which the Government is prepared to consider the question of Irish Legislation. I was reminded by the hon. Gentleman, the Member for Shrewsbury, in the course of the very able speech which he made the other night, a speech not the less to be admired because it departed from the ordinary routine of Parliamentary eloquence, and touched on more comprehensive and general views,—I was reminded by him of a declaration which I made, that I thought Ireland was a subject of too much importance to be sacrificed to our party feelings. I say, and say with perfect truth, in a friendly and not in a hostile spirit, that if any Gentleman, however attached to the party of the Government, should consider that the state of Ireland requires more efficient remedies than we are prepared to adopt, should consider that we are not the instruments by which good can be effected in Ireland—I say, and say it with perfect truth and sincerity, that I think this is a subject of such paramount importance, that all ordinary party considerations should give way, and that any Gentleman who thinks that by a vote hostile to the Government, he will be promoting the permanent welfare of Ireland, I give my opinion that in that vote he would be justified. I declare, for myself, that upon that opinion I would act, that I would make no sacrifice of judgment, no sacrifice of conscientious feeling to party purposes or personal ambition, where the welfare of that part of the Empire is concerned. I think I may say, I have some

right to hold that language, I have made sacrifices before for the purpose of restoring peace to Ireland, the least of which was the loss of official power. I have encountered reproaches, the more bitter, because they came from friends and not opponents. I suffered the loss of private friendship and the alienation of private esteem. Why am I not at this moment the cherished representative instead of the rejected candidate of the University of Oxford? When we proposed in 1829, the removal of the Roman Catholic disabilities, the loss of office was a mere secondary consideration, and in the hope of securing peace in Ireland, I sacrificed that which was the greatest distinction I ever aspired to—the representation of that honoured institution where I had slaked the thirst of early ambition. I am asked whether I consider the present state of Ireland satisfactory. I confess that I consider it any thing but satisfactory. But I certainly hope that Civil Government, without resorting to the use of military force, may be maintained in that country. While we retain office, we will maintain the law. We will exert all the authority and power of the Crown—at least we will advise its exercise, and exert the authority of the law temperately, firmly, and moderately—for the purpose of repressing agitation. We hold ourselves not responsible for the increase of military force. We deprecate the necessity for it. We only applied it for the purpose of averting calamities of which we were not the authors. But, having done this, I am bound to admit that this is, I think, an unsatisfactory tenure of power. Our policy has been to maintain peace, to restore friendly relations with great powers, and to increase commerce. We have succeeded in improving the revenue, in restoring the balance between income and expenditure. We have witnessed with the highest satisfaction the gradual improvement of trade, and we trust the revival of prosperity in the commercial and manufacturing districts will be permanent. But at the same time, we cannot but confess, that with this intestinum et domesticum malum—this unfortunate condition of Ireland—we cannot look upon the picture with unmingled satisfaction. I trust, however, that that alternative which party suggests—that we are unable to govern Ireland except by force—I trust and believe there is no foundation for that assertion. If indeed party influence be exercised for the purpose of making Ireland ungovernable, it may possibly succeed; but without the

exertion of such party influence, I do not believe that it is impossible to govern Ireland by the ordinary rules by which a country should be governed—with a continuance of the principles which we have always professed. Sir, I see much cause for entertaining bright hopes for the future. By the wonderful applications of science, we are about, I trust, still further to shorten physical distance. I should not be surprised if, even during my own life-time, we are able by its aid to bring Dublin nearer to London than many towns in England now are. I shall not be surprised, seeing the rapid improvement in science, and in the application of machinery—I shall not, I say, be surprised, if the interval between London and Dublin shall be shortened to twelve hours. You have prospectuses before you, some drawn up by eminent engineers, which contemplate the shortening of that interval to fourteen hours; and my own belief is that with the progress of improvement the interval will be still further reduced. I cannot help thinking, too, that there is in the higher classes of society a growing disposition to obliterate old partizanship—to forget all animosities. I never hear a debate of the present day upon the state of Ireland, and compare its tone and spirit with those which animated the old debates upon the same subject, without marking the prevalence through the House of a strong disposition to forget differences of opinion, and to obliterate the recollections of the effect which these differences produced. From this side of the House feelings are frequently expressed favourable towards Ireland, and they are met on the other side by many Roman Catholic Gentlemen in a spirit corresponding to the temper in which they are uttered. I do earnestly trust that the influence of public opinion, as well as that of the law, may control this agitation—may convince those who are concerned in it, that they are prejudicing the best interests of Ireland—impeding its improvement—preventing the application of capital—and hindering the redress of those grievances which can, I think, be better redressed by the application of individual enterprise, than by almost any legislative interference. Sir, I have the firmest conviction that, if there were calmness and tranquillity in Ireland, there is no part of the British dominions which would make such rapid progress as that country, for I know that there are facilities for improvement—opportunities for improvement, which would make that advance more rapid than that of any other part of our Empire. Sir, I do hope, —and I will conclude by expressing that earnest hope—that this agitation and all its evil consequences, may be permitted to cease. I should rejoice—in whatever capacity I may fill, I should consider it the happiest day of my life—when I see the beloved Sovereign of these realms fulfilling the fondest wishes of her heart—of that heart so full of affection to all her people, but mingling that affection with peculiar sympathy and tenderness to Ireland—I should hail the dawning of that auspicious day, when she could alight like some benignant spirit, on its shores, and there lay the foundations of a temple of peace; when she could, in accents which, proceeding from the heart, speak to the heart, rather than to the ear; when she could call on her Irish subjects, of all classes and of all denominations, Protestant and Catholic, Saxon and Celt, to forget the differences of creed and of race, and to hallow that holy Temple of Peace, of which she laid the foundations—to hallow it with sacrifices, still holier than the sacrifices by which the temples of old were hallowed—to hallow it by the sacrifice of those evil passions which dishonour our common faith, and prevent the union of heart and hand in defence of our common country.

Sir Valentine Blake moved, that the Debate be adjourned. The hon. Baronet attempted to address the House, but the House would not hear him. He concluded by moving, that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. E. B. Roche seconded the motion. He would not, under any other circumstances, have attempted anything so unreasonable, but he was connected with a party which had been accused by the right hon. Baronet of a crime the grossest which human nature could be guilty of—namely, that of willingly deluding their countrymen by a wilful perversion of history. But the right hon. Baronet, in attempting to prove that accusation, perverted the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and by that perversion the right hon. Gentleman attempted to delude the House of Commons and the British public. The right hon. Baronet said, that Mr. O'Connell asserted that the Parliament which existed in Ireland before 1800 was desired again. He said no such thing. That Parliament was corrupt, and no one could defend it. He regretted that the right hon. Baronet should not have attempted, instead of flinging unworthy accusations against agitators, to grapple with the subjects that made them agitators; for he might depend upon it, that if he did not grapple with them, they would grapple with him. He had always avowed himself an agitator; and he was sorry to say, that he was likely to continue an agitator; because it appeared to him that the majority who supported the right hon. Baronet, were not at all disposed to take from him the cause of agitation.

Lord John Russell, in reply, said, I certainly have neither the wish nor the power, considering the exhausted state of the House and of my own strength, to delay the House for any length of time, after this very protracted debate, from coming to a division. There have, however, been some things stated, either personally affecting myself, or having very immediate relation to the Motion I have brought forward, upon which I cannot refrain troubling the House for a few moments. The right hon. Gentleman, the Secretary for the Home Department, who spoke on the first night of the Debate, was pleased (and he was followed afterwards by the noble Lord, the Secretary for the Colonies), to taunt me with the great interest I had evinced on behalf of Mr. O'Connell since the prosecution. Certainly I did think that when Mr. O'Connell had been convicted in a Court of Law, it was the very last period which he could have taken for offering to that hon. Gentleman anything of a disparaging nature. I stated last year my opinion with respect to the Repeal of the Union, and with regard to the Repeal Agitation; and also with regard to the lawfulness of the meetings that were then taking place in Ireland; and having stated these opinions then, I did not think the present moment was the best to indulge in any indignation or complaint of the proceedings of Mr. O'Connell. But all that I did on the subject of Mr. O'Connell's proceedings was, to say that which had often occurred to me, namely, that that hon. Gentleman had rendered very great and essential service with respect to the suppression of the rebellion in Canada—to the opposition of the English Chartists—and the putting down of the Trades' Unions in Ireland; and I shall never regret, whatever the right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Peel), or the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) may say, that I subjected myself to the imputation which has been thrown out against me, because I think that if anything was capable of being said in favour of the course which Mr. O'Connell has pursued, particularly tending to promote at various periods the peace of the country, that this was the moment for doing it. The right hon. Gentleman has taken unnecessary pains, in order to show that I must wish this Motion to be defeated, because previously I had declared my intention to bring forward resolutions as to the future government of Ireland, which it would have been very difficult for me to have done, and the right hon. Gentleman says, that if I had wished to carry a Motion of this kind, I should have made it with respect to the state of Ireland only, and totally apart from all party considerations. But I recollect that such a Motion was made last year by a representative of Ireland, which was sufficiently impartial to impute blame to the late Government, as well as to the present. But was that Motion acceded to? Was it not stoutly opposed, and considered in the light of a vote of censure by the Minister of the Crown, without any remedies being suggested, or any mode of conciliation pointed out? Therefore I think I was justified in coming forward at the commencement of this Session, to point out what I considered to be the cause of the evils existing in Ireland, and what measures I thought the Government ought to adopt, and to blend their conduct with the general consideration of the state of that country. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the observations which I made with respect to the language once used by Lord Lyndhurst; but he entirely left out all mention of the purpose for which I made that observation, and by so doing he gave the observation itself a totally different meaning. The reason why I stated the words that had been used by Lord Lyndhurst, and also words which had been used by the noble Lord, the Secretary for the Colonies, and likewise by Mr. Bradshawe—though certainly the right hon. Gentleman said I must have left that gentleman out of the list—but the reason I alluded to their conduct and mentioned their language was this—that the indictment against the traversers in Ireland showed, in more than one of its counts, that it was a prosecution for exciting in the minds of the people of Ireland a feeling of hostility and ill-will against the people of England; and I could not but say, when I saw such a prosecution, who are these men that are thus prosecuting? Are these men entirely free from the same accusations? Is not much of that conduct which they blame in the Irish, and of the ill-will in the people of Ireland against the people of England, owing to the language used in past years in respect to the people of Ireland, by those who are now directing this very prosecution? The words which the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) had adopted were "the minions of Popery."

Lord Stanley: I beg the noble Lord's pardon; but those were not my words, and they never were applied by me to the Roman Catholics. I applied them to the noble Lord and to the Members of the Government who acted with him. My denial of having used the words with reference to the Roman Catholics was made at length, and may be proved by reference to former debates. If the noble Lord doubts what I state, I beg to refer him to the Debates, and he will see that the words were never applied by me, as he states, to the Roman Catholics, but to the Government.

Lord J. Russell: I was not aware that the noble Lord had explained the words last year. I said that they were the words of the hon. Member for Woodstock, and that they had been also used by the hon. Member for Sheffield. They were adopted by the noble Lord. [Lord Stanley: Never.] I quoted the words from the report, and they were that he would not admit into the offices of Government the minions of Popery. They were repeated by the hon. Member for Sheffield and not denied. As to Lord Lyndhurst I certainly said nothing in disparagement of his talents; both the right hon. Baronets seemed to think that I had spoken slightly of his abilities; but nobody can have a higher opinion of them than I have, or has listened with more pleasure to his speeches. What I said was, that it was owing to his hostility to Ireland and not to his judicial qualities that he was chosen to fill his high office, and I added, that he had shown carelessness in the performance of his duties as Lord Chancellor. Perhaps that was an ill-considered expression, but I still think that he was appointed to his high situation for his political conduct—for his political abilities—for the political part he had taken, and not for any care he bestows on his judgments in the Court of Equity. I am fully aware of the great talents he has shown in politics, but I am not aware of the great assiduity he has displayed in his Court, though of that I can only speak from report. Be it observed, that neither of the right hon. Gentlemen have contradicted me regarding the discharge of his official duties; and it was just the same with respect to the Chief Justice of Ireland. Everybody has spoken of him with more or less severity, and admitted that the charge was intemperate. Who has defended the Chief Justice? I thought that the Attorney General for Ireland, who pronounced a panegyric upon him was about to say that the charge was remarkable for all the judicial qualities—that it was sober, discreet, and impartial; but when he came to speak of the charge, he turned off from it with the observation that traversers and their counsel were seldom pleased with the charge of the Judge. The right hon. Baronet told us in his outset, that he was not going to speak with any of the acrimony I had displayed, but with great temper and forbearance. And then he went on to say, after some description of my conduct in office, that he would rather have cut off his right hand than retained office as I had done, after the retirement of Lord Plunket. That may be what he calls one of his mild and temperate expressions; but it seems to me much more like the acrimony which he attributes to me. All the circumstances connected with that transaction cannot be detailed now, but some of them I may be permitted to mention. It had been stated to Lord Melbourne that Lord Plunket, at his advanced age, was desirous of relinquishing his situation: the present Lord Campbell came to me, and asked, as a dissolution was depending, whether he were to stand his election as Attorney General. I communicated with Lord Melbourne, and he informed me that he believed Lord Plunket was about to retire; he added that he would write upon the subject, and that if he did retire, the Attorney General should be made Lord Chancellor. A day or two afterwards it was found that Lord Plunket instead of being desirous of retiring, had no such intention; and I told Lord Campbell, that such being the case, neither Lord Melbourne nor I would do anything disagreeable to Lord Plunket. Lord Campbell said that he was perfectly content, that he would send down his address to Edinburgh and stand his election as Attorney General. From circumstances which I need not detail, Lord Plunket subsequently retired. I can assure hon. Members that it gave me pain that he should have taken that course; and I regretted deeply that anything had occurred which was painful to Lord Plunket's feelings. It may be that the right hon. Baronet thinks that this was an insult to Lord Plunket. I can only say that there was no intention to insult him, or to do anything unkind towards a man of his eminence. I always said, that of all the men I have seen in Parliament, Lord Plunket was the most eloquent, and during the whole of my acquaintance, of many years standing, I have had occasion to admire his extraordinary abilities. I admit that the transaction was a painful one, and disagreeable in many of its circumstances; but I repeat that not the slightest offence was intended. The right hon. Baronet has opened to us some of the measures he means to propose for Ireland. I do not wish now to speak of all those measures, but I must make some remarks upon what he said of the conduct of himself and his friends when in Opposition. He was pleased to say that we had various difficulties, disturbances, and insurrections, especially in Canada, and that the support he and his friends gave us when they were out of office must have been most useful. I confess that they gave us very fair and handsome support in any measures for enforcing obedience to the law, but with respect to measures of conciliation, by which the mind of Ireland in particular was to be quieted and contented, by which the government of that country was to be made more easy, so far from receiving from the right hon. Baronet and his friends any assistance, they proclaimed their intention to obstruct our measures, which I must say was completely fulfilled. On the very subject of the Franchise—the hon. Member for Cork puts me in mind of the circumstance—a Motion was brought forward to put the Franchise in England and Ireland on the same footing. We thought there was a great deal of reason in many of the observations of the hon. Mover; yet, upon consideration, my noble Friend, Lord Morpeth, was not disposed then to disturb the Franchise. Even the modified declaration of Lord Morpeth, that he did not mean to say that the Franchise ought never to be extended, and that it could not be considered eternally and irrevocably fixed, brought down all kinds of invectives against us. We were charged with intending to disturb the Reform Bill—that we did not mean to adhere to the settled Franchise, but to alter it; and whenever we talked of the possible fitness of some alterations we were constantly met by the assertion that the Reform Bill must not be touched. Yet now the right hon. Baronet claims great credit—and I am glad to hear of his intention—for a project to place the Franchise on some footing equivalent to that of England. Therefore, I repeat, that although they lent their support to measures for the maintenance of the supremacy of the law, which certainly were just and necessary measures, yet they were continually obstructing those plans which we brought forward to reform, conciliate, and improve Ireland. The right hon. Baronet read to us certain parts of the Coercion Bill. I was a party to it. Does the right hon. Baronet blame that Measure? If he do, he can obtain the details of it much better from his noble Friend, then Secretary for Ireland (Lord Stanley) than from any other quarter. The noble Lord is more intimately acquainted with the provisions of that Bill which Lord Anglesey and he declared to be necessary for the protection of life and property in Ireland, than I could pretend to be. Let me say, however, that I thought the great reason for that Bill to be the outrages then committed in the rural districts, and it was more for the protection of life than for any other cause that I gave my consent to that Bill. I will not say it was not a full consent, though we all felt a reluctance in giving it. I am ready to bear the responsibility of that Bill, but I must bear it along with others, and the noble Lord who was then Secretary for Ireland, and the right hon. Baronet, the First Lord of the Admiralty of that time (Sir J. Graham) must not be exempt from all responsibility. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the Commission to inquire into the relations of Landlord and Tenant, but I am not sure that he quoted me correctly, for I do not recollect saying, that it would be better to bring in a Bill for a larger or a smaller object. The evils of the Commission for a change are obvious; the advantages may compensate them; but the right hon. Gentleman can hardly deny that there are expectations raised which may disturb the public mind in Ireland, on the subject of the occupation of land. Still, Sir, I cannot but recollect that when a late lamented Friend of mine, who devoted the latter part of his life to the service of Ireland, said that property had its duties as well as its rights, it brought down a lecture from the right hon. Gentleman of the danger of those abstract declarations which might injure the rights of the landlords. Although the appointment of a Commission may be a wise measure, I certainly heard with great suspicion the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, that one of his great objects would be to expose the landlords who had used their property wrongfully. Tenants might have grievances against their landlords, but that a Commission should sit to hear evidence given of these grievances appears to me a dangerous thing. I should, Sir, hope, as the hon. and learned Member for the County of Cork said, and I think said wisely, that the Commission will collect the evidence as quickly as possible; that having received that report, the Government will soon make up their minds whether anything is to be done, and if so, what is to be done, and how far it will go. I do not say that it was not wise to appoint a Commission, but to extend the inquiry over a year, and to postpone the decision, may, in my opinion, have an injurious effect. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman spoke also of the great question of the Church. I will not borrow his elaborate reasoning, but I will say, that I take a totally different view of that subject from the right hon. Gentleman. I never can separate two things. The first object of a Church Establishment must be to give religious instruction to the people. In the next place, it may be used to make the religious instructors of that people independent of them; and, thirdly, it may be for the purpose of making the people religious, moral, and contented. And, first, with respect to religious instruction, I may take an instance from a work I was reading this morning, where there is related a case of a Parish with one Protestant and one hundred Catholics. What religious instruction can the Church give in that Parish? Of what use can be a Protestant Minister there? How can I reconcile this with any description which any one person has ever given of the objects of a Church Establishment? Then, as to making the instructors of the people independent of popular passions, you do not effect that object. Are not the mass of the people the supporters of the voluntary system, and are not the instructors so supported, exposed to every bad influence resulting from it? Then, again, as to the contentment of the people. I believe that so long as the Church remains in its present condition, so long as you make it territorial, the contentment of the people never will exist. You make it territorial, as if the object of the Church were to preach to so many acres—as if you would attach a Minister to so much land, not signifying whether there be any souls or not. As there must exist a Protestant Establishment, I should like to see it confined to places where the people would gladly avail themselves of its offices, where they are attached to the Church, and where they would gladly learn the doctrines of the United Church of England and Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman has stated many objections against a Roman Catholic Establishment. I own, however, that I think those objections are comparatively light, when contrasted with the dangers and difficulties of your present position. What I stated, and what I thought best to do was, in the first place, to give every civil and political privilege to the Irish people which is possessed by the English people. Next, I said that I would give equality to the members of the two Churches, and then I said, instead of looking immediately to an endowment, I would render the Roman Catholics so satisfied with their situation, that we might propose an endowment without any feeling of humiliating dependence. That such a proposition so made would not be inconsistent with their feelings, may be gathered from the evidence of Dr. Doyle delivered in 1825. He was one of the best, one of the most learned instructors of the Roman Catholics, and was ready to consider some scheme for a provision. I would, then, make the Protestant Establishment commensurate with the wants of the Protestants, which it is not now, and then I would place the Roman Catholics in such a situation as to be ready to accept of honourable endowment. I think that all the questions about how much funds may be required, and where are we to get them, and whether the Roman Catholic Prelates shall sit in the House of Lords, is nothing compared with the difficulties to which we are exposed in our present anomalous position. The right hon. Gentleman said that I was careful in my mode of making this Motion, that I had not committed myself if I came into office, and the noble Lord said that he did not consider I proposed anything. Now, recollecting that I had proposed an extension of the Parliamentary and Municipal Franchise, an increase of the grant to Maynooth, a fit provision for the Church, and total equality of the two religions, I do not think that in the whole ten years during which the right hon. Gentleman was out of office, there was not any one speech or any one year in which he proposed half as much. Now the noble Lord, the Secretary for the Colonies, has addressed me and told me to weigh well the responsibility I incurred in making this Motion. Sir, I did carefully weigh—I did weigh well that responsibility—and I own it occurs to me that I incurred much less responsibility in making this Motion, than if I discounted bringing the grievances of the Irish people before this House. I believe that if the Government had been left to its own course of troops and arms—to its own measures, which upon the whole are trifling measures of reform—if no notice had been taken of these grievances, or of what had been going on, the Repeal party would have been greatly strengthened in Ireland. It would have been said—“See how indifferent you are to what takes place in our country. You are eager to pass Horse-racing Penalties Bills, and similar important measures, but how have you dealt with a great measure? To the mode in which we are governed in Ireland you are perfectly indifferent.” Now, in the whole course of this Debate it has appeared to me, both on the one side and the other, that there has been a tendency to induce the people of Ireland to believe that their grievances will be considered in an English House of Commons. I believe that many things which they ask are founded in reason and justice, and if they see such propositions brought forward here, and supported by the talents by which this Motion has been supported by Members on this side of the House—if they see that this House of Commons will apply itself to their grievances, they will come to the Parliament of Great Britain as the place to which they shall petition for the redress of those grievances. I say, then, with respect to the “responsibility” of this Motion

I feel perfectly satisfied, because I believe that having been brought forward it will unite the Irish people to the English nation. I should have been glad, Sir, that if all recriminations as to Protestants and Catholics had been at an end, and I was exceedingly sorry to hear in the course of this Debate, the noble Lord propose to read the terms of the Catholic Oath. Who could mistake the purport with which the noble Lord read that Oath? If the noble Lord was in a Court of Justice giving his evidence, as he would be sure to do most frankly and honestly, what would he think of a vexatious lawyer who might say to him, "mind you are on your oath, you have sworn to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; look at the terms of the oath, and answer me that question." What would the noble Lord think, but that the lawyer was insinuating that in what he had spoken he was not telling the truth? Must not the impression then be the same to all professing the Roman Catholic religion, who hear such emphasis laid on the terms of the Oath read by the noble Lord? Might it not be likewise a word of great encouragement to those in this country, less informed than the noble Lord, more prejudiced and bigoted, who are apt to bandy about the insinuation that Catholics ought not to be admitted into Parliament because they do not regard an oath. I am not making these observations from a mere spirit of hostility. I have the greatest respect for the talents of the noble Lord. I may, perhaps, be permitted to mention, that the first time Lord Melbourne told me it was his desire and that of his Colleagues, that I should take the chief part in the business of the House of Commons, I told him that I felt myself very unequal to the task, but I was ready to undertake it if it was the wish of my Colleagues, but I did hope, if that which I trusted was only a temporary rupture with the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) should ever be healed, and he should join the party with which he from early life had been connected, he would permit me to place myself under his lead. I therefore had not then, and I have not now, any motive in mentioning those things to injure the noble Lord in public opinion; but he must consider, that with his situation, influence, and talents, it is of the utmost importance to what sentiments he gives utterance with respect to the relations of Protestant and Roman Catholic; that it is desirable that he should, with the Government to which he belongs, and no doubt they will to-night have a great majority, desirable, I say, that he and his Colleagues should give a frank and full and fair confidence to the Roman Catholics, and that he should endeavour, if possible, to heal those melancholy divisions by which the country has been so long distracted.

The House divided on the question, that the House do resolve itself into a Committee to take into consideration the state of Ireland.—Ayes 225; Noes 324:—Majority 99.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

MINUTES.] BILLS. Private.—1<sup>a</sup>. Bow Brickill Estate.
 PETITIONS PRESENTED. From the Chancellor, etc. of University of Cambridge, against Union of Sees of St Asaph and Bangor.

CATHOLIC PRIEST—EXPLANATION.]

The Marquess of Normanby said, that in the course of the observations made on a former evening by a noble Marquess opposite, that noble Marquess had stated, that a poor priest in Ireland had been suspended from his duties for a month by his Bishop, because he refused to collect the Repeal tribute. Now, he (the Marquess of Normanby) had received a distinct contradiction of that statement. No doubt, the noble Marquess, when he mentioned the case, believed that his information was correct. But he had received a letter from the right rev. Dr. Cantwell, the Bishop of the diocese in which the circumstance was alleged to have happened, who positively denied that any such thing had occurred.

The Marquess of Westmeath said, all he knew about the matter was, that the circumstances to which he had referred were quite notorious throughout the country. After what the noble Marquess had stated, he should, however, say nothing more on the subject until he had made further inquiries. Perhaps the error was one of time, and not of fact.

POLES IN PRUSSIA.] Lord Brougham wished to put a question to his noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, on a question of considerable interest. Some time ago a number of refugees from Russian Poland had sought shelter in the dominions of the King of Prussia. They were allowed to take up their residence in Posen, which, as their Lordships all knew, formed a part of Ancient Poland, but by the partition of 1773, was annexed to Prussia. Recently some ill-feeling was excited against those persons, and the Prussian government had thought fit to issue a proclamation commanding their immediate departure from that place. No sufficient reasons were adduced for such a proceeding, and it was exceedingly unlike the government of the illustrious prince who ruled that kingdom to take such a step, unless some great necessity seemed to demand it. It was most improbable, that such a proceeding would be lightly adopted; and one would be led to suppose, that it must arise from circumstances that had not yet come to the knowledge of the public. It was to be hoped, that extreme measures had not been adopted against the whole of these persons on account of the misconduct of some individuals. He should feel obliged to his noble Friend for any information that he could afford on the subject.

The Earl of Aberdeen was obliged to his noble and learned Friend for the intimation which he had given of his intention to put a question to him on this subject. He was not, however, in a condition to afford the information which his noble and learned Friend required. He was aware, that the Prussian Government had taken steps for the removal of the Polish refugees; but he knew not the peculiar circumstances which led to that determination. He however, agreed with his noble and learned Friend in thinking, that it was not likely—that it was very improbable, that the Prussian government would do anything harsh or unfeeling, unless they had reasons which they could allege in justification.

MR. R. O'GORMAN.] Lord Campbell wished to call their Lordships' attention to the case of an individual who felt himself aggrieved by something which had occurred a few evenings ago in their Lordships' House. The gentleman to whom he alluded was Mr. Richard O'Gorman, who was one of the Grand Jurors before whom the indictment with reference to the late State Trials in Dublin was placed. In the course of his speech on the Motion of his noble Friend (the Marquess of Normanby), Lord Roden stated, as reported in The Times newspaper, that the question was considered in Ireland as a question on the decision of which depended whether the Protestant or the Roman Catholic Church should preponderate.

"Such (said the noble Earl) being the prevalent opinion, it was quite natural, without at all impeaching the oaths of Roman Catholics, or imputing it to them, that as Jurors, they would not return an honest verdict—it was natural to suppose, that such an impression must necessarily produce some bias in their minds. In this point of view it was impossible to suppose, that the Roman Catholics of Ireland could act upon a Jury without being more or less biassed in their opinions. As a case in point he would instance what had taken place in the Grand Jury upon the finding of the bills. There were three Roman Catholics upon that Jury, and one of them came into the Jury-box after the bills were found, and though he had been sworn to keep his own counsel as well as that of his fellow-Jurors, declared, that he for his part, dissented from the finding."

Here, according to the report, there were cries of "Hear, hear." The Earl of Roden stated, with that openness and candour which belonged to him, that this conduct on the part of Mr. O'Gorman was calculated to inflict a great blow against reposing confidence in the Roman Catholics, as connected with this Trial. Now, the fact was, that when this finding was returned, it was signed by the foreman, "A true bill, for self and fellows;" and, thus signed, it conveyed the notion that all the Grand Jury had concurred in the finding. Mr. O'Gorman was then in Court, and he wished it to be understood that he dissented from the finding, and he stated the fact. Now, the noble Earl (Earl Roden) seemed to think, that in acting thus, Mr. O'Gorman had been guilty of a violation of his oath, because he had been sworn to keep his own counsel as well as that of his fellow-jurors. Now, the noble Earl seemed to have mistaken the nature of the oath which the Grand Juror took, which was, that the evidence given before the Grand Jury should not be disclosed, so as to interfere with the interests of justice, or with the verdict that might ultimately be returned. The examination of Grand Jurors was not, however, without precedent. In the 7th volume of the State Trials a case was reported, where the whole of the Grand Jurors were openly examined at the Old Bailey as to the grounds on which they had decided. And there was another case in which Lord Kenyon allowed a Grand Juror to be examined. So that it appeared that Mr. O'Gorman had not acted in any way that was censurable.

The Lord Chancellor: By whom were the Grand Jurors examined?

Lord Campbell: By the Judges.

The Lord Chancellor: That was by no means unusual: but it was a very different thing when a Grand Juror came into Court and declared, without being required, what course he took.

Lord Brougham said, it was a very great mistake, if it were supposed that his noble Friend, who was not present, having been obliged to leave this country in consequence of distressing illness in his family, had harboured the slightest intention of throwing out any accusation against Mr. O'Gorman, or had meant for a moment to insinuate, that that gentleman had violated the sanctity of his oath. His noble Friend was, at the time, arguing with respect to the propriety of striking Roman Catholics from the Petty Jury; and he observed, that so much was this considered to be a party question between Catholic and Protestant, that a most respectable gentleman, Mr. O'Gorman, was so alarmed that it should be supposed abroad that he had coincided in the finding of his fellow-jurors, that he took the very first opportunity of declaring his dissent in Court. But his noble Friend had never insinuated, that in thus acting, Mr. O'Gorman acted contrary to his oath. Now, he should say nothing with respect to the nature of the oath; but this he would say, that he thought a Jurymen, whether a Grand Juror or a Petty Juror, was bound in honour to his fellows not to disclose what passed in the Jury-room, unless required under the pressure of extraordinary circumstances, such as the requisition of the Judge, to declare the counsel of himself or his fellows. Grand Jurors and Petty Jurors were bound in honour to their fellows, independent of any oath, not to disclose what had passed in the sanctuary of the Jury-room. If a Judge questions them, this, of course, absolves them from the obligation. As to Mr. O'Gorman, he was known to be a most respectable man, a most loyal man. He was brother to Mr. Percell O'Gorman, than whom a more honourable man did not exist. They were both ardent in the cause of Catholic Emancipation. But, when that great Measure was carried in 1829, they deemed it proper, as a matter of principle, to abstain from all further agitation.

Lord Campbell said, that he had not asserted, that the noble Earl (Earl Roden) had intended to charge Mr. O'Gorman with the violation of his oath.

The Marquess of Westmeath rose to bear testimony to the high respectability of one of the Messrs. O'Gorman, who had for some time filled the office of assistant barrister in the county in which he (the Marquess of Westmeath) lived—no gentleman could have acquitted himself more honourably or more efficiently in that situation than had Mr. O'Gorman. He would merely add, that he had himself frequently sat upon Grand Juries, but he had never before heard of one of the Jurors going into Court afterwards and stating the part which either he or his fellows had taken in the matter. He thought it exceedingly improper that anything should go forth to the public which would tend in the least to encourage an idea of the propriety of such a course upon the part of a Grand Juror.

Lord Wharncliffe was quite sure, that for a Juror to declare in open Court, the course he had taken upon a bill brought before them, was quite at variance with the practice in this country.

Lord Campbell was far from saying, that it was proper for Jurors to do so; but this was a case in which, in consequence of the foreman signing the bill, "A true bill, for self and fellows," implying that the Jury were unanimous in finding it, a gentleman thought it necessary to declare his dissent from a judgment in which he would otherwise have been deemed concurrent.

Lord Monteagle said, that in Ireland, it was the invariable form for the foreman to sign bills, "Eor self and fellows."

Subject dropped.

House adjourned.

REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES—SUPPLY —[THE INCOME TAX.] On the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of Supply

Mr. S. Crawford rose, agreeably to the notice which he had given, to move the postponement of the consideration of the Committee of Supply, and he should endeavour as clearly as possible to state to the House the reasons which induced him to bring forward the subject, and the objects which impelled him to make that Motion. He had recently witnessed a nine days' fight in the House of Commons, a fight in which he took no part, and from which he feared no practical result would be found to follow. They had been engaged in firing blank cartridges, without producing any effect upon the condition of the great body of the people; it was a conflict of parties, in which the great and important interests of the people were little concerned. It was a long continued war of words, and the result was, that the victory went to those who had the greatest number at their side. Now he was of opinion that the result ought not solely to depend on such a cause, and that attention ought to be paid to the just demands of the people for their rights, although the numbers of those opposed to them might be greater than those who were favourable to those rights. It appeared to him that when an intruding army came into a country, the duty of a skilful general opposed to such an army was to cut off the supplies, and he proposed, therefore, in a civil movement, to adopt the course of the skilful general, and cut off the supplies of the intruding party in order to bring them to just and reasonable terms. It was on that principle and with that view that he brought forward his Motion, in order to bring the party which was opposed to him to terms, and to rally some of the friends of the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) in order to fight the real battle for the rights of the people. The noble Lord had not the country with him, for he did not found his proceedings upon principles which were calculated to bring the people round him in such a way as would enable him to overcome his enemies. He would first refer to a resolution on this subject, which he moved on a former occasion, as he believed that he had been by some hon. Members to a certain degree misunderstood. The hon. Member for Montrose appeared to think that he denied the competency of the House to vote the Supplies. Now, what he said was, that if the charges which had been made against the House were true, it would not be competent, and that the House ought to investigate those charges and redress the grievances of the people before the Supplies were voted. He had previously referred to petitions which had been presented containing those charges. One of those petitions was from the Chartists, and it contained charges which, as the House had received the petitions, ought, in his opinion, to have been investigated. Another was presented from Birmingham, signed by the Mayor. It stated that the House of Commons did not represent the people, that it had not the confidence of the people, that a large portion of its Members had obtained their seats by bribery and corruption, and that Parliamentary proceedings were influenced by selfish and party motives rather than by a regard for the interests of the people, and that there was in the House of Commons gross ignorance of the condition of the people and carelessness of their welfare. The House received that petition, and, having received it, he would ask was it not necessary to inquire into the allegations which it contained? If the charges were not true, why did the House receive it, and as the House had received it, was it not incumbent on the House to cause an investigation into the truth? The House ought not to vote the Supplies until they had inquired into those charges. The House of Commons, represented certain classes—it represented the Landed Aristocracy—it represented a part of the middle classes, and it represented the monied classes, but the large mass of the working classes were unrepresented. He put it to the House, then, to say if they were the virtual representatives of the people, and if they were not, how could they take upon themselves to vote the Supplies? He called on the House to institute an inquiry as to what extension of the Franchise would make it a true representation of the people, before the Supplies were voted. There was another consideration with reference to the Estimates, to which he begged to direct the attention of the House. In the Motion which he gave notice of, he stated his intention to move that the consideration of the Estimates be postponed till after Easter, for he was of opinion that all the Estimates for the year ought to be brought before the House before any part of them was considered. Taxation had increased greatly of late years, and they ought to inquire into the cause of that increase, and into the means of diminishing it. In 1836, the Expenditure of the country was 44,200,000*l.* it had now increased to 49,550,000*l.*, and before they voted the Supplies they ought to consider whether the Expenditure of the country could be reduced. He thought that his Motion ought to be supported by every Member who was an advocate for economy, and he hoped to have the support of the hon. Member for Montrose, who had so long endeavoured to reduce the public Expenditure. The Members who advocated the repeal of the Corn Laws ought to support him, and the Irish Members ought also to support him. The Irish people demanded the same Corporate Reform as had been granted to England. On that point there had been a promise of some amelioration, but there was no security that it would go to the extent that was justly demanded. The second point was, that a proportionate number of Representatives be given to the people of Ireland. Was there the smallest hope that this demand, however just and legitimate, would be conceded. Next, an equalization of religious freedom with the people of England and Scotland was required, and that with that view the people of Ireland should be disembarassed of the burthen of the Established Church, and its revenues applied to education and other temporal purposes. Had any Irish Member reason to expect that they would effectually obtain any one of these objects? He maintained that the Irish Members ought not to go home satisfied, without having used every exertion to extort the concession of these demands from the Government. He called upon the Irish Members not only to support this Motion, but to exert their energies in every possible way to prevent the present Government, or any Government, from refusing those demands which were just and reasonable. He had heard certain constructions put upon law proceedings in the case of public meetings, and those constructions very ingeniously argued by lawyers on both sides; but the construction of lawyers was of little consequence to Governments, if they had the power to stretch the law to their own purposes. The real construction which they would require was that of the Commander of the troops. He was the man that would interpret the law for them more usefully than any other. If a Government could stretch the law to oppress the people, they would effect that purpose; but the real question was, had they the power to execute that object? The Commander-in-Chief was the adviser to answer that question for them. Nothing could more clearly or plainly show this than a reference to Irish history for fifty years back. The Lord Lieutenant became seriously alarmed at the intention to assemble meetings in military terms, to collect in military array, and at which the people were to go in a sort of procession, resembling the march of troops; but at former periods the Government was not so easily alarmed. He remembered the time when the people of Ireland assembled actually in military array, and any Gentleman who remembered the Irish Volunteers must be aware that they asserted the right to carry arms, and to assemble in arms, and demand the redress of grievances, and that they actually so assembled and demanded the redress of grievances with arms in their hands. Had any Government asserted that they were conspirators? No;—and why? Because it had not the power. The Government was obliged to submit to the demand of redress made by men who had arms in their hands. Such was the case of the volunteers. It was an altered case now, when Arms Bills were passed to prevent the people of Ireland from having arms, even for their own defence. The Volunteers, asserted the right to bear arms, and to call for the redress of grievances as an armed body. It was curious to remark some of the proceedings of that day. In the Journals of the period was to be found an Address to the Lord Lieutenant in 1782, which recorded the Acts of the Legislature and showed what had been accomplished. The hon. Member read an Address, which claimed an enforcement of the due administration of the laws, and asserted the right of legislation to be in the Irish Parliament independent of England. Those were the proceedings of the Volunteers, and at that time the Government were as anxious to uphold English laws, as the Government opposite now was to maintain the Union. This armed body subsisted for twelve or thirteen years, and was never declared illegal or a conspiracy; but on four different occasions received the thanks of Parliament for their services in the defence of the country against foreign invaders, and internally enforcing the laws in aid of the civil power. What was the consequence of the conciliatory course then adopted? In the following year, the year 1783, 5,000 troops were withdrawn from Ireland, the ordinary force being 12,000, and those who remained were recruits and undisciplined soldiers. The people were left to their own protection. How different was the state of things now! The right hon. Baronet in his speech commented on the nature of the Irish Parliament, and he admitted that it had become as corrupt a Parliament as could well be, but it had nevertheless, during its existence conferred incalculable benefits upon the Irish people, for it was possible that sometimes the most corrupt bodies could be influenced by popular fervour and do good towards the people. In consequence of the corruptions of the Parliament, and the divisions amongst the people, the Irish nation lost all power, and down to this day the evil had remained in full force. Since the unfortunate rebellion of 1798, a state of suffering and violence had pervaded that country from one cause or another, but chiefly from the domination of a small party to the exclusion of the great majority. He was surprised that no allusion had been made in the late Debate to that enormous insult to Ireland, the Arms Act, from which he thought a great mass of evil would arise, but he supposed the reason for this silence was, that the working out of that Act was found quite impracticable. With respect to the Landlord and Tenant Commission, all he should say was that many persons looked at it with great dislike, because it was supposed that there was a desire in the Commissioners to screen the Landlords. He hoped the Commission would do its duty, if it did it would effect great good, and he was not one of those who would join in condemning it without a trial. The Government, in defending themselves for the use of military power, said that they were not the cause of the agitation which had been raised in Ireland. He must deny the correctness of that apology. There would be no agitation which would be at all dangerous to the Government, if it were not their obstinate refusal to redress the grievances of Ireland. It was this which caused agitation, and what he maintained was, that the Government ought not to be permitted to keep up an army which would enable it to refuse redress. It is the duty of Members to take every means that the forms of the House sanctioned, to prevent the keeping up an enormous army for such a purpose. All these matters ought to be considered, and, if possible, remedied, before the House voted those Estimates for the Army, which would enable the Government to withhold the redress which was called for. There had been a considerable manifestation of public feeling in favour of the course which he had felt it his duty to take on that occasion. On referring to the votes of the House, he found that Petitions had been presented from thirty-four different places, calling upon the House to refuse supplies until the grievances of the people should have been redressed. The Petition which he had presented that day from the City of Edinburgh well deserved the attention of the House; that Petition was signed by 17,000 persons. In order to show that he was justified by the feelings of his constituents in taking this course, he need only refer to the memorial which had been sent to him from the Borough of Rochdale, requiring him to refuse supplies until the grievances of the people had been redressed. In the opinion of the memorialist, that was a Constitutional, just, and necessary course. The Petition was signed by 5,500 inhabitants of Rochdale, and by 400 Electors—a larger number than had voted for him at the time of his return for that Borough. He admitted that opposition to the Government in the voting of Supplies ought not to be undertaken on light grounds; but in his judgment, the grounds were now amply sufficient. The liberties of the people were in danger. If such proceedings as had taken place in Ireland were permitted to continue, the power of the people to express their opinions would be suppressed. There was a disposition exhibited to restrain the liberty of speech; and on this account, among others, it was necessary to pursue this course. The country was in a most alarming condition, and it was indispensably necessary that those Members who represented the people in that House should take such means as were in their power to secure redress. Those who deprecated the use of physical force, were bound to use every means in their power to make moral power efficacious in procuring redress, lest men should resort to other means. He might possibly be asked, what would be the effect of this remedy if it were capable of being carried out? He admitted that the result would necessarily be, either that the Minister must redress grievances or resign. He did not desire to see the right hon. Baronet in that position, if he would only hold out the smallest hope of redress. He did not hope that he alone could make any impression on the House in reference to this question; all he could do was, to ask the right hon. Baronet to take the grievances of the country into his serious consideration. He wished to prevent any supply being voted until some indications should be given of an intention, on the part of the Government, to redress the grievances of the people. Whether such a course should be adopted or not, depended upon the other representatives of the people. He had done his duty by proposing the course which he had proposed. The House would adopt whatever course it might think proper. He had abstained from making any mere ad captandum proposition for the mere purpose of catching a few stray voters. He thought that a grand stand ought to be made by the representatives of the country, particularly when the Army Estimate should be proposed. The hon. Member concluded by moving as an amendment, that the consideration of the Estimates for the several branches of the public service be postponed till after the Easter recess.

Colonel Rawdon said, it was not without reluctance that he rose to second the Motion. He had always hitherto opposed Motions of this kind, but he must say that the Measures promised with respect to Ireland were not of so comprehensive a nature as he had wished for. There was, in Parliamentary language a form "in another place," which the Members of that House did not in effect possess, but he wished to be understood as entering his "Protest" against the course adopted by the Government. The social and Political condition of Ireland was such that every man who wished for the good of that country must be anxious for inquiry, and the Government ought to have consented to such an inquiry. Nations, like individuals, were not the best judges of their own affairs, and, therefore, he would quote as an authority, with respect to the condition of the Irish people, a writer who had been cited in the former Debate, and against whose impartiality there could be no imputation, as he was a foreigner. Mr. Kohl, in quoting from M. Beaumont, said—

"A French author, Beaumont, who had seen the Irish peasant in his cabin and the North American Indian in his wigwam, has assured us that the savage is better provided for than the poor man in Ireland. Indeed, the question may be raised, whether in the whole world, a nation is to be found, that is subjected to such physical privations as the peasantry in some parts of Ireland. This fact cannot be placed in too strong a light, for, if it can once be shown the wretchedness of the Irish population is without a parallel example on the Globe, surely every friend of humanity will feel himself called on to reflect whether means may not be found for remedying an evil of so astounding a magnitude."

He went on to say, speaking of Prussia—

"We have beggars and paupers among us, but they form at least an exception; whereas, in Ireland, beggary or abject poverty, is the prevailing rule. The nation is one of beggars, and they who are above beggary, seem to form the exception. Every other day they feed upon potatoes, and nothing but potatoes. Now, this is inhuman, for the appetite and stomach of man claim variety in food, and nowhere else do we find human beings gnawing, from year's end to year's end, at the same root, berry, or weed. There are animals who do so, but human beings nowhere except in Ireland."

He asked whether any man of feeling could read this description of the Irish people without feeling that it was one which imperatively demanded redress? The author proceeded to say—

"There are nations of slaves, but they have, by long custom been made unconscious of the yoke of slavery. This is not the case with the Irish, who have a strong feeling within them, and are fully sensible of the weight of the yoke they have to bear. They are intelligent enough to know the injustice done them by the distorted laws of their country."

Here an impartial Foreigner said, that injustice was done to the Irish people by the distorted laws of their country. He knew it must weary the House to speak on the subject of Ireland after the long Debate that had taken place on that subject, but the House must recollect that more English Members had spoken than Irish, and he hoped, therefore, the House would allow him to say a few words. They had not had an intelligible answer yet from the right hon. Gentleman as to what course he intended to pursue with respect to Ireland. He had held out no hopes of redress for the wrongs of the people of Ireland. For the present the door might be considered shut against the Irish people. The Irish Members must go back and tell their constituents, that there were no hopes for the people of Ireland from that House. He had heard the other evening, with some indignation, an hon. and gallant Member express a wish that agitation should be put down in that House. He (Col. Rawdon) said, that that House was the place for agitation—the constitutional and the proper place. He still clung to the Act of Union, but when he heard such expressions as those he had alluded to, his feelings, he must say, began to waver. If there could be found one way more successful than another to increase agitation, it would be in attempting to suppress the discussion of Irish grievances in that House. He sincerely believed the time was come at which Irishmen should make themselves more heard in that House. They must be more heard, for the Government were not determined on what was necessary and right. He could assure the right hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel) that, however conciliatory his expressions were, he could see nothing tangible in his intentions. The right hon. Baronet might stave off substantial Measures for a time, but it would be only for a time. Until he consented to a great alteration in the Church, and to a Franchise equal to that of England, there could be no hope of permanent peace in Ireland. For these reasons he seconded the Motion.

Sir H. Douglas, in reply to the gallant officer who had just spoken, assured him that what he had said the other night had been spoken in no heat, and certainly with no bad feeling towards Ireland. What he had said was, that he considered the Motion then before the House as one brought forward for a party purpose, and not for the good of Ireland, but as a consequence of the agitation going on out of doors; and that when it should have been as triumphantly put down by rejecting the noble Lord's Motion, as the agitation out of doors, had so far been effectually suppressed, he (Sir H. Douglas) should be happy to contribute his efforts to redress or remove any grievances of which Ireland might have cause to complain, so far as this might be consistent with the integrity of the Constitution, in Church and State.

Mr. W. Williams had listened with attention to his hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale, and he was at a loss to discover any particular ground for the course which he proposed to take on this occasion. If his hon. Friend had added to his Motion that very important proposition which he had advanced in his speech, that the whole of the Estimates ought to be before the House previously to any of them being voted, and that the whole should be referred to a Select Committee, he should feel bound to vote with him, and should consider it the duty of every liberal man in that House to give such a proposition his support; but as the Motion merely proposed the postponement of the consideration of the Estimates till after the Easter recess, without, so far as he could understand, any distinct or peculiar ground for that course being shown, he did not feel that the proposition was one which held out any great advantage. He himself, as his hon. Friend knew, was not in a hurry to vote away these enormous sums of the public money. If any effectual good could be done by postponing from to-night the vote of the vast amount of money that was called for—twelve millions, in two Estimates—he should oppose such a proposition. But he rose principally to urge the necessity of the House having before it the Estimates for the Army, Ordnance, and Miscellaneous Services, before it was called upon to enter on the consideration of the Navy Estimates; and he must further say, that he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought also to bring forward his Financial Budget before he called for a Vote of any Supplies: that he ought to state the sources from which he proposed to derive the revenue now required. Last year it was true, the right hon. Gentleman had been able to make both ends meet, with an addition of two and a-half millions, and five and a-half millions—altogether eight millions beyond what the people were burthened with a few years ago. The right hon. Gentleman shook his head, but it was a fact, that 5 per cent. had been added to the general taxation, and 10 per cent. to what were called the Assessed Taxes; and a little calculation would show this produced the result he had stated; and the Income Tax was five millions and a-half, or close upon it. The country was actually never acquainted with the exact amount of its taxation, nor how much of it was intercepted on its way to the Treasury, which amounted to four millions and a-half, deducted for cost of collection. There were, for instance, the Commissioners of Customs, who had been reported to the Crown to be totally unfit for their situations, and yet who intercepted taxation on its way to the Treasury to the amount of 1,200,000*l*. The right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had stated last year that there had been a balance of receipts over expenditure of 1,400,000*l*., but this was not clearly proved by the financial account lately presented: for on the other side of the account it appeared, that 1,300,000*l*. had been received from the sale of the Chinese dollars, 1,200,000*l*. had been paid for the China opium which had been seized, and another part of the account showed that 1,600,000*l*. had been borrowed to pay for the opium. If there was a Select Committee properly constituted, not composed of Members of the existing Government nor of the late Government, but of independent Members of Parliament, attached to no party, he had no doubt it would prove from the practice and experience of former years, that a large amount might be saved to the country. He would ask, what reason could there be for this enormous expenditure of the public money, required by these estimates, when at the opening of the Session Her Majesty had informed the House, that she had the strongest assurances of the most amicable disposition on the part of all Foreign Powers and of uninterrupted peace? What were the actual facts of the case? In 1835 the amount of the Navy Estimates was less by 2,000,000*l.* than this year. In 1835, the Navy Estimates were 4,254,000*l.*, and in the present year they were 6,285,000*l.* Could, he asked, the reason be stated for that vast increase? The marines on shore in 1837, 1838, and 1839, were 3,500 men, in 1841-2 the number was 4,000 men, and now they were 6,500 men. In his opinion, this was a surreptitious mode of keeping up a standing army. What else, he would ask, could be their reason for increasing this force, but in fact to add to the army of 129,677 men, a larger army than ever was known in this country since the occupation of France. He should like to hear this explained, the more so when they considered, that independently of this large army, no less than 10,000 pensioners had been embodied by a vote of that House last year. Did they support this large military establishment because they proposed to govern the country by military force? for if they did not, in the present state of the foreign relations of this country, there could be no pretence for it. The right hon. Baronet had told them the other night, that they intended to govern Ireland upon Tory principles; that was to perpetuate the oppression of the people; and as long as they persevered in that, they could not reduce this Estimate. In the amount of the Estimates, they had good proof that the Government was resolved upon persevering in the policy that had been announced by them. He called upon the Secretary of the Admiralty to say why it was that he required now 34,000 men for the Navy, when in 1822 only 21,000 were wanted, and in 1834-35 they had but 27,000. What he asked, were the circumstances that required a greater number of men than at the former period? Another important point was, the vast amount of the Navy Pension List. In 1818, immediately after the close of the war, the whole amount of the half-pay and pensions of the Navy was 1,230,000*l.*, and what did the House suppose it to be now? 1,400,000*l.* This was twenty-eight years after the peace. The accounts of the Army were clear in every item; whilst in the Navy Estimates nothing was clear, and some items were actually unintelligible. In 1818 just after the peace, the pensions of the widows and children of officers in the navy were 118,800*l.* He begged the particular attention of the Secretary of the Admiralty to this subject: because, if that hon. Gentleman would not give an explanation, he was determined to divide the House on every particular item in the Estimates. In 1822, those pensions were 112,000*l.*: and this year they were 210,000*l.* Why had the increase taken place? Let them, then, compare this with the amount of the pensions given to the men who fought their battles. It was 207,000*l.* That was 3,000*l.* less than the pensions of these widows of Officers. Could it, he asked, be any wonder, that the men felt themselves ill-used? That they should, in consequence, have joined the Americans in the last War, fought against the British flag, and in some instances successfully. He had next to call their attention to the pensions in the Civil Department of the Navy—that is, clerks in Somerset House. In 1818, the amount of these was 99,600*l.* This year it was 163,000*l.* That was very near double its amount at the close of the last war. Another point to which he had to call the attention of the hon. Gentleman was the vast expenditure on their Dock-yards. The amount proposed this year was 290,000*l.*, and during the last five years it had been 1,123,000*l.* These sums were for Dockyards alone; and yet not a single Dockyard, with the exception of that of Pembroke, had been enlarged since the last War. Why had there been that increase in the last five years, when, during the preceding five years, the whole expenditure was 430,000*l.*? That was during the time of the late Government. It appeared to him that these vast soms of money were expended without necessity. He was sure that the hon. Gentleman could not show the necessity for it; 210,000*l.* for the widows of Navy Officers was principally paid by taxes on the poor out of their nine shillings a-week, whilst in their misery there was nothing left for them but the sorrows of the work-house. He called upon the House to compare the manner in which the accounts were presented to them from the War Office and the Admiralty upon this very subject—the pensions to the widows and children of Officers. In the one, they were clear and distinct. He gave no opinion upon them, but in the other case a much larger amount was required, and yet no explanation whatever was given. He thought he had now stated sufficient reasons to show why the Estimates should be referred to a Select Committee, where they might examine all the items, and go into all the details. He was perfectly convinced of this, that if they had for that purpose a Committee such as that of 1828, the result would be a great saving of expenditure.

Mr. Fielden said, before voting Supplies, it had become necessary to inquire how the sums to be voted had been raised, who were taxed and made to pay them, the manner in which taxes were levied, and whether or not a mode of levy, legal, fair, and impartial, was carried on, or one of great oppression and injustice? and it was particularly necessary to ascertain whether or not wrong had been committed by official persons in carrying into effect the avowedly arbitrary enactment called the Property and Income Tax Act? He believed that a considerable part of the money raised under that Act was forced out of the pockets of tradesmen and others by the most arbitrary process of assessment this country had ever known. The injustice towards the poor done by indirect taxation on the articles of necessity they purchased, and on which the duties were so much higher per cent. than on the articles consumed by the rich, had been so ably exposed by the hon. Member for Coventry, that he would not say more upon it than that the case had shown so great an injustice to the poor as to warrant the withholding of Supplies, unless an assurance were given by Ministers that these glaring irregularities should be corrected. The Stamp Taxes, and many others, were also unfairly imposed and enforced, and equally required revision; but on that occasion he proposed to make known to the House the iniquitous and oppressive mode in which the Income Tax was assessed and exacted. He had heard of many cases in which persons had been assessed by the district Commissioners, and made to pay on profits derived from trade and manufactures, when so far from profit having accrued for the three years previous to the year of assessment, considerable loss had been sustained. These assessments had been acted on, the goods of the parties seized and sold, although they had tendered proof on oath to the fact that no profit existed. He concurred in an observation of the hon. and gallant Colonel, the Member for Lincoln, that this country was governed, not by Law, but by Commissioners, who swarmed over the land, whose powers were almost unlimited, and against whom there was no appeal. He was reluctant to speak on his own affairs, but he felt that he was performing a public duty in illustrating a great public grievance by reference to his own case. He was speaking now, not of the Property Tax, but of the Income Tax, and he would detail to the House what had happened, he believed, to many manufactures of his own class, by showing what had happened to himself. In his business as a manufacturer, he was, of course, subject to a tax on his property; but with respect to income from that business, he was subject or not, according as the business returned profit or not. He and his partners had received a letter, which he would read:—

*"Stamps and Taxes, Somerset-house, February 14, 1844. Gentlemen—Her Majesty's Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes having directed immediate process to be issued for your arrear of Income Tax due the 20th of March last, amounting to 350*l., and returned into the Exchequer, I beg to inform you that, in order to save the expenses of a levy by the Sheriff, the amount must be paid to Mr. Peter Ormerod, of Todmorden, the collector, before the 24th instant. I am, gentlemen, your most obedient servant, J. Timm, solicitor for Stamps and Taxes."

To Messrs. Fielden."

Now, he would wish the House to mark that that letter informed him and his partners that the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes had directed process to issue for arrears of Income-Tax, due the 20th of March last, that was more than eleven months ago. Why had not that demand been enforced before? He had asked for no credit. If the debt was due from him and his partners, they ought to have been made to pay it long ago. He denied the debt. He feared that many, who could less afford to lose the money, had been assessed with equal injustice, but made to pay because too weak to offer resistance. He would now go into details, for it was right that the House and the country should know the vexatious and unjust manner the taxes were wrung from those who paid them. If he and his brothers had been the only parties unjustly treated under the Income Tax, the House would not have heard a word from him of their case; but when he knew that great numbers complained of the same grievance, and having been again and again applied to to take up the question, and expose the injustice and arbitrary proceedings of the officials and Commissioners, he should incur the charge of negligence if he did not do so. As the case of himself and his partners would probably be the case of thousands, which was, of course, familiar to himself, he would state it. In the autumn of 1842 he received a printed form, requiring him to make a true return of the profits of his trade under schedule D, for the year ending the 5th of April, 1843. He filled up the paper with the word "nothing," as the fact was. On the 24th of January, 1843, he received a notice that the Commissioners had made an assessment on him for the year ending the 5th of April, 1843, in these words:—

"To duties granted by schedule D on profits on trade, professions, foreign property, casual profits, 12,000*l.* Duty payable, 350*l.* Dated this 31st of December, 1843. J. Woods, Clerk to the Commissioners."

He gave notice that he should appeal, and on the 16th of February, 1843, attended the Commissioners at Rochdale, and being, as they required, first sworn, was examined by them, and stated that he had made a true return, that the business of himself and partners had not yielded a profit, but had caused a loss. The chairman asked if there was no profit on the average of the then three last years. He answered no; that he had been required to make a true return, and any other than the one he made would not have been true. One of the Commissioners said,

"Mr. Fielden should understand, that in ascertaining profits no interest is allowed to be deducted for the capital employed in their business."

He answered that he had so understood the Act, and that the capital he and his partners had employed in their business had been entirely unproductive, and had diminished in amount during the three years. Other questions and answers followed, after which the Chairman of the Board said, that the Commissioners were invested with extraordinary powers of inquiry, and a precept was handed to him to fill up and return to Mr. Woods within six days. He (Mr. Fielden) said he would see what return he could make to it, and on rising to leave the room, he was informed by the surveyor of taxes, then present, that he would be wanted there again after the precept was returned. He assented, and was told he should know when and where. The precept required a debtor and creditor account of profits on an average of the then last three years, and of gross profits, which were to be very full and particular. Within the six days he returned the precept as required, and stated in it—

"That we had no means of making out a debtor and creditor account of profit and loss on an average of the last three years, nor of our gross profits, otherwise than by an account in the following form, which would require an estimate of stock on hand both at the beginning and end of that period, and the result would show a heavy loss without any interest charged on capital employed:—

"PROFIT AND LOSS.

Dr.	To stock three years ago .. ..
	To materials purchased since .. ..
	To wages and expenses paid .. ..
	To rent of premises charged with Property-tax under schedule A .. ..
Cr.	By stock now .. ..
	By sales .. ..
	By bad debts and other losses in trade .. ..
	Balance showing a heavy loss on the last three years" .. ..

To this notification no answer was returned from the Commissioners, but he and his partners were served with a notice, dated March 30, 1843, by the collectors of the district, that they were returned in a schedule to the Commissioners of the district as defaulters in the sum of 175*l.* then due, and that, unless paid, process would issue against them. On receiving this he applied to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who received him most courteously, and listened to him with attention: The right hon. Gentleman made inquiry, and the result was, that he received from him a copy of a letter which had been addressed to the Commissioners, through Mr. Woods, their clerk, by the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes, through Mr. Pressley. This was the letter:—

*" Stamps and Taxes, London, 27th of March, 1843.—Sir, I have laid before the Board your letter of the 15th, relative to the case of Messrs. Fielden, under the Property-tax Act, and, in reply, I am directed to state, that in their opinion, the proper course to be pursued is for the Commissioners to direct another precept to the parties, under the authority of section 120, requiring them to deliver within a reasonable but limited time a schedule containing certain specific particulars, such as the amount of the several items set forth respectively under the head of 'debtor and creditor,' in their letter of the 21st ultimo addressed to you, and any other particulars which the Commissioners may think requisite to enable them to determine the appeal; and that, in default of the parties delivering such a schedule within the time limited, the Commissioners will be justified in confirming the assessment; or, if such a schedule should be delivered, the Commissioners may, in like manner, call for any further information that they may deem requisite and so on from time to time until they are satisfied; and further, that they may call upon the parties to be examined viva voce before them, but not upon oath; and lastly, that they may require the parties to verify on oath the statements contained in the schedules delivered, and also the substance of their answers taken down in writing on their viva voce examination (the parties having liberty previously to amend such schedules and statements provided by section 122); but, that if the parties do so verify the same on oath, the Commissioners are bound to decide the appeal according to the result of the schedules and examination. I am to add, that the Board think that a precept, calling upon the parties for a debtor and creditor account of profits and loss is too general and vague to justify the Commissioners in confirming the assessment in the present stage of the proceedings. I am, Sir, your obedient servant, C. Pressley. To J. Woods, Esq., Clerk to Commissioners, Rochdale."*

This letter suggested two things to the Commissioners: first, that they should require of him and his partners a schedule containing certain particulars, such as the amount of the several items set forth respectively in the form which he had sent them, to be delivered within a reasonable time; and, secondly, that the account called for by the Commissioners was too

general and vague, and that they were not justified in confirming their assessment. He had never since been called upon for the account suggested by himself, and thus plainly approved by the Board of Stamps and Taxes, and yet he had now received the notice that his goods were to be seized by the Sheriff to satisfy a demand, that he had the authority of the Board at Somerset House for saying was not legally due. He and his partners had resolved to resist this arbitrary and illegal act of the Commissioners, and though they would suffer the Government, if it liked, to come and seize upon their property, they would never pay a tax on profit that had not accrued to them, and which they had already sworn they had not realised. So much for the year 1842; the year 1843, he also returned "nothing," as profits of trade as before. On the 27th of December, 1843, he received notice that the Commissioners had again assessed him for profits, 12,000*l.* This notice was dated 15th of December, 1843, and signed "J. Woods, clerk to the Commissioners." He again appealed, and on the 11th of January went before the Commissioners, and stated to them that he and his partners, instead of a profit on the three years preceding, had sustained a heavy loss; that they held a heavy stock of goods which had been accumulating over that period, and that the value of their stock upon the same quantity of goods had been less and less every succeeding stock-taking during that period; that the raw material used in their manufactures had fallen lower and lower until July last, when it was at the lowest; that they had kept up wages, which, had they been reduced, would have caused much suffering among their work-people—that they had made bad debts to a considerable amount—that the accumulated stock at the end of the three years was not worth what it had cost, and that the capital employed under schedule D at the commencement of the three years had diminished in amount at the end of that period. After many questions on these points, a precept was put into his hand requiring answers to these questions:—

"State each trade or profession you are engaged in, where they are respectively carried on, and who are the partners in each; state the capital employed in each concern, distinguishing the amount belonging to each partner.

"State the amount of interest on your banking account.

"State the income from Ireland, or from any of Her Majesty's Dominions, or from any foreign securities or possessions.

"State the amount of the balance of profits in each concern, separately, for each of the three last years.

"State the particular deductions made in forming the above balances—

"For rent or taxes, or other expenditure of or connected with the dwelling house.

"For rent, or taxes, or other expenditure of or connected with buildings used for the purposes of trade.

"For bad debts, specifying whether the parties are bankrupts, or compounding, or how otherwise.

"For wages or board of servants.

"For improvements or repairs of premises, or depreciation in value thereof.

"For average losses.

"For repairs or supply of utensils or machinery, or depreciation in value thereof.

"Have you made any and what deductions for losses by bank or railways, or mining adventures, or any other not connected with your trade? or from capital withdrawn from trade? or from sums employed or to be employed as capital therein, or on account or pretence of interest or capital? or on account of the maintenance of yourself, family, or establishment? or for any annuity, interest of money, or other payment gratuitously allowed or otherwise? or on account of any monies, property, or unappropriated credits, reserved or set apart, being portion of or appertaining to your capital or undivided profits, not elsewhere assessed?

"You will bear in mind that the account is to embrace the period of three years, notwithstanding any change or succession of a firm, or of the partners therein."

The 20th of January was fixed on as the day for a further hearing on this subject, and on that day he attended the Board again, and, having looked over the questions, told the Commissioners that he could not possibly answer them, and he did not believe any one carrying on such a business as his could do so; but that he had made out a statement, showing the amount of capital in his business at the beginning of the period for which they had asked for a return, and the amount of the same at the termination of it, which showed a great loss. A long examination followed on this document, in which he informed the Commissioners that these amounts were obtained by valuations made by him and his brothers at their stock-takings, not to meet any demands for profits on income, but to determine each partner's share and interest in their joint property at the time, and what the representatives of any one or more, dying before the next stock-taking, would be entitled to receive out of the concern; that he and his partners signed a balance sheet at every stock-taking. He asked the Commissioners what more they required of him? Whether they disbelieved him? They answered, "No." He desired to know if they wished to see his books. They again answered, "No." He told them that if they did, and he did not force from them an acknowledgment of the truth of what he said, and that he had a losing business, he would submit to the charge. He was then asked to withdraw; and being called in again, was told by the Chairman that they had confirmed the assessment, but that if, on the 5th of April next, he could prove to them that he had no profit in his trade on the year ending that day, they would make a return of the duty as directed by the 133rd Section of the Act. He told the Commissioners that they had done him injustice, and that he would not pay, upon which the Chairman observed, that the Commissioners had been instructed by the officials present. With respect to the first year he had, he thought, clearly shown that the Commissioners had not acted in accordance with the law, nor in accordance with the suggestions from Somerset House. He called on the Government to inquire into his own and other cases of the like kind, before he could sanction the vote of supply. As to the second year in which he had been assessed, he called on the Government here to interpose and prevent an equal violation of this law, sufficiently odious when administered in its letter, but intolerable as administered by the present Commissioners. What right had they to require him to attend there again on the 6th of April next, and prove whether or not he had made any profit on the year ending on that day? None. It was a stretch of power which he called on the Government to look into at once, for he could tell them that, although this had been borne once or twice, there were murmurs arising that would burst forth on a repetition of this injustice. The Act itself contained a rule for the computation of profits on an average of three years preceding the year of assessment. The words were these;—

ture, or concern, upon a fair and just average of three years, ending on such day of the year immediately preceding the year of assessment on which the accounts of the said trade, manufacture, or concern, shall have been usually made up, or on the 5th day of April preceding the year of assessment."

Looking at that rule, he thought the Commissioners were prohibited from an inquiry as to profits accruing in the year of assessment, and this he told them, and that when that year came to charge he would deal honestly by them, and make a return on that, unless, indeed, they drove him, by their acts of injustice, to follow the example of a neighbour of his and make no return at all. He did not hesitate to support the Motion for postponing Supplies till grievances such as these and others complained of had some promise of redress.

Mr. S. Herbert thought it would save the time of the House, and be in every way more satisfactory, if he reserved his explanations upon the several points mooted by the hon. Member for Coventry, until they got into the Estimates, instead of introducing any preliminary explanation in regard to them.

Dr. Bowring begged to say a few words in explanation of the grounds upon which he was prepared to vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for Rochdale. The question was one which involved a great constitutional principle, and a great popular right. He thought that it must be admitted that the unrepresented portion of the community laboured under a grievous wrong in being obliged to pay taxes which were imposed upon them by the authority of this House, in which they had no persons deputed by them to watch over their interests. He thought it hard and cruel, unjust and unconstitutional, that the unrepresented millions of the community, whilst they had to pay taxes, should have no voice in this Assembly. This was a grievance which met them at every turn—it was one which was deeply and seriously thought upon by the public, amongst whom a very deep-rooted feeling of discontent had manifested itself upon the subject. He would not trespass longer upon the time of the House, than to repeat his approval of the Motion, and his strong sense of the injustice of the case, when out of twenty or thirty millions, which our population extended to, only about one million was represented.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, with respect to the complaints made by the hon. Member for Oldham, he begged to say, that Her Majesty's Government had no more control in the matter he complained of, than any individual Member of the House. The hon. Gentleman some time ago said he had reason to complain of two Commissioners in his district, and he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) caused an inquiry to be made into the subject. It appeared that the hon. Gentleman had made a nil return, that he had been applied to make a new return, in conformity with the requirements of the Act, and the hon. Gentleman refusing to do so, after some discussion, he was assessed. The Government had no power to interfere in such a matter; but there was a Clause in the Act which gave the power to any person who considered himself aggrieved, through the incompetency of the Commissioners to give a proper decision on his case, to make an application to special Commissioners to investigate it.

Mr. E. B. Roche in supporting the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale, was anxious to offer a few observations explanatory of the vote he was about to give. He was quite aware that it was an extreme course to interpose any impediment to the passing of the Estimates, and could only be justified by an extreme case; but he thought the present was an extreme case. Now he would take the statements of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and the Law Officers of the Government, as to the present condition of the country with which he (Mr. Roche) was connected. It had been asserted by those hon. and learned Gentlemen that Ireland (which contained one-fourth of the whole population of the United Empire) was convulsed with a treasonable and seditious agitation; and that a great majority of the people of that country were united in a conspiracy for the dismemberment of the State. If this great disaffection did exist, how had it been met by the Government? Had they reasoned with the people, or treated them as reasonable beings? No; but they had tried to put down the agitation by what was called—and in this instance it was not misnamed—the strong arm of the law. But could they suppose that Ireland, when she put forth a manifesto of bond fide grievances, would submit to be bullied out of it? He wished to know what was to be done for that country? Were the Government united; were the various Members of it of one mind upon the important question how Ireland was to be governed? It was true they had some conciliatory speeches during the recent debate. The right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government had made a conciliatory speech, but it was too much to expect his constituents to be satisfied with a conciliatory speech coming from one Member of that which is not a united Cabinet. But the speech of the noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies (Lord Stanley) was anything but conciliatory. Then they could not forget that the right hon. Secretary for the Home Department (Sir J. Graham) had only last year declared that conciliation in reference to Ireland was exhausted, and if they looked at the right hon. Baronet's speech of the other night they would find that very little alteration had taken place in his opinions. He had no desire to allude to—though it was impossible to forget the fact—that the right hon. Baronet had stigmatised his (Mr. Roche's) hon. and learned Friend and colleague (Mr. O'Connell), and those who had joined with him, in the Repeal agitation, as convicted conspirators. But what he was anxious to know—what his constituents were anxious to know—was, what was to be done for Ireland in the shape of legislation? How was the question of the Franchise to be dealt with? Had they heard anything in the speeches either of the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government or the right hon. the Home Secretary to elucidate that important question? There was a habit which obtained amongst the leading Members of the Government of beating about the bush when they came to speak of practical subjects of legislation. They would tell you what you asked for, and what you might ask for, but not what they would give you. He had been sent to that House by his constituents to ascertain what the intentions of Government were in the way of legislation; what was really to be done for them: and now what answer was he to give them? Another important question was the Church Establishment in Ireland. Now, in what state had that been left by the debate of the last fortnight? His right hon. and learned Friend the Recorder of Dublin had expressed himself satisfied with the declarations of the Government upon that subject; but was it possible that the right hon. and learned Gentleman could be satisfied with the statement of the right hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel)? But whether or not, he could assure the House that it would not be sufficient for the people of Ireland; they would not be satisfied with the announcement that the right hon. Baronet had made, the statement which had satisfied the right hon. the Recorder, that it was now agreed the Protestant Established Church should be maintained as a political institution. As commissions were now so fashionable, he thought they might well, before they came to such a determination, appoint a commission to inquire how far that Church had served them as a political institution? The people of Ireland would never be content until the political nuisance which the Established Church was felt to be in Ireland was abated. Returning to the subject of the Franchise, if the noble Lord opposite would, on the part of the Government, bring forward a good, useful, and fair measure, it would be received with gratitude, and should have his (Mr. Roche's) best assistance. But it was not enough to give to Ireland a fair Franchise; the Irish people required not only a fair and reasonable Franchise, but a fair representation in Parliament. They could not have confidence in the legislation of that House while they knew that their representatives were in a miserable minority as compared with the representatives of England. They wanted to know if any and what addition there was to be to the Franchise, and also whether there was to be any addition in the number of their representatives, so as to place Ireland in this respect more upon an equality with England in proportion to the population. He did not wish to disturb or agitate the people of Ireland, nor did he desire to interfere with the progress of legislation in that House, if they gave to Ireland an independent Legislature. Send him to Ireland to legislate on Irish ground, and he would make his bow and take his departure; but while they refused to give to Ireland that equality to which she had a right, and at the same time told him (Mr. Roche) that it was illegal to agitate in Ireland, to force the British Parliament to give to her an independent representation, he, for one, would lose no opportunity of bringing the grievances of his country under the notice of the House. What he complained of was, that Government were not alive—they thought they were alive, but he assured them they were not—not alive, he meant to the dangers of their Irish policy. He had no desire to aggravate those dangers—dangers important to the stability of the country. He admitted it fully. But what he held was, that the Government had not attempted to avert those dangers as statesmen. It had been admitted on both sides that the present occupation of Ireland was a military one. And it could not be denied that there were 20,000 troops and 10,000 armed police in Ireland, and a large number of armed steamers in the harbours and off the coast. But notwithstanding this large amount of force which was now maintained in Ireland, he must tell both sides of the House that they were wrong—they did not hold Ireland by military possession. They had fortified barracks, armed fortresses, and armed steamers, but they had not an armed occupation of the country. The only parties who had possession of the country were the Irish people. You hold it not by military possession, but by the strong affections and deep love and unchanging loyalty of the Irish people for their present Sovereign. Notwithstanding the ignorance which was supposed to prevail amongst the Irish people, he assured the House they well understood the principles of a limited Monarchy and a representative Government. They could distinguish between the prejudices of the Monarch, and the delinquencies of the Government. They remembered what the condition of the country was in years past and they knew what religious bigotry and national hostility in this country would make people do; and they could distinguish between the unpopularity of the present Government, and the love and affection which they felt convinced, and which he (Mr. Roche) knew the Sovereign felt for her Irish subjects. He remembered, that the first act of her reign was to write to her Lord Lieutenant to express her determination, that equal rights and redress of grievances should be enforced in Ireland. Therefore he said, let them not deceive themselves. The possession by which Ireland was held, was one far more secure than if they had all the armies in Europe in that country—it was the possession of the people. Her Majesty held possession of the hearts of the Irish people, and her Ministers held military possession of the barracks, fortresses, and harbours. He had no wish to waste the time of the House, but he could not avoid the expression of his opinion, and he did it without any disrespect, that the Statesmen by whom the country was now governed were not equal to the great occasion to which we had arrived.

Mr. Gisborne did not take it, as a matter of course, that while grievances existed, the House must necessarily proceed to vote the Estimates, or, on the other hand, that by voting the Estimates, they declared that no grievances existed. If the Amendment of his hon. Friend had been to consider the question of the Franchise, the financial arrangements of the Government, or any specific grievance, before going into Committee of Supply, he should support it. But to a proposition for postponing the Estimates until after Easter, without saying what was to be done in the meantime, he could not assent.

On the Motion that Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair,

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.] Sir C. Napier rose to call the attention of the House to the constitution of the Board of Admiralty. It would be in the recollection of hon. Gentlemen who had paid attention to naval subjects, that for many years previous to the time when the office of First Lord of the Admiralty was filled by the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir J. Graham), the affairs of the Navy had been managed by the Boards, namely, the Victualling Board, the Navy Board, and the Board of Admiralty; and under those Boards it was well known by every naval man, that the Navy had been most improperly managed. First, in regard to the construction of ships, 44-gun ships were built with their lower deck ports not three feet out of the water, and consequently, in the majority of cases, the lower guns were useless; the 52-gun ships were but little better; and then there were the 26-gun frigates, which could neither fight nor run, were not strong enough to fight, and had no keels to enable them to run away—this was the reason that so many of those vessels had been captured by the Americans. In fact, corvettes, frigates, and almost every class of ships had, under the management of the Navy Board been constructed in the most defective manner, even in comparison with the ships of other nations. Then there was the construction of the dockyard at Sheerness—a hobby of Lord Melville's—which had cost the country four or five millions, and was perfectly unfitted for the purposes for which it had been constructed. It was built on a lee shore, in a swamp, and he did not know how many millions of piles had been driven into the sea to form a foundation. It had been undertaken at a time when steam was making great progress, and when every man might have seen that vessels might ere long be towed further up. It was at all times exposed to the enemy, and he very much doubted whether it could ever be effectually defended. The right hon. Baronet was justified, then, in altering the constitution of the Navy Boards. The right hon. Baronet, assisted by Sir T. Hardy, than whom a more gallant and distinguished officer had never existed, and by Admiral Dundas, had consolidated the several Boards, and had placed the whole direction in the hands of the Board of Admiralty, and so far he (Sir C. Napier) fully concurred in what they had done. For two years before the right hon. Baronet had entered the Admiralty, he (Sir C. Napier) had himself recommended the adoption of a much stronger measure than was afterwards introduced. He now came to the consideration whether the system which had been substituted for the old one was good, or whether there were not still defects which might be remedied. The right hon. Baronet, in bringing forward his scheme, stated the objections of many distinguished officers, including Admiral Rodney and Earl St. Vincent, to the old constitution of the Navy Board. The new plan divided the government of the Navy into five branches—there was the Surveyor of the Navy, the Accountant General, the Storekeeper-General, the Victualling Department, and the Medical Department; and an additional Lord of the Admiralty was appointed to take up these duties. Now every naval officer who knew what these duties were, knew that they were very great and laborious. Too much duty was put upon the Board of Admiralty. The hon. and gallant Member here quoted the opinions of several Lords of the Admiralty, stating objections to the new constitution of the Admiralty. The officers of the Navy Board were each put under several Lords of the Admiralty. They came in with every change of Ministry, and were necessarily very ignorant of the duties of their departments. But the plan was not rigidly adhered to, as the Lords of the Admiralty mingled in each other's duties. They went down from time to time to Somerset House to the office of the Navy Board, where they merely asked the officials there how things went on, took their hats, and went off again, leaving all the real duty to the officers of the Board, who were not responsible. He must state, however, that the Victualling and the Medical Departments were well conducted, because one Lord of the Admiralty was at the head of each. But the officials in the dockyards had a great number of masters. The Accountant General, the Surveyor General, and the Storekeeper General all corresponded with the superintendent of the dockyards. He now came to the formation of the Board of Admiralty. He had moved for some returns in 1842, with a view of showing how many persons had been taken into the service of the Admiralty from the Navy. With respect to the principal departments he found, that there were in the Surveyor General's Office two persons who had never been at sea, in the Accountant General's four persons similarly situated, in the Storekeeper General's two persons in the Victualling Department, and in the Hospital six, making altogether fifteen persons in these important offices who had never seen any service. The same principle was carried out in other departments. He had, in 1842, moved for a return of the number of men who had seen actual service at sea, and who were now employed at the Admiralty, from the post of watchman upwards, and he found there were only two in the Surveyor General's Office, four in the office of the Accountant General, two in the Storekeeper's Department, one in the Victualling Department, and six in the Hospital Department—only fifteen in all, who had ever been at sea, shared any portion of the expenses of an establishment which cost the country 110,000*l.* per annum. He found also by a return made in 1843, that there were only 165 men in the civil service, including the dockyards, who had ever been at sea; whereas it would have been highly creditable to them to have given employment to old sailors, serjeants of marines &c. One great advantage had accrued to the public from his motions upon this subject, and which of itself was sufficient to repay him for his exertions; it was a great point gained, that on every ship returning to port, the captain was obliged to make a return of his best officers to the Port Admiral, thus ensuring to meritorious services their fair consideration and ultimate reward. He had moved last Session for a return of the number of civil situations under the Admiralty and Navy Boards, together with the situations from whence the occupants were taken, and by whom the parties were recommended. His object, was to get at the number of gentlemen's servants and butlers who were put into those situations, but the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. S. Herbert) would not give him this information—he would only give the numbers, but would not state by whom recommended, nor what the previous position in life. He had himself a servant, and a friend of his had another servant, and both of them applied to him to get them into the dockyard. He was refused at once, but they nevertheless got in, though how he could not tell. He would not name them for fear they should be turned out, but such was the way in which these situations were bestowed. He would now call attention to the manner in which promotions in the Navy had been conducted during the last twelve or thirteen years. They were told, after the present First Lord of the Admiralty had been some time in office, that he had introduced a spirit into the Navy which had not previously existed—that the ships were in the highest state of order and efficiency, and that the officers knew that they had but to excel in discipline and their promotion was safe. It was then alleged that Government went on too fast in promotion; and when Lord Melbourne came into office there was a Treasury Minute that the promotions should be one in three. Now, what had been the fact? In 1830 there had been thirty-one commanders made captains, thirty-one lieutenants made commanders, sixty-seven midshipmen made lieutenants, sixteen second masters made masters, twenty-two surgeons, and fifteen pursers. The obituary of that year was twenty-two captains, twenty-one commanders, and seventy-eight lieutenants. At the end of thirteen years, from 1830 to 1843, there had been 332 commanders made captains, 535 lieutenants made commanders, 945 midshipmen made lieutenants; and the obituary was 284 captains, 359 commanders, and 928 lieutenants. After this table he hoped they should never hear a word more about the Treasury Minute. Unless they came to a regular system of giving a Retired List to the Navy it was impossible to look out for the smallest amount of economy in promotion. He asked for this now on stronger grounds than he before had done, because, when he had before asked, it was stated that the Commission, which a most distinguished officer, Sir Thomas Hardy, was not able to sign, had decided that there was no necessity for a retired list. He thought the right hon. Baronet would incur great responsibility if he did not at once entertain the question, and bring the British Navy into a state of efficiency, by giving a moderate sum to induce these men to retire from the list—presenting a list of lieutenants who were deficient, and rating them as marines were rated when they were allowed to retire on half-pay. Having obtained that point, he should say that no officer should be promoted till a vacancy took place. Let the Minister take one-third of the promotions to himself, give one-third to seniority, and one-third to the Admiralty. He again begged to impress on the right hon. Baronet the absolute necessity there was (in order that the Navy might be in efficient state) to show how many effective officers we had, and to let the rest retire. It appeared by the evidence given before the Committee on Shipwrecks, that a number of officers and men exerted themselves in saving the lives of their fellow-subjects. By the evidence of Captain Sparshot, who had been sixteen years in the department, in reply to questions by Captain Pechell, it appeared that in no one instance had any of these officers been promoted, notwithstanding strong recommendations to that effect. The gallant Officer read the evidence of Captain Sparshot on this point. He gave the right hon. Baronet opposite full credit for the changes he had effected, which, considering the extraordinary difficulties he had had to encounter, he could not have accomplished unless he had been backed by great majorities, yet still he thought that further changes were required. As to the masters, every officer who sat in the House, and every man who had been at sea, must know the important services which a master had to perform. They must know that a captain, without a good master, would not be able to conduct his ship. When the right hon. Baronet came into office, a new regulation was made, by which the charge of the stores was taken out of the hands of ignorant warrant officers,—very good men to make boatswains, but, generally speaking, illiterate men—men who could hardly read or write, in consequence of the little encouragement which was given to nautical education,—and the right hon. Baronet appointed the masters to take charge of the stores, and gave them a certain allowance. It worked remarkably well; the only objection was, that, when the ship was indented the indenting was followed up by getting drunk. The charge of the stores was afterwards given back to the warrant officers. The captain was responsible for these stores, in conjunction with the master, and the master, at the present moment, got no remuneration. There was a late regulation at the Admiralty which gave the masters a most extraordinary sort of remuneration, although some of the regulations were very good. The pay of a master of a three-deck ship, not having charge of the stores (and it was impossible he could have, because, when a warrant officer died, a man was promoted in his place) was 21*l.* This was the pay of the master of a first-rate, the highest appointment he possibly could have, unless he got into a dockyard or became master of a fleet; and yet would any man believe that the master of a small brig or vessel, where perhaps the whole amount of stores was not worth 100*l.*, who might have been made a master the other day, and who did not know his business as well as the master of a first-rate, received 21*l.* 12*s.* 4*d.*? So that the master of a three-decker, having charge of an immense ship, in all times and in all weathers, who, if he did his duty, was up all night—who must be on deck whenever the ship was near land—who had the charge of the masts, the yards, the sails, the rigging, and everything, that could be put on the masts—received 7*l.* or 8*l.* less than the master of a small craft having charge of the stores. Again, the master—who was the best seaman in the ship—who was a trustworthy and attentive man, without whom no captain could go to sea (for he would not stop on board a ship one day if he had not a master in whom he could put confidence)—ranked under the junior lieutenant of the ship. Nay more; if a man was made acting lieutenant, to-morrow, the master ranked below him. Now, he would do away with the very name of master; he should be the same as a lieutenant; he should go through his examination the same as at present, but he should be just as eligible to be made a commander to-morrow if he distinguished himself, as the lieutenant, who might be made a commander at the end of two years. The present arrangement was an injustice to the masters, and he hoped the Admiralty would redress it. He hoped they would do justice to the masters, for it would be acceptable to every captain in the Navy and give no dissatisfaction to young officers, many of whom were too willing to learn from them what they ought to do. He came now to his own proposal. He had before said, that he approved of what the right hon. Baronet had done, and he only wished to make it more complete, and with very little trouble he thought it might be more perfect. He would first mention his own opinion in 1828, before the right hon. Baronet came into office. It was expressed in a letter addressed to a Member of Parliament, who afterwards became Lord of the Admiralty in 1830. He had long disapproved of the state of the Navy Board. He said that it was generally supposed that the office of Lord High Admiral was too high a situation for an individual; recourse must then be had to the Board. If there was a civilian at the head of the Board he should be assisted with the advice of Rear Admirals, which situation should be abolished as a sinecure, &c. The right hon. Baronet's arrangement was pretty nearly the same as this. The right hon. Baronet had referred to the constitution of the Ordnance Department: he (Sir C. Napier) wanted to see the Navy conducted pretty nearly in the same manner; he would appoint one of the Lords of the Admiralty superintendent of the dockyards; he would appoint another Lord of the Admiralty Comptroller of the Victualling Department, which was under one Superintendent; and then the Accountant General or the Treasurer of the navy, or whatever man you thought proper, should be appointed to attend to the accounts—then we should have the First Lord of the Admiralty or Vice Admiral of Great Britain to carry on the details of the Navy. Very few men were able to get through the work of the Admiralty as it was carried on at the present moment. As to the construction of ships, it was well known that there had always been great errors and great faults. Ever since he had been in the Navy, whenever they had a Surveyor of the Navy he had his own notions his own ideas and his own crotchets. Whether the Admiralty had the power of controlling him or not, he was not prepared to say, but he should say, from the specimens of ships which had been produced at various times, that there was great ignorance and great stupidity in the whole plan of ship-building. When the late Navy Board was in office it was impossible to persuade them that things were wrong; they resisted all attempts at improvement. Any man of ability or talent was obliged to give security to a large amount before he could get permission to build a ship, as in the case of Captain Symonds. He believed that Captain Symonds deserved great credit for what he had done in his office of Surveyor of the Navy, but still he was not perfect, he had his crotchets as well as other Surveyors, and unless he was strongly controlled he would destroy every ship in the navy, in order to bring them all under his own system. Although Captain Symonds had built some of the finest ships in the Navy, still he had himself given proof that he was not perfect, and it was to be tried yet whether his ships would be able to stand the exigencies of a long war, wherein they might be obliged to blockade an enemy's port for months in all sorts of weather; whether they would stand that or not, time and experience would alone tell. He had had the command of a squadron of six ships of the line in a very heavy gale off Alexandria, and he had fully expected that under such circumstances he should have seen the "Vanguard" the weathermost ship of all; and he was astonished to find that two other ships had the advantage of her. He trusted the Admiralty would not allow Captain Symonds to run away with the whole of the building of the ships; he knew they were following a different plan; that they had given orders for ships at the various dockyards, and had employed various builders upon them. He highly approved of the plan, as it would induce competition, and in ship-building it always did good. Of course, he would say, let the Surveyor build some, and let his ships come into competition with the other masters. Now, in reference to the magazines of ships, within a few years numerous alterations had taken place, and at an enormous cost to the country. He had heard of that, and moved for a Return of the number of ships which had been altered, and he found that within a very short period there were eleven ships whose magazines had undergone alteration. The cost of the whole he had not been able to arrive at, but he knew that the cost of the alterations of the Powerful of which he had the command, was no less than 7,463*l*. At one time, one Surveyor of the Navy got the crotchet in his head that it was necessary to arm the sterns of all our ships, and they were accordingly all turned into round sterns, of course at a great expense. He had moved for Returns of the cost, but it was declined; however, that crotchet did not last long, and the round sterns were remanufactured into another kind of round sterns; of course at another great expense. There was the Trafalgar, which was launched at Woolwich, before Her Majesty, and amidst immense pomp. It was proudly boasted that she was the most perfect ship in the British navy. Well, she was taken down to Chatham, and there all the pretty work of Mr. Laing was knocked to pieces, and the stern of some one else put in. He thought the Surveyor ought not to be attached to the Navy Board at all—he should be kept at the elbow of the Admiralty and all calculations relating to ship-building laid before him, upon which he should be called upon to give an opinion. During the late American war, it was found that our 46-gun frigates were totally unable to cope with the heavy frigates of America. Well, every one would have thought that that class of ships would have been abolished. But no, the Admiralty set to work and built seventy or eighty of them, and there they were now almost useless. One of them, the Penelope, had been cut asunder lengthened, and made into a steamer. When her engines were put in, and she was loaded with 500 tons of coals, her lower ports were no more than 3 feet 11½ inches from the water, while her paddles were 8 feet in the water, and they ought to be no more than 3 feet. Her cargo of coals was reduced to 430 tons, when she started out of the harbour on her trial trip; still her main deck ports were no more than 4 feet 11½ inches out of the water, and her paddle wheels 7 feet in it in place of 3. Why she was fit for nothing but to drown her people. Yet they were building another at Chatham. Now she would not be one bit better than the Penelope. Not one of our war steamers could carry ten days' fuel, by which, in his opinion, they were wholly useless. Even the French did not make such mistakes as we did in our steamers. Had we sent down orders to Glasgow or Liverpool, we might have obtained perfect war steamers, for only those could build them who were acquainted with them. The Surveyor had not produced one steamer which was not a disgrace to the Admiralty. Even the Queen's yacht was a bungled job; such were the mistakes made in her build, that, even with very heavy engines, they were compelled to ballast her with 100 tons of lead. The Albion, when built was supposed to be a chef d'œuvre; it was boasted she was the first ship of the whole Navy—superior to the Rodney, the Nile, and every other. Why the Rodney when she sailed, was full of stores—she had fourteen months' provisions on board—she was full as the ship could hold, yet she drew less water; her ports were further from the water than the Albion's, with less than four months' provisions on board. He hoped that the Admiralty would consider these matters and mend them.

Mr. S. Herbert said, there were some charges which the hon. and gallant Officer had made, which would, probably, come under consideration when the House got into Committee on the Navy Estimates, but there were other points in the speech of the hon. and gallant Officer on which he (Mr. S. Herbert) wished to offer a few (and they would be very brief) observations to the House. The hon. and gallant Officer complained of the constitution of the Board of Admiralty, and had criticised its conduct by the character of the ships which had been constructed under the authority of the Admiralty. He said the class of ships which had been built were of an extremely insufficient construction, but in making that charge as against the present Board, he forgot that in support of his charge, he had instanced several ships which had been built under previous Boards of Admiralty.

Sir C. Napier: I produced two instances—one before, and the other since, the constitution of the Board of Admiralty had been newly constructed. I admit, that the errors have been less since.

Mr. S. Herbert was sorry to have misunderstood the hon. and gallant Officer, and must take it that he had done so, on the hon. and gallant Officer's statement. The first charge then made against the present Board by the hon. and gallant Officer, had been as to the exercise of its patronage. The hon. and gallant Member stated, that having moved for a Return, he found that though there were between 600 and 700 persons employed in the various civil departments of the Admiralty, not a single naval person was to be found amongst them; but the hon. and gallant Officer had himself shown, that to 612 civilians already employed in the dockyards, 50 naval persons had been added since the Return was laid upon the Table. He was not opposed to the proposition for the employment of naval men in the civil service of the Admiralty. In some respects he had himself carried out that principle to a certain extent, viz., in the employment of pursers as clerks in the civil departments; but he knew that sometimes serious inconvenience arose from it. If an old purser was taken into the civil department as clerk, he no sooner learnt his duty than he was unfit for service; and, on the other hand, if a young, active, intelligent purser was so employed, he would not take it for a continuance, as he naturally was looking for another ship, and when he had learnt the business of a clerk he went away; so that constant interruptions took place, and after the trouble of teaching the man his duty, no advantage to the public service was gained from him. The hon. and gallant Officer had next pointed out as an excellent regulation to be adopted in the dock-yards, would be, that when ships were paid off it should be in the power of the Commander to recommend the most deserving of his crew for employment in the dock-yard, on the condition of their going to sea again whenever called upon. This regulation had been already carried into effect, and by this means an efficient corps of labourers was maintained in the dock-yards, and a reserve of able-bodied seamen kept ready to be put on board ship upon any emergency. With regard to special promotions, he supposed the hon. and gallant Officer would not object to the instances in which special promotions had taken place even for particular services in Syria, for services in the Chinese war, and also for services in that most pestilential quarter of the world, the Coast of Africa. These promotions were all for special services, and were free from the possibility of any charge of favouritism. As to the promotions from the Coast-guard service, he (Mr. S. Herbert) did not know an instance in which the Admiralty had deviated from the recommendations of the Controller of the Coast-guard, the officer in whom (as we understood) the selection was vested. As to the masters, the present Board had not been remiss; in the first place, they had been made commissioned officers, and some had been promoted lieutenants, and one Commander of Her Majesty's Yacht. With regard to the building of ships, it had been said the Admiralty ought to take care not to give a monopoly to any surveyor of the navy. He had every respect for the genius and ability of Sir W. Symonds; but he did not consider even that able individual to be infallible, and, therefore, other builders had been allowed to compete with Sir W. Symonds, and the Board had now no less than nineteen experimental vessels in the course of construction by different individuals. As to the expense of the alteration of the magazines, to which reference had been made, it had been found necessary; for even the plan of the hon. and gallant Officer himself had been adopted in one instance, and pronounced by two most competent officers, to be exceedingly dangerous. As time advanced, science advanced; improvements followed; and hence alterations had been found to be absolutely necessary. The hon. and gallant Officer had alluded to the Penelope. He would read the report of the Commander with reference to her draught of water. That gallant Officer stated:—

With respect to the qualities of the Albion, he would just read a letter which came to his hands from Cove a few days ago. It was addressed to Sir W. Symonds; and was in these terms:—

"It affords me great pleasure to comply with your request, and particularly so, as I am most conscientiously able to refute the vile and diabolical assertions respecting our noble ship. In the first place, I will give you her flotation when provisioned for five months, of all species, and she will now take another month's provisions comfortably under hatches, and more of bread. She stows 410 tons of water, and has 12 months' stores, with 10 months' fuel. Her draught then was—forward, 23ft. 6in.; aft, 24ft. 7in.; height of midship port, 6ft. 6in.—this should be called 6ft. 8in., as the port sills amidships were cut down to allow the depression of the 84-pounder guns which the Admiralty thought of putting into her; she is now armed with 12 68-pounders, the remainder long 32's, 56cwt., except on the quarter-deck and fore-castle, 24 No. 32-pounders, 8ft. 6in., 42 cwt. guns, and two 68-pounders on the quarter-deck, making in all 90 guns actually mounted. This line of flotation, I should observe, agrees to half-an-inch of her talented constructor's calculation. Now for her qualities, so far as we have been able to judge, at sea; she works and steers like a boat, that is quicker and better than any ship I ever sailed in. On Sunday last, we had a good trial by the wind, with as much wind as her masts would bear, under double-reefed topsails, courses, &c.; her inclination never exceeded  $4\frac{1}{2}$  degrees; she was then going 10 knots, and working within  $10\frac{1}{2}$  points of the compass; at this time there was a short sea, and on one tack a-head she was far from being uneasy; her motion is quick but very easy, and on the whole I do think her the most splendid ship ever built, and her constructor must be proud of her; for my part, I am perfectly unprejudiced."

This was signed "William Bowles." He had also a letter from Mr. Lofthouse, the Master of the Albion, which stated:—

"I am just returned from the Albion, and I cannot delay expressing my admiration of her in the strongest terms. She is quite perfect, and beyond all doubt, the finest two-decker in the world. Of course, you have already heard all I could tell you about her sailing, working, steering, &c.; but all the officers seem most sincere and hearty in their praises of her, and so end all the cabals against you and her. I am also delighted with the Iris. * * * * If I had my way I should commission the Vanguard immediately, and try her with the Albion, as the fastest two-decker in the navy."

He would say a word with respect to another subject touched on by the gallant Officer—the proposed alteration of the Board of Admiralty. If officers were placed at the head of the different departments, he did not see what improvement that would be on the present system.

The fact was, that there were now officers placed at the head of, and responsible for, the different offices of Somerset House. The hon. and gallant Officer said, that when a change of Administration took place, the new Members who came in were ignorant of the duties of their office, and depended for information on the principal persons employed under them. This, however, was an objection that applied to every change of office, it was one of the necessary evils of our system of Government. He could not see what additional responsibility would be obtained by the proposed change; in point of fact there was now a complete responsibility. The hon. Gentleman was wrong in thinking, that the Board of Admiralty stayed almost exclusively in Whitehall; the gallant Officer near him was constantly at Somerset House, and so were the secretaries, in the discharge of their official duties, acting on their responsibility. Before a great change in the construction of an Official Board took place, there ought to be proof that the existing system had failed. He could say for himself, that before he became a Member of the Admiralty Board he had had his doubts as to the working of the system, but the experience he had had enabled him to say that it worked very well. The hon. and gallant Officer said there was too much work for the Board to do; he did not think there was; there was a fair day's work for each person, but not more. If war were to break out, and continue for any length of time, it might be necessary to increase the official force. He was one of those who thought that the measures taken by the right hon. Member for Cumberland during his tenure of office were much required, though, like all new measures, they might work with difficulty at first. They had now stood the test of ten years, and three Administrations, and having heard no complaint of their inefficiency, or seen any of those contrarieties or embarrassments which beset the former system, he thought there was no case made out to induce him to consent to a change in the composition of the Board, which, after all, would be little else than nominal.

Captain Pechell was not actuated by any party feeling; but he was of opinion, with his gallant Friend below him, that the constitution of the Board of Admiralty did not work well. The gallant Officer had shown that there was no responsibility whatever at that Board, and it was well known that no junior Officer could venture to state and maintain his opinion. Sir Joseph Yorke once said in that House, when at the Board of Admiralty, that if he presumed to differ from the Secretary or the First Lord, the sooner he turned his stern to the Admiralty the better. Hon. Members would recollect the case of Captain Berkeley, who endeavoured to induce the Admiralty to increase the ships' complements to an efficient number. That gallant Officer thought he had gained over a majority of the Board to his opinion; but after a short absence he found that this was all reversed, and that what had been brought forward in the Board-room could be upset in private. The Secretary for the Admiralty had not at all succeeded in refuting the statements of the gallant Officer opposite. He did not give Government any credit for the manner in which they dealt with the steam navy and steam machinery. When they saw the formidable steam ships which France was now building, he thought great blame was to be imputed to them for their backwardness in augmenting this part of our force. He wished to know why the great improvement of the Archimedean screw, which had been completely successful in the French and American vessels in which it was tried, had not been adopted. He did not find fault with the experiment that had been made in the case of the Penelope, but thought the service for which she was best adapted was the transport of troops. He did not approve of the Navy being employed in the collection of Poor-rates in Ireland. He felt the disgrace of Naval Officers being employed in such a service, and of bringing a man-of-war with her forty-eight pounders to bear on the next farm-house, where a paltry sum for Poor-rates might be due. To the hon. and gallant Officer opposite was due the honour and glory of employing the Navy of the country in such a service. He must complain that such a scanty share of promotion or reward fell to the lot of the officers and men employed in the fatiguing and harassing service of the Coast Guard, which was confined to those who distinguished themselves in saving life in cases of shipwreck. He wished the Admiralty would send a good ship-of-war to protect the fishery on the coast of Sussex, not one of the ten-gun brigs. He would take this opportunity of asking how many of these diabolical vessels, for so they might well be called, were left in Her Majesty's service? He believed there was one now employed on the coast of Africa, he supposed for the purpose of wearing it out; and he heartily commiserated the crew of it, for they would be worn out too.

Dr. Bowring regretted that some general method was not observed with regard to the estimates of expenditure laid before the House. He saw no reason why all the departments should not adopt the same form; yet from year to year the accounts were brought in from each of them in a different shape. At present the department of expenditure was also made the department of receipt. He contended that the gross revenue in every shape, and from every quarter, ought to be paid into the Exchequer, and that no payments should be made by any department, except by Treasury warrant. The principle had been recognized by the noble Lord the Member for London, and other hon. Members, and until it was carried into effect these accounts would never be satisfactory.

Captain Plumridge said, the masters of the Navy complained, first, that they only ranked as Lieutenants; secondly, that, while Paymasters and Purser's could obtain 8s. 6d. a day on half-pay, they could only obtain 7s.; and thirdly, that after an action the only promotion the Master of a fleet could obtain was that of Lieutenant, whilst he ought to be eligible to be made a Captain.

House in Committee.

Mr. S. Herbert said, that having taken up some time of the House already, and as he wished to get as far in the estimates as he could, he should confine his statement merely to those points in which alterations had been made, and hoped that others would follow his example. Upon the first vote for the wages of Seamen and Marines, it would be seen that there was a very considerable reduction. The hon. Member for Coventry had alluded to that reduction as imprudent. He thought when they recollected the state of our relations with China, where war had been lately concluded, and the very large commerce which was necessary to be protected in the Indian seas, and the disturbed state of some of the coasts, the House would admit that the vote had been reduced as low as possible. The hon. Member explained at some length the various items of the Estimates and the alterations made in them, and concluded by saying, on the whole, though the diminution of the gross Estimates was not so large as the diminution of the number of men would appear to warrant, yet he thought the Committee would admit that the Estimates were drawn up so as to be conducive to the ultimate efficiency of the Navy. He begged the House to observe, that a great reduction had also been made on the preceding year. He did not think that a greater reduction could with safety be made. He begged to propose, as the first Vote, that 36,000 Seamen be employed, 10,500 Royal Marines, and 2,000 boys.

Mr. W. Williams admitted that the power and greatness of the country mainly depended upon that branch of the public service comprised by these Estimates. The Estimates of 1833 were less by 1,600,000*l.* than those of the present year, and at another period they were 2,000,000*l.* less. He called upon the hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Admiralty to explain the circumstances of the country which required this additional expense. He should object to that portion of this Vote which referred to the Marines employed on shore, and upon it he should take the opinion of the Committee. Those Marines formed, in fact, part of the Standing Army of this country, and he saw no reason why their number should be greater than in preceding years, as was the case. The number of Marines, serving on shore, proposed for the present year, was 6,000 men; whereas, if they took the last ten years, they would find that the number had never exceeded 4,500 men. He should propose, unless he received a satisfactory answer, that the number should be reduced by 2,500 men. He would not move that reduction until he had heard the explanations given by Her Majesty's Government; but, if they were not satisfactory, he certainly should divide the Committee on the subject. It appeared to him that by means of the Marines they were increasing the standing army.

Sir G. Cockburn said, the estimated number of Marines was felt to be necessary. They were a most valuable force. They were as useful on shore in guarding dockyards and other duty of that kind as soldiers, and, in the event of a sudden war, they were at once available. It was of the utmost importance that every possible facility should exist for having ships readily manned; and the Marines were always ready to put into ships, in the event of any sudden emergency. The hon. Member should know that when the smaller number of Marines were voted, to which the allusion had been made, foreign nations were not endeavouring to cope with our Navy. But now they were making great efforts in that direction, and their facilities of manning their fleets were greater than any we possessed. It was absolutely necessary that we should have a fleet to command the Channel in the event of war being declared. Two-thirds of our seamen were abroad in foreign parts; and, in the case of a war with France, all those seamen we depended on might be carried to French prisons, instead of coming here to man our ships. The only security we had for manning our ships in such an emergency was this vote of Marines.

Sir C. Napier bore testimony to the efficiency and available character of the Marine force, and hoped his hon. Friend would not propose any reduction in the number of men. The Marines ought rather to be increased than diminished. The Government were the best judges what number of men they ought to keep up; and, as a naval man, he was anxious to see the number as well kept up as possible. The chief thing was, how they should be disposed of. Under the late Administration they had three guard ships, with scarcely sufficient men to keep them clean. In his opinion, those guard ships should be kept fully manned, and with the most efficient officers fit for active service, instead of old decrepit men as hitherto, who, when sent to sea, were found totally incapable of performing their duties. He hoped the gallant Admiral would explain what was the intention with reference to those guard-ships. With respect to powder magazines, he had tried various experiments in the Powerful, but they had been overruled when it came home, on the idea that they should be made bomb-proof, which, he thought, perfectly impossible. Our officers, he was afraid, had not sufficient opportunities for practice, and from what he had seen on foreign stations, he should say that our fleet might not on a sudden emergency be found so efficient in manœuvring as would be desirable.

Admiral Dundas observed, that we had 1,000 merchant steamers, 250 of which were capable of carrying 32-pounders; a force which would overcome the combined fleets of the rest of the world.

Sir G. Cockburn remarked, that some experimental alterations, made by the gallant Officer, the Member for Marylebone, on board the Powerful, had been disapproved of by a Board of Inquiry, composed of Sir E. Codrington, Admiral Parker, and Sir T. Hastings. With respect to the Penelope, the report of her captain had been one of approval, and her services would be found peculiarly valuable on the coast of Africa, which she could closely blockade against slavers, the currents preventing sailing vessels from keeping their stations. He alluded to the extensive commerce enjoyed by this country all over the world, and the consequent demand for ships of war, which, without the aid of steamers, the Admiralty could not, unless by great increase of the Estimates, afford.

Vote agreed to, as was also a resolution "that 1,170,476*l.* be granted to Her Majesty to defray the wages of Seamen and Marines for the year ensuing."

House resumed, Committee to sit again.

QUI TAM ACTIONS — HORSE-RACING PENALTIES.] The Report on the Horse Racing Penalties Bill was further considered.

Mr. Craven Berkeley moved the addition of a Clause, to the effect, "that it shall not be lawful for the space of three Calendar Months from the passing of this Act, to lay any information for the recovery of penalties against parties engaged in certain popular sports mentioned in the Acts of 5 and 6 Will. III. c. 59, s. 3, and 2 and 3 Vict. c. 47, s. 47." He thought that persons subject to informations under these Acts, might claim the protection of the House with quite as much justice as the Noblemen and Gentlemen for whose benefit the Bill now under consideration had been introduced. By the expiration of the time for which he proposed to suspend these penalties, the Committee now inquiring into the subject of Gaming would have delivered their report, and it would then be for the House to determine whether the sports to which his clause referred, should be prohibited or allowed. In his opinion no Legislation was so bad as that which they were unable to enforce.

VOL. LXXIII. { Third Series }

There was a weekly publication in this metropolis, issued every Sunday, which contained allusions to no less than between forty and fifty games and sports, which were rendered illegal by the Acts mentioned in the Clause now proposed. Why, he asked, did not they re-erect the turnpike gates which had been destroyed in South Wales? Why did they not endeavour to put in force the Clauses of these Acts in the Counties of Cumberland, Northumberland, and Durham? Because they knew they would be unable to do so without the aid of their Metropolitan Police Force. He must say, that if they did not suspend the informations which might be laid under the Acts of Parliament mentioned in this Clause, they would show, in agreeing to the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, that they were legislating for a particular class of persons, and for that class only; and, whatever might be the sentiments of the majority of Members of that House, he could assure them, that that opinion was very generally entertained out of doors.

Question put that the Clause be brought up.

Dr. Bowring seconded the Motion. They offered a premium to persons who assisted in giving effect to the laws which they made, and then, when persons availed themselves of the inducements held out, they turned round and loaded them with opprobrium, merely because they put the law in force against opulent and influential men. If they could find other means of giving effect to their Legislation, they ought not to encourage men in this course; but, if they acknowledged such co-operation, certainly they ought not to repudiate it when it was exerted against the noble and the great. Informers had been acting against the poor and the feeble for years, and that House had not interfered to restrain their proceedings; but now, as they had selected the rich as their prey, hon. Gentlemen were ready to make them the objects of public opprobrium. Though he disapproved of the Bill of the hon. Gentleman opposite, as well as of the Amendment of the hon. Member near him, he felt bound to show that he was desirous of protecting the weak as well as the strong, by supporting the Clause of his hon. Friend.

Clause brought up on the Question that it be read a second time.

Mr. James Stuart Wortley said, the

hon. Gentleman had not informed the House what was the nature of the Games to which his Amendment referred. He believed the hon. Gentleman would find that his Clause would afford protection to sports which had received the highest aristocratic protection, as cock-fighting, and other similar games. He objected that this Clause had nothing whatever to do with the present Bill. The object of the Bill was to suspend, for a certain time, actions which had been brought against individuals for penalties to a very large amount—to an extent far greater than was commensurate with the nature of the offence; while the Games to which the Clause of the hon. Member referred, were punishable by criminal proceedings. He protested against the ground which had been taken by the hon. Member for Bolton (Dr. Bowring). He was perfectly satisfied that if the persons to whom this Bill was designed to afford protection, had not been Gentlemen of rank and aristocratic connections, this outcry and opposition would not have been raised against it. Hon. Gentlemen on the other side were jealous, and properly jealous, of the rights and privileges of the people; and they imagined, because there were some aristocratic names among the persons whom this Bill was intended to protect, that it was owing to that circumstance the Measure had been proposed. He begged to remind the House, that, within a few years past, similar protection had been afforded to printers; and, very recently, the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe) obtained the same protection for poor players. Last Session, also, an Act of a similar nature had been passed. Persons had been in the habit of sending coal from the North of England, which were sold under the best market names, while they had not been obtained at the Collieries from which it was professed they came. An Act of Parliament was passed, requiring a specification of the names of the Collieries from which coals were obtained. In some cases the requirements of this Act were not observed; actions were brought against offenders for penalties to a large amount, and a Bill was passed to suspend, not to stop, those actions. The law was considered so beneficial that it remained unaltered; and he (Mr. Wortley) had since conducted a Prosecution against parties for the recovery of penalties under the Act. All they asked for by the Bill now before the House was the suspension of the pending Actions until an inquiry had been instituted on the subject by a Committee upstairs.

Captain Pechell said, that he had been referred to as having supported the Solicitor General, in 1835, in protecting the Printers of Newspapers from Actions brought against them; but he could not agree that that case was analogous to the present. Several Country Newspaper Proprietors, as well as some Metropolitan Printers, had omitted to state their places of residence in the Newspapers, and they had become liable to penalties. That, however, was an affair of regulation with the Stamp Office; they had not omitted their names, but merely their places of residence. On the Plaintiffs in the Actions sought to be affected by this Bill the utmost opprobrium had been cast—they had been called the foulest names. Whether hon. Gentlemen opposite had associated with these scoundrels, as they had been designated, he did not know, but at all events, they must have made bets with them or others, or they could not have been brought into contact. With, however, the array of the Members of the Jockey Club on the other side, backed by two Secretaries of State and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he supposed the Bill would pass. He must protest against the Measure, and deny that it bore any analogy to the Bill relating to Newspapers which had received his support, as stated by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite.

Mr. C. Berkeley said, he would not give the House the trouble of dividing, as, with such a formidable array as he saw assembled on the opposite side of the House, he knew it would be useless; but he would ask his hon. and learned Friend opposite, as he had talked of cockfighting, whether he thought cockfighting more cruel than stag-hunting or fishing, or any of those sports which were legalized, and which had received the sanction of the highest persons in the realm? He was sure the hon. and learned Member would not give way to such cant.

Motion that the clause be read a second time negatived without a division, Report received, Bill to be read a third time.

House adjourned at a quarter to 1 o'clock.

Crawford, from Rochdale, for Reduction of Duty on Tobacco.—By Mr. Hutt, from South Australian Land Company, respecting the Corn Trade of South Australia.—From Belford, respecting Casual Poor.—From Paisley, for Reform of Medical Profession.—From Paisley, complaining of the recent State Trial.

POOR LAWS (IRELAND).] Sir D. Norreys asked whether the Government would have any objection to move for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the operation of the Poor-law in Ireland, whether any steps have been taken by the Government to carry into effect a general revision of the valuations of Poor-law Unions in Ireland, and, if so, how soon the revision will be commenced? whether it be still the intention of the Government to appoint an Assistant Poor-law Commissioner for the superintendence of that revision? and whether it be still the determination of the Government that the valuation of property for the purpose of county assessments in Ireland (called the Griffiths valuation) shall be continued, notwithstanding the commencement of a general revision of valuation for the purpose of Poor Rate, or whether it be proposed by the Government to introduce any Measure for the consolidation of the several valuations, so that the County Rates, Poor Rates, and other Local Taxes may be levied on one uniform scale of valuation.

Sir James Graham said, the Government, when they introduced so important a Measure as the Poor Law Amendment Bill at the close of the last Session, had no intention of moving for the appointment of such a Committee; but if the Irish

Members were of opinion that a Select Committee ought to be appointed on that subject, he would not oppose a Motion to appoint one. He apprehended that the hon. Baronet laboured under some misapprehension with regard to what had been stated by the Government on the subject of a new valuation. The Act of last Session did not render a general new valuation imperative, but in cases where it might be convenient to have particular new valuations in consequence of the existing valuations having been raised or reduced by local circumstances, then there was a power given to commence new valuations in those instances, and a general order had been issued laying down the principle on which those new valuations were to be conducted; and as the Act did not render it imperative to appoint an officer to carry out those valuations, the hon. Baronet would see that his second question was already answered. With regard to the third question of which he had given notice—namely, in reference to the survey called Griffiths's valuation, it was now nearly completed; but as it was intended for other purposes, and was not a valuation of the net annual value, it would not answer for the purposes of the Poor Rate, as a valuation for that purpose should be on the net annual value. In answer to a communication made to him, Mr. Griffiths stated that a new survey would be necessary for the purpose of a new valuation to meet the purposes of the Poor Rate, and that such re-survey would involve a considerable expenditure. The Government did not intend, therefore, to entail upon the country that additional expense.

Sir D. Norreys would, on an early day, move for a Select Committee to inquire into the operation of the Poor Law in Ireland, unless the right hon. Baronet (Sir James Graham) took it in hand.

AFFRAY AT BRIGHTON.] Captain Pechell wished to put a question to a right hon. Gentleman opposite (the Secretary at War), with respect to an outrage which had taken place at Brighton, and which had been made the subject of a trial. The outrage had been committed by some soldiers; the trial was now over, and the result was, that the soldiers had been convicted; and Lord Chichester, who was Chairman at the Court, in passing sentence upon them, said that they had been guilty of a very serious offence, and that he would punish them to show that the peaceable inhabitants of the town should be protected. The inhabitants of Brighton felt that a stigma had been cast upon them by the right hon. and gallant Officer, by his observations on a former occasion with respect to those proceedings. Now he wished to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman had made any inquiry with a view to remove the impression which the inhabitants of the town entertained as to the cause of the late outrage; and he also wished to ask whether the officers intended to remunerate the parties in Brighton whose properties had been injured in the late outrage?

Sir H. Hardinge said, that the hon. and gallant Officer was under a wrong impression, if he supposed that he (Sir H. Hardinge) meant, by any observation of his, to throw a stigma on the inhabitants of Brighton. If the hon. Gentleman read the charge delivered by the Magistrate at the Quarter Sessions, he would see there could be no doubt that previous provocation had been received by the soldiers, and this confirmed what he (Sir H. Hardinge) had said in answering a question put to him on a former occasion. No doubt, where a regiment garrisoned in a town to assist in keeping the peace misconducted itself in the manner in which a portion of the regiment in question had done, it was a serious offence, and he was happy that the sentence pronounced in this case had been such as would teach the parties that they must observe the laws of their country, the sentence being an imprisonment of ten months with hard labour, for the assault that had been committed in Brighton. The hon. Gentleman had mistaken what he had said as to compensation for the injuries sustained. What he had stated was, that the soldiers of the regiment themselves, feeling that what had been done was quite unjustifiable, were ready to enter into a subscription to make good the damage. As to an inquiry he was not aware that any of the nature referred to had been made; but he could state that the Commander-in-Chief had given orders that no soldier should enter the town of Brighton unless accompanied by a non-commissioned officer.

vernment whether he had received any information as to the approval, or disapproval, by the French Government, of the deposition of Queen Pomare. He had seen in a second edition of The Times of that day a statement that the French Government disapproved of that proceeding, and had sent out orders that its officers should adhere to the original Treaty; but he was anxious that the right hon. Baronet should, if in his power, confirm a statement so creditable to the French Government, and so interesting to the friends of peace.

Sir R. Peel said, he had but a short time before left the Foreign Office, and he had not learnt that any official information had been received beyond what had already appeared. At the same time he had no reason to doubt the authenticity of the information contained in the second edition of The Times, which consisted of a quotation from The Moniteur, the official organ of the French Government, stating that a Cabinet Council had been held, at which it was resolved that there had not been sufficient justification for the Admiral in departing from the stipulations of the Treaty, and that orders should be sent out to adhere to the Treaty of September (he believed it was) 1842. That was the statement that was made. He had before deprecated premature questions on the subject, and had stated that he had a strong and confident impression that it would not be necessary for us to interpose; but that the French King and the French Government would, acting upon their own good feelings, adopt a line of conduct which would be satisfactory to the people of this country, and more particularly to those who were interested in the fate of those excellent men, the missionaries; and he was glad that the act of the Admiral was not ratified. He had no doubt that the statement copied from the Moniteur was correct, and he was bound to add, in justice to the French Government, that this act was the voluntary act of the French King and the French Government, taking the course which he had expressed his belief they would, and that it was not necessary that any communication should be made on the subject by this Government.

TAHITI — THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT.] Mr. Hindley begged to ask the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Go-

of State for the Home Department. He understood that, in another place of which they often heard, an important conversation had taken place between a right rev. Prelate, and the Members of Her Majesty's Government, from which it was to be presumed that the Government would, in the course of the amendment of the Poor Law Bill, adopt some measures for the Religious Instruction of the Poor in Unions, by Chaplains of the Church of England only. He wished to know from the right hon. Baronet whether it were the intention of the Government to introduce any such provision?

Sir James Graham had no hesitation in answering the question put to him by the hon. Member, or in stating what the decision of the Government was upon the point referred to by him. Her Majesty's Ministers were perfectly satisfied with the exercise of the discretionary power vested in the Poor Law Commissioners, with respect to the appointment of Chaplains in workhouses: he was sure that they would appoint persons according to the necessities of the different localities in which these appointments were to take place. He was not prepared to propose any alteration in the law. As at present advised, he was perfectly satisfied with the state of the law, and in any discussion that might take place on the subject, he would be prepared to show, to the satisfaction of the House, that the discretion placed in these responsible officers had been exercised in a most proper manner.

DUELLING.] Mr. Turner, in pursuance of notice, asked the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Treasury, whether it was his intention to bring in a Bill for the more effectual prevention of Duelling.

Sir R. Peel said, that Her Majesty's Government had not failed to take this important subject into their consideration, but they were not prepared to bring in any new legislative enactment in reference to Duelling. If the practice of Duelling still existed, it was not owing to any defect in the letter of the law, and Her Majesty's Government greatly doubted whether any good object could be promoted by altering the law. At the same time, they had shown by the exercise of influence and authority, during the Recess, a disposition to discourage the practice of Duelling, so far as it could be discouraged by the executive power. He believed that the feeling which had lately existed on this subject had been excited in a great degree by the unfortunate result of a duel which took place in the course of last year. He thought there could be no doubt that the practice of Duelling was on the decline, that the influence of civilisation was producing its necessary effect; and on this account he should deprecate any interference on the part of the House. The officer who lost his life last year, had served his country with great distinction. When his widow applied for that pension to which she would have been entitled had he died in any other way than by the hand of his antagonist, Her Majesty's Government felt themselves compelled to refuse the application. With respect to the survivor, as that officer did not come forward to answer the charge after the lapse of the period which was allowed for public feeling to subside, he was superseded. The widow of the deceased officer having been refused the pension, and the survivor having been superseded, he thought Her Majesty's Government had shown that they were not unwilling to exercise their legitimate authority for the purpose of suppressing the practice of Duelling: but they were not prepared, as he had already stated, to introduce any new legislative measures with that view.

Mr. T. Duncombe said, the right hon. Baronet had stated that the unhappy widow of Col. Fawcett had, from the mode of her husband's death, been deprived of a pension she would otherwise have been entitled to. He wished now to ask whether it was the intention of the Government to discontinue pensions to the widows of officers who did fight duels, and to break officers, as was now the case, if they did not fight duels when challenged to do so.

Sir Robert Peel said, as notice had been given of a Motion on the subject of Duelling, he thought it best to say no more upon the subject, but to reserve his opinions until the subject was brought regularly before the House.

LAW COURTS (SCOTLAND).] Mr. Wallace rose to move for the Returns respecting the cost to the Nation of the Judicial Establishment in Scotland. He observed that the vacations in these Courts exceeded the Sessions, and unless some amendment took place, instead of Courts of Session, it would be his duty hereafter to designate them as Courts of Vacation. He should first read the actual facts as to the period of the Session and the Vacation, and the time daily during which the Judges sat. The vacation in what was called the Inner House extended to 211 days in the year, or nearly seven months; while the Session lasted only for five months, or 113 days. The vacation in the Outer House lasted for more than six calendar months, but the Session only 103 days, or about three months and a half. The Judges in the one set of Courts sat five days and a half in the week, and in the other Courts four days. He held in his hand a table showing the amount of business done from 1781 to the present time, the result of which showed that from that period (1781) there had been, with two exceptions, a continual decrease in the number of causes brought before those Courts; so that now the business little exceeded one-half the amount at the former period. Another paper showed that at the end of each Session there was an arrear of causes left untried, sometimes amounting to as many as 477. In taking evidence before the Committees which had sat upon this subject great stress had been laid upon the additional duties said to be thrown upon these Courts by merging other courts into them. He begged the attention of the House, and particularly of the right hon. Gentleman, the First Lord of the Treasury, to what he was about to read. He was about to read the number of causes that had been tried in Scotland in the year 1842, with and without Jury, including the cases tried in the Courts of Session and the cases in the County Courts. This would show the estimation in which Jury trial in civil cases was held in Scotland. The number of these cases tried in the Court of Session, without Jury, in 1842, was 945, and those in the County Courts 19,611, making together 20,556; while the causes tried with Jury all over Scotland during the same period was thirty-six, being exactly one cause tried by Jury in civil suits to 571 without Jury. Nor was this to be wondered at, when it was known that every such case, previously to its being sent before a Jury, took from two years to two and a half years in preparation, and that after the expiration of that period it might or might not be decided; but if decided, it would not be without an expense of from 500*l.* to 1,000*l.* on each side, or sometimes a larger amount. The average time that the whole of the Courts, speaking of the two divisions—the Courts of Session and the Courts of the Lord Ordinary—sat, was not more than about three hours a day. Another abuse, to which it was necessary to call attention, was the length of time occupied by the Jury Clerks in forming an issue before they went into Court. There was no Court so much detested by one class of the community, and dreaded by another, as the Court of Session, with the exception of the Court of Chancery, and that feeling did not now apply to the Chancery so much as formerly. The expenses of the Courts were very great: they cost on the average, including the Judges' and Secretary's salaries, 127*l.* a day. In 1839, the number of causes decided was 197, and the judicial charges, not including what was paid to counsel, was 91*l.* 11*s.* 2*d.* a cause. In another division there were 164 causes, at an expense of 87*l.* 13*s.* 7*d.* a cause; and these vast sums came out of the pockets of the English and Irish people much more than those of the people of Scotland. The cost of the Judges, with their private secretaries, was 42,700; the clerks of the Court 17,000*l.* The other charges of the Court he had not been able to distinguish. The total amount of cash, independent of the pensions to retired Judges, was 79,253*l.* 11*s.* 2*d.* annually. The Lord Advocate's office cost 17,300*l.*; the County Courts, wherein thirty Sheriffs presided, was 16,500*l.* being at the rate of 55*l.* Then there were fifty deputy Judges, named by the Judges-in-Chief, who cost 20,000*l.*, and the whole amount of the Judicial Establishment in Scotland was not less than 150,000*l.* He believed that if they travelled from one end of Scotland to the other, and asked the opinion of any one but a professional person, it would be found that there was not a person but was dissatisfied and disgusted with the whole conduct of these Courts. In Scotland the Judges could not get it out of their heads that they were not superior to everybody else, and also, that they were seated in the Parliament, at the Parliament House at Edinburgh (which he said God forbid they should ever see again!), and that they, too, had the power of making laws. The Lord Chancellor of England was the real Judge of Scotland; for whilst the number of appeals to the Lords this year from England was twenty-seven, from Ireland the unusual number of twenty, those from Scotland were forty-five. He observed that the present Government had had the patronage of three Judges. They had appointed Mr. Hope, Mr. Robertson, and Mr. Wood. The first was confessed a most injurious appointment, for Mr. Hope had been put over the heads of his superiors, and made Lord Justice Clerk, when some of his seniors were particularly entitled to the office. As to Mr. Robertson's appointment, it was a judicious one, and Mr. Wood's was a first-rate appointment. There were only four leading counsel now at the Scotch bar, and as these learned gentlemen were frequently engaged elsewhere, the result was the continued stoppage of the business of the Courts. There was another department of the Administration of Justice which was intimately connected with this subject, viz., the County Courts. It was the duty of the Judges to frame rules for the improvement of these Courts, and it was also the duty of the Sheriffs to report from time to time to Parliament such improvements and alterations as might be made in the rules for regulating the business in those Courts. He believed, however, that those duties for several years had been neglected. It was true, however, that Scotland was not alone in respect to the abuses of the County Courts. By a paper he held in his hand, it appeared that in the County Courts of England even greater abuses existed than those of which he complained in regard to the Scotch Courts. He was sorry to say that he had little hope, notwithstanding all he had said in the House year after year, that any improvement would take place. With regard to the notice he had placed on the Paper, he had been informed by the right hon. the Speaker that the first part of it was irregular. He was not aware of the fact when he gave the notice, and he hoped the House would accept his apology for the irregularity, and allow him to submit the second part of the Motion, viz.—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to exercise the powers which are reserved to Her Majesty, in the Act 2 and 3 Victoria, c. 36, as to extending the sittings of the Court of Session, 'if there shall be arrears of business in the said Court,' 'or, the state of the business otherwise may require it;' and in virtue of the said power so reserved to the Crown, that her Majesty will graciously see proper to command that the sittings of the said Court of Session shall be extended by two months in each year, or by such other period as to Her Majesty shall seem more proper."

The Motion was not seconded, but

Sir J. Graham rose to say a word on the point of order. As the hon. Member had admitted his error, and apologised for it, he referred to the circumstance merely to express that which he was sure was the general wish of the House, that the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair would watch their proceedings, and not allow to be placed on the Notice Paper any reference to any speech or statement made by any Member of that House with a view to found a Motion upon it. Such a practice, were it to prevail, would be most inconvenient and intolerable. With regard to the subject-matter of the hon. Member's Motion, as there was, in point of fact, no Motion before the House, he could not, by the rule of the House, offer any observations in reply to the statements which had been made. He thought it right, however, to allude to one point, and although in doing so, he was not strictly regular, he hoped the House would, under the circumstances—the character of a learned Judge being attacked—bear with him for a few moments. The hon. Gentleman had commented with great severity on the conduct of the Lord Justice Clerk of Scotland. Now, that right hon. and learned Judge had received the highest possible proof of the estimation in which he was held by the Scottish Bar, in being unanimously elected Dean of the Faculty, notwithstanding the strong party feeling which at that time prevailed. He felt bound also to bear that testimony in favour of that right hon. and learned Judge which was the result of his (Sir J. Graham's) own experience. In the administration of criminal justice in Scotland, it was his duty to hold frequent official intercourse with the Lord Justice Clerk. It was his duty to refer to that right hon. and learned Lord all criminal cases submitted to Her Majesty for the exercise of the prerogative of mercy, for him to report upon them. In England, as the House would be aware, it was the duty of the Home Secretary to hold similar communications with the Judges, and he must say, though it might appear in some degree invidious to others, that he received no such carefully prepared and complete reports from any other Judge as those which were transmitted to him by the Lord Justice Clerk, and it was impossible for him to speak in terms too high of the manner in which that Judge performed his important functions. He really believed that the opinion entertained by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Wallace), as to the merits of the learned judicial Officer, if the opinions of the whole of Scotland could be collected, would be found almost as singular, as his opinion must appear to be in regard to the Motion he had placed on the Paper.

IMPRISONMENT OF DON CARLOS.]

Lord J. Manners, in rising to bring forward the motion of which he had given notice, said he begged leave to assure the House that it was not without much hesitation that he rose to bring before its notice a subject in which many of its Members took little interest, and imagined England to have little concern. Indeed, if he saw any prospect of otherwise obtaining justice for the illustrious object of the Address which he was about to move, he should not do so, but, after availing himself in vain of every casual opportunity that had presented itself to make known, and to protest against the injustice committed by the French—alas, that he should have to add, with the consent of the English Government—seeing year after year roll by with that injustice unabrogated, and that Prince still a prisoner, he could no longer hesitate to adopt the most decided course that was open to him, and flying from petty tyrants to the Throne, he asked that House to join with him in imploring Her Majesty's gracious intercession in behalf of the Royal victim of liberal oppression. It was, he was well aware, a matter of no ordinary occurrence—of no ordinary delicacy—for that House to ask the Sovereign to interfere for the purpose of procuring the liberation of a Prince confined by one of the Sovereign's allies; but there were instances and authorities enough to justify such a course where the character and honour of the country demanded it; and, calling for a moment to the recollection of the House the Motion of General Fitzpatrick on the imprisonment of La Fayette and his companions in 1794, he should endeavour to establish the fact, that the honour of England had been and was intimately involved by assisting, abetting, and, lastly, by insisting upon the detention of Don Carlos at Bourges. La Fayette, then, and his friends, flying from their own troops, took refuge in Prussia, and were by the King of Prussia committed to a fortress, as enemies with whom he was at war, as the causers of all the horrors which had occurred, and the dreadful hostilities by which those horrors were to be prolonged and avenged. England at that moment was at peace with Prussia, at peace with France. England had neither directly nor indirectly procured the flight of La Fayette, nor his consequent imprisonment; but so strong was the feeling of indignation excited in this country by the apparent injustice of the deed, that every admirer of what was then fondly imagined to be liberty, advocated English interference for them, who, be it remembered, up to the moment of their flight, had borne arms against the country they fled to—which was not Don Carlos's case—and General Fitzpatrick moved an Address to the King with that intent. That Address was not carried; no; but he grounded his claim for their support on the very reasons which were adduced for that defeat. Mr. Pitt, in opposing that Motion opposed it on the broad, intelligible English ground, that England being altogether unconcerned with the transaction, could not be called upon to interfere, and proceeded to assert that England could have no sympathies whatever with the men or with their principles. Mr. Pitt said,—

“The simple question is, has any case been made out whereby this country is implicated, so as to be bound to interfere from motives of justice, honour, or policy?”

Clearly admitting, that if such a case had been proved, he would not have opposed the Motion. With this allusion to the precedent of 1794, he should proceed to show that we were bound from motives of justice and honour to interfere with this unjust and dishonouring captivity. Policy, for the present, he left out of the question, because he ventured to believe that if justice and honour demanded the adoption of a certain course, true policy would not be found opposing it. He asserted that, on motives of justice we were compelled to take the step he proposed. He said emphatically and sincerely, that this detention was opposed to justice; there was the punishment—punishment as severe as miscreants in this country who shoot at their Sovereign are subjected to. Where was the crime? What crime is alleged against this State prisoner? What offence is laid to his charge? Where are the proofs? Where the tribunal? Where the verdict? The punishment they knew, and heard of; the crime which should have occasioned and justified it existed not. The noble Lord opposite, indeed, when last Session a debate occurred on this subject, seemed to insinuate, for he did not broadly state it, that it was just to incarcerate Don Carlos, because, when, after the Convention of Evora Monte, he resided in this country, it was on an understanding that he should not disturb the peace of the Peninsula, and that, as he had departed from that understanding, France and England had now a right to shut him up in prison. He could find no stipulation of the sort in that Convention; but, be that as it might, he could well enter into and appreciate the feelings of a gallant man, who believing himself and his children to be defrauded of a Crown, such as that of chivalrous Spain, by an intrigue the basest and most disgraceful that the annals of any country could afford, who, guiltless of all intrigues himself, suddenly finds a people whom he loved, because he knew them, and who loved him because they knew him, proving their hearty gratitude and zealous loyalty by rising in their might to vindicate his claim, and to place him by their Spanish swords and their unbought exertions on the Throne of Spain. He said he could conceive the feelings of a gallant man at such a crisis, and he could not conceive such a man acting otherwise than Don Carlos then did. But, even admitting the noble Lord to be right, and he was almost loth to deprive him of that one slender apology for his Spanish policy, the Ministers now in power could not use that justification; by a respect for their own character they were debarred from it. As long as the war so commenced was continued, as long as the gallant efforts of Spaniards maintained a struggle against the combination of Jews and stockjobbers, and legions from Algeria and the Isle of Dogs—so long did they, as the leaders of the great Tory party in England, applaud their efforts and vindicate the cause of Don Carlos. Therefore, whatever right the noble Lord might have to press this musty antecedent argument into his service, they who now administered the affairs of this country, they who now formed the majority of this House, might not avail themselves of it; and, he proceeded to ask, if there being, by the unanimous opinion of this party, no antecedent pretext, however flimsy, to justify the injustice of which he complained, any subsequent event had occurred to render that just which otherwise was admitted to be unjust? The whole conduct of the war which ensued was so intimately bound up with the honour of this country, that for the moment he passed it by, and contented himself with asserting in the most broad distinct manner possible, that no act was committed by Don Carlos, under provocations the most urgent, and injuries the most unprovoked, during the course of the war, which could for a moment be allowed to justify our conduct towards him. Well, then, if nothing previous to the commencement of that war, if nothing during its continuance could be held to justify his detention at Bourges, was it alleged that the terms on which he entered France, or his conduct since, afforded that justification? He maintained, that, on the contrary, the terms on which he entered France warranted him in expecting a very different treatment from that which he was experiencing. He was told he would be received as an unfortunate Prince. He knew what an interpretation an Assembly of English Gentlemen would give to such a phrase. Don Carlos did not know, could not anticipate, what such words meant, when used by a King of the French. You, Sir, and this House, would imagine that sympathy, respect, and freedom, were the portion of unfortunate Princes. Don Carlos too late discovered that insult, hardships, and imprisonment, was the measure meted out to him by Liberal Governments. But what had been his conduct since, against all right, contrary to his just expectations, against the usages of civilised monarchical Europe, he was incarcerated? He might naturally and fairly have retaliated by intriguing from his prison, and thus made himself a thorn in the side of his oppressors; and no one could deny that opportunities in plenty for such a course had been presented to him. When Queen Christina hazarded the peace of Spain, and risked even the life of her daughter, in her vain endeavour to overthrow Espartero, were no overtures made to Bourges, and to those loyal spirits who still looked, and who still do look thither for orders? It was notorious, that had

Don Carlos consented, had he merely permitted his faithful followers to act as they pleased, that attempt might have ended very differently; but, with that manly honesty which is his characteristic, he rejected all those offers, and by his express commands, his adherents to a man, he (Lord J. Manners) believed, took no part in the insurrection; nor would even the noble Lord pretend to assert, that in any of the subsequent revolutions which his policy had occasioned, Don Carlos had had any, the slightest, part. But what a contrast in the fate of those two personages! Queen Christina, avowedly to the knowledge of all Europe, the instigator of revolution and bloodshed—she, the sad Erinnys of her time—is now returning with regal pomp and elaborate procession to Madrid: Don Carlos who refused to join in her cruel schemes of ambition, still lingers a captive at Bourges,

"Aude aliquid brevibus Gyaris vel carcere dignum,

Si vis esse aliquis: Probitas laudatur et alget."

Need he to these reasons on which he denounced the incarceration of Don Carlos to be unjust, add the palpable truth, that Don Carlos was never at war with France, never at war with England, and that by the laws of France, by the common consent of all countries, a man who had never injured them, from whom they dreaded nothing, had a right to liberty; thus, then, he denounced the detention of Don Carlos to be unjust, and in the sacred name of justice, never invoked without success within these walls, he demanded his liberation. He had said that the honour of England was implicated in the manner in which the war was carried on and terminated, and he should now proceed to establish that a regard for that honour compelled them to interfere as he proposed. In the first place, the formation of the English Legion, contrary, as General Evans himself admits, to the opinion of the highest military authorities of the Kingdom (the late King, the Duke of Wellington, and the late Commander of the Forces), and which required an existing law to be repealed, was a direct infringement of neutrality and non-intervention, and bore an important, though not very honourable share in procuring the triumph of Liberal tyranny. It was clear that had the Legion not been planted on the Cantabrian coast, Don Carlos would long ago have been at Madrid; its action, if he might so say, was that of a drag-chain on his advance to victory; and thus, even had we interfered in no other way against him, the interference of that Legion, so often denounced by those now in power, would, to use Mr. Pitt's words, so implicate us as to bind us in honour to interfere for his liberation. But more dishonourable because less open, more injurious because less easily met, were the operations of our Navy and Marines during that period; with every wish to think and speak well of any service in which the soldiers and sailors of England were engaged, he said with regret, that from the moment our squadron arrived off the Cantabrian coast to the climax at Bergara, deceit, treachery, and double-dealing seemed to be written on the English flag. In the history of war or peace (he knew not which to call it—it was war without its glory, and peace without its blessings), no more disgraceful transaction was recorded than the conduct of our ships at the siege of Bilbao. For nearly two months, while the Carlists were beleaguering that city, under their guns, exposed to their batteries, lay two English brigs, peaceable, neutral spectators of the strife; strict neutrality was our profession, total immunity from danger was the result. Over and over again did the Carlist General forbear to take advantage of opportunities to harass the enemy, lest a casual shot might annoy the flag of neutral, passive England; and how was this confidence merited? How was this forbearance rewarded? When victory was, beyond all doubt, on the eve of crowning the Carlist arms, when Bilbao had already virtually surrendered, in the middle of the night did the boats belonging to those English ships carry over the reluctant General and his dispirited troops to an unexpected, undeserved success. A neutrality observed so long, so advantageous to the stronger nation, so wantonly, disgracefully, and perfidiously violated at the last, never was recorded before; and by the dishonour which that transaction attached to England, he asked them to vote for this Address. But did even this suffice?—were we satisfied with thus having sacrificed every title to a character for English fair play and honour? By no means; a year and a half went by; the Legion was no more, its cruelties, excesses, and injuries, were avenged, if not forgotten, and success, according to the official paper presented to that House, was as likely to incline to the one party as to the other; then again were our underhand intrigues put into requisition, and Lord John Hay, a Captain in the English 'navy, with the approbation of the English Government, consented to be the medium of communication between the traitor Maroto and Espartero; and he would beg the House to remark well what followed, because it showed how completely England was involved in all the disgrace which attached to the unjust detention of Don Carlos. Lord John Hay was the go-between—he did not use the word in an offensive sense, but in its literal meaning—the go-between of the traitor and Espartero; he revised the Articles of the Convention—he recommended this, he suggested that. Did he take care in arranging that honourable transaction, that the life of its Royal victim should be saved? Would it be believed that in a report to Lord Palmerston it is stated, apparently as a matter of congratulation, that the name of Don Carlos is not even mentioned in the articles of the Convention? Would to God that this were all; but let the House remember that some time previously to this the noble Lord had issued his positive injunctions to the Captains off the Cantabrian Coast that should Don Carlos apply to them for shelter, it should be refused him. Let the House bear these facts in mind, and say whether or not we are responsible for his flight into France and subsequent imprisonment. And thus, when after five years of underhand opposition, pitiful animosity, and dishonourable interference, we had brought Don Carlos to the desperate alternative of falling, without any guarantee for his life or that of his wife and child, into the hands of his cruel enemies, or seeking an asylum in a foreign country, by the farsighted malevolence of our Government we compelled him to take refuge in France. In every stage, therefore, of that series of events which ended in the captivity of Don Carlos at Bourges, we, the English people, had part; it was we who destroyed the liberties of the Basques; it was we who despoiled the Church in Spain; it was we who called into dread activity that revolutionary spirit which is still devastating Spain. Did he ask, then, implicated as we were in all this—did he ask them to restore freedom to the Basques, tranquillity to Spain, property to the Church? No; he contented himself with making a far humbler request. He asked them to restore to liberty and freedom that Prince, whom he had shown, by each and every step of that unjust policy, they had conducted to a prison, and by whose continued detention the honour of England is sullied. But if we had been so directly implicated in procuring the imprisonment of Don Carlos how had our responsibility been aggravated since? So intense was the hatred borne by the noble Lord opposite to that Prince whom he had injured, that one of the last acts of his official reign, when power was quickly departing from him, was to prevent the French Government doing a tardy partial justice to their victim. In June, 1841, it was reported to the noble Lord that it was not impossible that the French Government would set Don Carlos at liberty. The noble Lord instantly, with that intense love of liberty which always characterises liberalism, demanded, on the part of England, that Don Carlos should still be kept a prisoner. If, then, the noble Lord, could interfere with the King of the French to demand the perpetuation of injustice and oppression, was he not justified in asking the House to declare, on the part of England, that she reprobates that demand and denounces that oppression; Thus, to the best of his ability, he had laid before the House the grounds on which he maintained that this country was bound, to use Mr. Pitt's words, by motives of justice and of honour, to interfere in favour of Don Carlos. He had shown that it was our interference which lost him his crown—it was our interference that forced him to take refuge in France—it was our interference which deprived him of liberty—and lastly, and above all, it was our interference that now, after five years of a cruel, rigorous, and vindictive imprisonment, still detained him. Away with the cant and jargon of liberalism which would prate of the danger which might arise to the tranquillity of Spain from justice being done to them; had their imprisonment procured it? Had a regard for it compelled the French Government to imprison Queen Christina, or induced ours to shut up Espartero in the Tower? Could any one pretend to say that Spanish tranquillity, if there be such a thing apart from a legitimate Government, during the last four years, had not had far more to dread from Christina than from Don Carlos; for the last year, from the fêted of the Mansion-house than from the captive of Bourges? Yet did this regard for the tranquillity of Spain lay an embargo on the ex-Regent's movements, or induce our Ministers to show towards him any of those petty acts of discourtesy which a complaisance for the reigning dynasty of France dictated towards Henri V.? No; the City of London might feast Espartero, and do honour to the butcher of Cabrera's mother—Ministers might toast their speedy return to Spain, and drink confusion to the men who had supplanted them, but Don Carlos must be kept a prisoner—for the tranquillity of Spain. Away with such flimsy inconsistencies! Rather avow the real motive—proclaim it to the world that you detain Don Carlos, not because he has offended or injured you, not because he has offended or injured France—not because he has failed to bear his unjust captivity with heroic resignation—not because his liberty would be dangerous to the peace of Spain—but because he has ventured to oppose the tyrannical, sacrilegious spirit of Liberalism! This—disguise it as they would—was his real offence; this it was that made him odious to the present ruler of France; this it was that armed against him the noble Lord opposite and the rabble of Westminster, and this it was which made and still kept him a prisoner. Strange and honourable was the history of that Prince, strange and honourable were his consistent misfortunes. In his youth imprisoned in France for the crime of being born a Spanish Bourbon, in his old age the same cause had produced the same punishment. In 1808 Napoleon had the satisfaction of incarcerating Don Carlos at Vallencay, in 1841 his dust returns from St. Helena, and finds his former victim a prisoner at Bourges. So true it was that Liberalism was ever the same, ever false and tyrannical whether it be exhibited by Emperor, Citizen King, or Liberal Diplomatist. He turned from the heartless, cruel, and faithless Liberalism of the day, and asked the gentlemen of England to disavow all connection with it. Too long had they suffered the honour of Monarchical England to be prostituted at the shrine of Foreign Democracy; too long had they pandered to the jealous fears of every usurping dynasty; too long had they consented to act as gaolers for French and Spanish Liberalism; let them at last recover their proper position; let Spain, let Europe be told that they entered into no war against the principles of Legitimacy; let France be told they do not require her to detain one of their most consistent and virtuous exponents; but, rising to the height of our old dignity and former renown, let them vindicate the claim of England to the confidence of the old Monarchies of Europe; and, above all, let them now undo, so far as they can—for alas! they could not restore thousands to the homes and happiness of which they had deprived them—the wrong which they had committed towards a Prince who never injured this country—who never harboured an ungenerous thought against England—and whose continued detention, he believed in his conscience to be a foul insult to justice, and a still fouler dishonour to this country. He moved—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, representing to Her Majesty that the continued detention of Don Carlos and his family in a town belonging to Her Majesty's ally, the King of the French, is opposed to justice, and the honor of this country, and humbly praying Her Majesty to intercede with the Court of the Tuileries for their deliverance therefrom.”

Sir R. Peel said, he felt it to be his duty to express his hope that the House would not accede to the Motion of the noble Lord, and that it would not think it consistent with its duty to present an Address to Her Majesty representing

“That the detention of Don Carlos and his family in a town belonging to Her Majesty's Ally, the King of the French, is opposed to justice and to the honour of this country.”

What! “to justice and to the honour of this country”? The noble Lord proposed that the House of Commons of England should present an Address to Her Majesty, denouncing an Act of the French Government—an act of Her Ally the King of the French, and declaring that act to be inconsistent—not with the honour of the French Government—of the King of the French—but with the honour of this country. Although he opposed the Motion of the noble Lord, yet still he trusted that in opposing it, the noble Lord would not consider that he was devoid of those sentiments of natural sympathy with which every one must contemplate a Sovereign Prince in misfortune. No one could contemplate the present position of a member of the Illustrious

House of Bourbon without feeling that sympathy, and without wishing, whatever course policy might dictate, that that course might be reconcileable to the claims of humanity, and to a due consideration of the dignity of an unfortunate Prince. But he did deprecate, on great public principles, the idea of this House interfering in respect to the conduct of the French Government. This matter was brought under discussion in the French Chamber last year. A member of the French House of Peers then called its attention to the detention of Don Carlos. The peer asked these two questions of the French Government :—

“ Was the restraint imposed on Don Carlos imposed on him in consequence of obligations growing out of the Treaty of Quadruple Alliance? And was this restraint imposed on Don Carlos by the French Government, not because the Government of France thought that restraint politic or desirable, but at the instance and in consequence of the application of the Government of England? ”

The answer given to these questions was this :—

“ The Quadruple Treaty has ceased to exist, the object of that Treaty has been attained ; it is not, therefore, in consequence of any obligations arising from that compact that Don Carlos is put under restraint.”

In answer to the question whether the restraint was imposed at the instance of the English Government, the answer of the French Minister is—and he had in the original the statement of the organ of the French Government, distinctly stated :—

“ That the French Government is acting with regard to Don Carlos on views of French policy, and in consideration only of the interests of France.”

That Minister added also, on a similar question being again put to him that he would take no notice of debates which had passed upon the subject in the Parliament of England—it was sufficient for him to say that the detention of Don Carlos had its origin in the interests of France (dans les intérêts Françaises), and was justified by the laws of France. If this was true—if the French Government placed a person under restraint for the interests of, and according to the laws of France, would anybody think it desirable that they should present an Address to the Crown, calling upon it to interfere with the actions of the French Government, but, above all, that the House of Commons should stigmatise the actions of the French Government as “ opposed to justice, and to the honour of this country.” Yet that was what the noble Lord called upon the House to do. What was the position of Don Carlos in Bourges? The noble Lord stated that he was a prisoner—he represented him as a prisoner of war, detained under unnecessary and unjust restraints by the French Government, within a walled town. He thought the noble Lord was mistaken. In this country, certainly the law would not justify the Government in imposing restraint upon Don Carlos, or upon any foreigner. The Alien Act had expired, and he knew of no authority by which the Government of England could impose any restraint upon a foreigner not disobeying the laws of the country. But they must not infer that the law of France was the same as that of England in this respect. No restraint was placed upon Don Carlos, which was not justified, he apprehended, by the existing law of France : so said the French Minister. He stated that, although a person of exalted rank, Don Carlos was still a refugee. Pressed by the calamities and dangers of war, he had sought a refuge within the territory of France. He had claimed the hospitality of France, and that claim had been acknowledged. But there was a law in France, which enabled the Government of that country, when it tendered its hospitality, and admitted the claim preferred by the unfortunate—there was a law which empowered the Government to place foreign refugees under distinct superintendence and strict surveillance. Now, there were at present upwards of 12,000 refugees from Spain, who were receiving the rights of hospitality—at least so far as the protection was concerned within the territory of France. Many of the general officers who had taken part in the struggle upon the side of Don Carlos—Cabrera, he believed, as well as several other brave men of rank and distinction similarly circumstanced—were residing in France. Now, surely, it could be well conceived—considering the vicinity of Spain to France—considering that they were separated only by an imaginary boundary—that, while France conceded protection to unfortunate Spanish Refugees, it was absolutely necessary that, in order to prevent her territory being made the focus of intrigue against a neighbouring and friendly power to prevent it from being made a spot from which might be directed the cabals and the efforts of hostility; that that law of France, which enabled the Government to subject refugees to a most vigilant control, should be strictly, but, at the same time, most justifiably acted upon. The law of France, which subjects those parties to a certain degree of control, may be a law perfectly justifiable upon the first principles of equity. But we were not entitled to discuss the question of, whether it is equitable or not. It was enough for us that the law existed in France, and that the French Government had deemed it right to apply it to all to whom it was applicable indiscriminately—to the lowest as well as to the highest;—to the peasant Refugee as well as to Don Carlos. The French Government subjected him to a certain degree of restraint, not, as it had been said, upon the application, and at the instance of the English Government, but because they considered themselves justified in so doing, by the laws, as well as by the interests of France. What right had the House to interfere, and to address the Crown? What right had they to pronounce it inconsistent with the honour of England, that the French Government should exercise its own discretion in administering its own laws. By adopting such a course, they would be offering the French Government an example for it to interfere in our own internal policy; and how, he would ask, was it possible to respect the independence of a Government, if, because we thought that some person had—truly or not—some cause of grievance under another Government, that he was detained unjustly, or, at all events, in a manner not sanctioned by the laws of our country—if, because of all that, we called upon the Crown to interfere. To sanction such a procedure would involve the sanction of interference of the most dangerous kind—interference almost without a limit—and where the power interfered with was the weaker, perfectly destructive of the legitimate authority of the country. Suppose that the Address to Her Majesty should be carried—suppose that the French Government should decline to accede to it—suppose that Her Majesty should, in the first place, inform the Government of the King of the French, that their detention of Don Carlos was inconsistent with justice, and with the honour of England, might not and would not the reply be, “We care nothing about your consideration of your own honour; your honour is not to dictate our course in the advance of our interests, and in the administration of our laws; and in answer to your interference, we have only to return a peremptory denial of your request. Not only in consideration of our interests, but in consideration of other grounds we resist, and resent an interference with the independent exercise of our authority.” In what position would such an answer place the Government, and what might not grow out of it? Would they follow up proceedings, or acquiesce in the reply? What would be the position of the Foreign Secretary of England, when he stated to France, that the detention of a Refugee from another country was inconsistent with the honour of England? But at the same time, when he said that the French Government would not consent to justify their conduct in the face of the Chambers, by stating that it was pursued at the instance of England, he would add, that when he remembered the condition of France and of Spain, and the obligations mutually contracted by both countries, he must say, that he thought France was justified in appealing to the law which she could enforce against humble Refugees, to restrain a person whose power of disturbing the peace of Spain was so much greater than that of any other. Thus, then, although France had not adopted her policy at our instance, yet he could not say, looking at the state of Spain—how it had been so long torn by civil wars—how horrible was its condition—how unfit, under the present circumstances, for the exercise of great power—how party had been arrayed against party—how savage had been the warfare waged in it—how tremendous had been the attack made by the late civil contests on the liberties of Spain; looking at all these circumstances, he repeated, that if they asked him whether this new element of confusion should be allowed to proceed to Spain, there to light up the flames of civil war—he would reply, that the Government of France, from considerations of the tranquillity of Spain, and the interests of France should, if a law restraining foreign Refugees, existed, put it in force in the present case. He thought that a comprehensive consideration of the true and paramount interests of Spain, and not only of Spain, but of France, and of this country—wishing as both did for the restoration of constitutional government in Spain—but wishing most of all for the termination of those horrible civil conflicts which impeded the return of tranquillity and obstructed the advances of national prosperity; he repeated, that such a comprehensive consideration, induced him not to disapprove of any exercise of legitimate authority upon the part of France which might prevent the return to his country of Don Carlos. There was, they must consider, an infant Queen, just declared capable of sovereignty, whom this country and France had lately recognised, and the natural effect of the success of this Motion would certainly be to disturb the prospect of returning peace, were Don Carlos to be permitted—without any engagements on his part for his future behaviour, and with him all his adherents—to return to Spain. But it was unnecessary for him to go into these circumstances, for here was a French law, and the execution of a French law proposed to be interfered with. This was the leading principle of the proposition, and the principle on which he protested against the Motion, believing, as he did, that they could make no application to France of the kind which would not lead either to humiliation or to war. At the same time, he would express a hope now, as he had done before, that every attention would be paid to the comforts, and consideration made for the dignity of Don Carlos. Harsh acts of authority might be sometimes justified by considerations of policy; but nothing could justify any unnecessarily and personally harsh measures. Let them, however, recollect that Don Carlos was a member of the Bourbon family; and surely the presumption was, that the King of the French, himself a scion of that House, would treat Don Carlos with that respect and natural sympathy which might, under the circumstances, be expected; and that those considerations which must weigh with Sovereigns, would impart to that monarch that feeling which would make him seek to reconcile acts of public policy, with a sense of what was due to the dignity and the misfortunes of the captive. The only ground upon which they could possibly make any representation to France, was when they could withhold their approbation from the way in which Don Carlos was treated, in the case of any unnecessary and personal harshness being applied. Now, no man could view the position of Don Carlos with more sympathy than he did, but he could positively assert, that so far from being in prison, the unfortunate prince had free permission to go anywhere within four leagues of Bourges—that he had free permission to visit any house in the neighbourhood, and that the residence of the Archbishop had been offered to him, an offer which, had it been accepted, would have obviated the necessity of much of the restraint under which he was placed. It was painful for him to have to answer for any acts of the French Government; but still he was desirous that no unjust prejudice should attach to those acts—more particularly as they had been united in promoting the interests of the ruling family in France, who could have no wish for the detention of Don Carlos, or for subjecting him to the slightest personal restraint inconsistent with preventing him from exciting fresh disturbances in Spain. If, indeed, Don Carlos would give his engagement that he would go to some other part of Europe—if he would frankly state on the honour of a prince—and if he did so he was sure Don Carlos would honourably preserve his engagement—if he would state that he would abandon all thoughts of attempts to enter Spain, and would go to some part of Europe, where he could harmlessly enjoy his liberty, then he would say, that as far as this country was concerned, and he believed that so far as France was concerned, there could be no objection to such a course. He hoped that he had said enough to show, that whatever the House might think of the position of Don Carlos, nothing could be more contrary to precedent, or more dangerous, than to agree to an Address to Her Majesty of the nature proposed. He hoped that the Motion would not be pressed to a division; that they would not risk the present relations of amity between this country and France; that the noble Lord would not subject England to such a risk, because certainly a reply to a demand for the liberation of Don Carlos, must, as he said before, subject the country, on the part of France, to either humiliation or resentment.

Mr. Smythe said, that nothing in the world would induce him to support the Motion of the noble Lord did he believe, with the right hon. Baronet who had just spoken, that it was purely, solely, and exclusively a French question. As he had understood the right hon. Baronet, he said that the adoption of the course suggested by the noble Lord would involve the country in a most mischievous interference in the affairs of France. It appeared, however, that on a former occasion, upon a report reaching this country, that it was the intention of the French Government to release Don Carlos from imprisonment, England remonstrated with, and protested against, such a step being taken; and it was almost on the dictation of England that France had then acquiesced in the course which was then suggested on the part of this country. Such a report could not have been without foundation. Remonstrances were not addressed by Governments upon such reports as that of yesterday, that the Dublin had been blown up by a French squadron. He had a right, then, to assume, that there was something real in this report and that it had been the probable intention of France to release Don Carlos until the remonstrances of England prevented its so doing. He would, then, say, that no other Ministry in France, he would not call it a French Ministry, would have acquiesced in this most unwonted dictation. What had the English Government asked M. Guizot to do? To stultify and compromise, and degrade the free character of his country.. And what country was invited to this act of degradation? France! France, the foremost of the nations, who had fought the great battle of freedom of opinion, and who had conquered the great right of private judgment. Yet England insisted upon her persecuting freedom of opinion, and visiting the right of private judgment with penalties and prisons. He had been curious to hear upon what pretext this would be justified; upon what pretence they had sanctioned the continued imprisonment of him whom he was glad to hear the right hon. Baronet call "a Sovereign Prince." The pretence was, that it was imperative upon British Statesmen to prevent the introduction of any new element of discord into the Peninsula. But this argument, they should recollect, told with ten times as much force against Christina as against Don Carlos. No one could doubt, that she at least would be a new element of distractions and disturbances, and that in their motives and their object these would be more unworthy, because they could not be national, than any Don Carlos could promote. Christina was more French than the French Ambasador—she would be the cynosure of French adventure—the rallying point of French intrigue—the new Des Uraïns beneath the influence of whose intrigues the Pyrenees were again to disappear. Why, then, had not the Government protested the other day against her voyage?—

Because, it would be answered, Governments had one justice for the strong, and another justice for the weak; one justice for the poor, and another for the rich; one justice for Don Carlos — poor, disrowned, abandoned—and another for Queen Christina, the royal defaulter of unaccounted millions, and the protégée of the Tuileries. But, as they were thus determined to maltreat Don Carlos, as they were virtually his gaolers, they might as well become so in reality and in effect. They might thus have another candidate for the honours of Carrikerfergus; they might present the spectacle of a country which boasted her own freedom—the freedom of her every institution—persecuting with the most strict impartiality the extremes of all opinions,—the extreme of democracy on the one hand, and the extreme of absolutism on the other. But if they had no shame for these things, let them look at their interests. Was it their interest to disgust and make enemies of every party in the Peninsula? When a Spaniard saw these flourishing declarations of attachment for Spain on the part of British Statesmen, he might think of Madame de Sevigne's attachment to Provence, of which she said, that one would have liked Provence very well if there had been no Provençals. So, their Government might have liked Spain very much if there had been no Spaniards. Why, they had disgusted and made enemies alike of Moderado, Exaltado, and Carlist. The Moderados they had flung into the arms of France by their abetment of that series of outrages which began at La Granja and ended at Barcelona. The Exaltados, a more national party, a strong ally against French influence, they had abandoned and deserted. Epartero they had not had the courage to uphold, although he was the very type and symbol of English necessities and wants. There remained another national party — the Carlists — with their

Basque provinces, their peasantry, and their priests. Was it well that Louis Philippe should say to them, "It is not France, it is free England which is thus insulting and outraging Spain by the detention of a Spanish Infante?" Louis Philippe was perfectly aware of the value of such a fact. He knew that history sometimes repeated itself; that there was once a Charles, and a Bourbon, a common ancestor of Don Carlos and himself, who, relegated to this same city of Bourges, recovered his kingdom in spite of English arms and English influence. Such things might happen again in the person of Don Carlos or his son. Some military adventurer—of those now or hereafter high placed in Spain—might prefer the rôle of Monk to that of Espartero; and if so, why France would again have the advantage. In no possible contingency could they hope for a commercial treaty for any of those just claims so conducive to the interests of both countries. It was always to be the old story of Fontenoy over again. They were always to give France the first fire. But he knew he was speaking to ears that had been charmed by the voice of the charmer. He knew there was little chance of persuading the House, even as a matter of interest. If it was a question of property—a Northampton and Peterborough Railway Bill—he might hope for something; but in a question of mere justice like this, he knew the fate of his noble Friend's Motion. He would, however, even from that floor, make an appeal from them to that high person to whose hands the perpetration of this foul wrong was committed. He would beg him not to abet this harsh, this blind, this selfish policy. He would abjure him not to be indifferent to that fame which would soon be with other generations. He believed then, that when party heats had passed away, they would not echo the sneers of the right hon. Member for Duncannon. They would not taunt Louis Philippe with being a King of the Barricades. They would say, that at least, if he did not inherit the legitimacy of the Bourbons, he inherited the fairer portions of their character. They would add that he had given proof of signal military talent, and at as early an age as the great Condé. They would remember that he had suffered exile with as much fortitude and less stain to his honour than Francis I. They would bear in mind that he had ruled over a disunited people with as much skill, and scarcely less success, than Henry of Navarre. They would know that he had founded mighty works with a munificence second only to that of Louis XIV.; but, above all, they would record of him that he gave in himself and in his family an example of domestic happiness and unassuming worth which was looked for in vain among his ancestors, and to which there could only be a parallel in the English Contemporary Court. But, whilst they remembered that such were among the great and princely qualities of Louis Philippe, let them not also have it to say that these qualities were tarnished and obscured by a constant and cruel persecution of opinion. Least of all let them have an opportunity of declaring that, among his many victims, was that royal kinsman who, failing but two lives, was the head of his illustrious family—who had, like the French King himself, known poverty, and exile, and persecution; but who, unlike him so interpreted the obligations of an oath that he forebore to conspire against a Monarch, although that Monarch was not his benefactor, and who, therefore, had nothing to leave to his children but the inheritance of his misfortunes, and, it might be, the redressal of his wrongs.

Viscount Palmerston said, that he was desirous of making a few remarks on what had fallen from the noble Lord with reference to the affairs of Spain at the time that he (Viscount Palmerston) was connected with the Government of this country. The noble Lord had said, that Isabella was placed upon the Throne of Spain by an intrigue, and that Don Carlos was the legitimate heir. But there could be no doubt that, by the laws of Spain, by the will of her father and by the decision of the Spanish nation Isabella was the rightful Sovereign. The questions had been before fully discussed in that House. The use of the British Legion, and such aid as had been afforded by the British Fleet, had been given in pursuance of the Quadruple Treaty. The noble Lord who had brought forward this Motion, had said that the Carlists were for a long time ignorant that the British Squadron was to take part in the contest, and were taken by surprise when it did so, and he had given a picturesque description of some boats issuing forth in the darkness of the night, and firing on the unsuspecting troops of Don Carlos; but had the noble Lord ever read the Quadruple Treaty, and the additional Articles, in which it was distinctly promised, that the British Navy should aid the cause of the Queen of Spain. The noble Lord could not be ignorant of what our engagements were under that Treaty. The terms of that Treaty were plain and open to every one, and nobody could justly plead ignorance of them. The noble Lord had done the late Government the honour to say, that they had faithfully and successfully fulfilled those engagements. The noble Lord had said, that it could not be doubted, that the interference of the British Government was the great agency by which the cause of the Queen had triumphed over the cause of Don Carlos. He accepted the compliment, which was just, as far as regarded the intentions of the Government; but the noble Lord carried his assertion too far, for though the assistance of England was a most important and efficient aid to the cause of the Queen, nothing but the enthusiasm of the Spanish people in favour of that cause, could have rendered it finally triumphant. There was no doubt that the late Government had been sincerely zealous. It was true that they had a naval force on the coast, but that force and the few marines they had with it would not have been sufficient to turn the contest in favour of the Queen, had not the majority of the Spanish people supported her cause. The noble Lord had spoken in a manner not very fitting of the conduct of British officers employed on that service, and he had talked of Lord John Hay as "a go-between." It was true that the noble Lord had said, he did not mean any offence in using that term, but if the noble Lord did not mean offence, why did he not make use of the term "mediator," which was a proper English word, and one which correctly described the capacity in which Lord John Hay acted. It was due to Lord John Hay to say, that he ably and well discharged his duties as a British officer, and successfully executed the instructions which he had received. When the noble Lord had informed them that Lord John Hay, by his mediation in the Basque Provinces, had contributed to put an end to a war marked by atrocities and cruelties greater than had ever stained the annals of civil war in modern times, he (Viscount Palmerston) considered, that it was an act to which that gallant Officer would ever look back with the greatest pride, and to which his country would bestow their unqualified approbation. The noble Lord had censured the conduct of the late Government in having, at the time when Don Carlos was in Spain, given orders to the British ships off the coast of Spain not to receive him on board in case he demanded their protection. He avowed that they had done so by British interference. Don Carlos had been rescued when he was on the point of falling into the hands of Rodil; from the fate that threatened him in Portugal. He had been hospitably received by a British officer on board a British ship, and conveyed to the shores of this country, where every attention was paid to him by the British Government during his stay, and could it be forgotten, that the way in which Don Carlos had repaid that generous treatment was by issuing the Durango decree, and by ordering to be put to death, in cold blood, gallant soldiers our fellow-countrymen, taken bravely fighting on the field of battle, he (Viscount Palmerston) would have been ashamed of himself if, after such a base return for the kindness of this country, Don Carlos should again have been allowed to shelter himself under the protection of the British flag. Instead of feeling it a reproach, that such an order had been issued, he (Viscount Palmerston) thought, that he had only discharged his duty towards brave British subjects who had engaged in the British Legion, not only by the formal consent of the Sovereign, but, with the encouragement of the British Government. So much upon that subject. The noble Lord had said, that the British Government had interfered afterwards, when Don Carlos entered France, to prevent the return of Don Carlos to Spain. The noble Lord, of course, alluded to the communications that had taken place in 1837. Certainly the British Government thought, that it would not be consistent with that regard which both Governments had for the internal tranquillity of Spain to allow Don Carlos to leave France, unless under an engagement, that he would not return to Spain, and again light up in that country the flames of civil war. But it was not the intention of the French Government to set Don Carlos at liberty even without any interference on our part, and he was bound to say, that they did not adopt the course they did out of any deference to the wishes of England, but because they felt, that it would be for the interest of France herself, that he should not be allowed to return to disturb the tranquillity of Spain. It was upon a like principle that France had acted originally in concluding the Treaty into which she had entered with respect to the affairs of Spain and Portugal.

Now, with respect to the present Motion, he agreed that it would be a most unbecoming thing, that this Government should state to a foreign Government that the honour of the British Nation required that something should be done which it depended entirely on that foreign Government to do. He could not conceive anything more absurd, more undignified, than that our Government should say to another Government, "Our honour requires that you should do so and so." Why they would answer, "You are certainly the best judges of your own honour, but with that we have nothing to do. We are however the best judges of our own interests—look after your own honour and we will mind our own interests." They would either have to submit to a humiliating answer of this kind, or their demand must be enforced by arms, and they would be compelled to go to war for that which was not sufficient to call for such an alternative. The noble Lord had urged upon the right hon. Baronet the propriety, that Don Carlos should be treated with that consideration, which was due to a person brought up as a member of a Royal family—with high expectations which had been disappointed—and who, instead of sitting upon a Throne which he had been taught to expect, was now subjected to that restraint which belonged to the condition of a refugee in a foreign country. Undoubtedly this situation was one which ought to be viewed with every possible indulgence. He agreed with the right hon. Baronet in the hope—he would say the confident hope, that the French Government not only would, but did, observe in their treatment of Don Carlos, every degree of indulgence suitable to his condition, and compatible with the single point of preventing his return to Spain. He had no doubt, that if even now, Don Carlos would pledge his word of honour—a pledge which he was sure he would not break—that, if he was set at liberty, he would not return to Spain; he had no doubt, that if that promise was solemnly given, his detention would cease, and he would be at liberty to go to any other part of Europe which he might think fit to choose for his residence. But, it was understood, that so far from giving any of these assurances, Don Carlos would not surrender his claims in favour of his own son, and that if he was set free from restraint at the present moment, there was every reason to believe that he would return immediately to Spain, and that unhappy country, now torn by parties, would be still further convulsed by that additional element of disturbance. The noble Lord, in his speech, implied that England ought to support in Spain that party, and that party alone, which was favourable to British interests. Now, that was to suppose, that the interests of this country in Spain were identified with some particular party in Spain. Now, this was not the policy of the late, and he believed he was correct in thinking, that it was not the policy of the present Government. The only party which it was the interest of the British Government to support in Spain was the Spanish nation. They had no interest to carry in Spain by supporting one division of the country more than another. The interest of England was, that the Spanish nation should be strong, independent and prosperous. What they wanted was, that Spain should be a strong and substantial State, and an element of the balance of power in Europe. They had no party interest to maintain in Spain. The interest of England was to maintain whatever party was best capable of supporting and maintaining the real independence of the Spanish nation. As to supporting one party rather than another in the hope of getting a better commercial Treaty he thought, that any petty object of that kind would be unworthy of their consideration. The wise and proper policy of this country was to support in Spain the perfect independence of the Spanish nation. That was the only wise policy to be pursued, and such policy was generous as well as wise, and must in the end be successful.

Mr. B. Cochrane said, that he was happy to hear the last words that had fallen from the noble Lord—he was happy to hear the opinions he had just expressed as to the policy that would be adopted towards Spain, and he (Mr. Cochrane) could only say, that he could not see how those declarations could be made consistent with the policy that had been pursued by the noble Lord. The noble Lord had referred to some observations that had fallen from his noble Friend who introduced the Motion with respect to Lord J. Hay. He was sure that those observations could have had no relation to the conduct of Lord J. Hay, personally, but to those who gave the orders which

Lord J. Hay had merely fulfilled. The noble Lord (Lord Palmerston) had moreover said, that the time when Lord J. Hay interfered, the feelings of the country was in favour of the Queen, but if the papers that were before the House were true, he did not see how that statement was consistent with the noble Lord's own correspondence with that officer. This correspondence extended from the time when Lord J. Hay went to Spain, until the period when he interfered with Maroto in that foul act of treachery, in that foul treason which Maroto had perpetrated. He found that Lord J. Hay, writing to the noble Lord on the subject of the state of Spain, in the summer of 1839, distinctly stated—

“At this time parties are so equally balanced in Spain, that it would be very difficult to say what would be the result of the existing contest, or how long that contest might continue.”

There was another point of the noble Lord's speech which he wished to notice. The noble Lord had stated that he thought that if Don Carlos was set at liberty, he would act like a man of honour. Now, he was glad to hear that declaration coming from the noble Lord, because he had heard it stated by some hon. Gentlemen that, on one occasion, Don Carlos had forfeited his personal honour. He was glad to hear it now stated, on the authority of the noble Lord, that if Don Carlos was now liberated on the faith of his personal honour that he would not violate that pledge. The noble Lord had said that he was sure Don Carlos would not. In former years he (Mr. Cochrane) had heard declarations that representations had been made with respect to the treatment of Don Carlos, and that the consequence was, that his treatment had been much improved. He had been lately at Bourges and he thought that it was the best way to have a personal communication with Don Carlos himself upon the subject, and the condition of that Prince, as His Royal Highness described it to him, was worse than it had been before. One of the articles agreed upon between Maroto and Espartero was that Don Carlos was to be treated as an Infanta of Spain. Now what, did they think, was the allowance granted him? Why, 15,000 francs per year, a little more than 600*l.* a-year of our money—irrespective of the rent of a House, and this was the whole of the expense which was incurred on his account. He was lodged in a most miserable room, and he believed that the whole accommodation of the Prince consisted of three rooms for himself. It had been asserted that he might ride about to the distance of four leagues from Bourges. It was true that he might, but then he was followed by gens d'armes. Wherever he went there were four gens d'armes and two agents of police to follow him and watch his movements. He had heard that during the five years which Don Carlos had been shut up in that place, he had never been allowed to enter one house in the town. Last year, when he and the noble Lord visited Don Carlos at Bourges, they had been allowed to enter his apartments at once, but this time they were obliged to obtain permission from the authorities in the town before they could see him. The feeling of Don Carlos was, that the manner in which he was treated there was sanctioned by England. He was sure that the right hon. Baronet would do his best to ameliorate his condition, but the feeling of Don Carlos was, that both the French and English Governments were leagued to keep him in his present state. Now, it must be remembered, that when Napoleon was sent to St. Helena the expense annually to this country was between 12,000*l.* and 20,000*l.* a-year, and surely this was not the occasion in which miserable motives of economy were to operate, and allowance of this kind was to be doled out to one who was not only a Prince of the Blood in Spain, but who was also a relation of the present King of France. There had not been one insurrection, nor one state of excitement in Spain that had not been promoted by the means of French intrigue. Christina, by the aid of foreign intervention had been placed on the Throne of Spain, and she might have secured peace in Spain. But her Government was induced by French intrigue, to make war on her municipalities; Calatrava was succeeded by Espartero; then came another French intrigue, headed by Diego Leon, and others, in which the palace was entered and invaded, to very near the apartments of the Queen, until Espartero, with that gallantry that distinguished him, whatever might be his faults, had put down that outbreak, and arrested the outrage. There had been another insurrection last year, which had been better managed than the former, as only a few taverns had been bombarded, and the result of this last insurrection was, that Espartero had been turned out of Spain, and Narvaez become almost absolute. Then Olozaga became Prime Minister of Spain, but Olozaga was turned out of office and out of Spain on some absurd allegations, and they had at length the Ministry of Gonzales Bravo, ex-editor of the Satirist of Spain, and now they had Queen Christina returned back to Spain, not with the Crown jewels, but no doubt with a great deal of judicious and delicate advice from France. The whole history of the policy of France towards Spain, from the time when the Bourbon family first entered that country from the time when Louis Quatorze made use of that remarkable expression, "There is now an end to the Pyreness"—from that time to the present—whether under the Monarchy—under the Consulate, or under the Empire—the whole policy of France with respect to that country had had but one object—to make Spain a province of France. Well, Louis Philippe had been placed on the Throne of France—and his object seemed to be to overturn dynasties, and to put down what he appeared to consider to be the mischievous and traitorous doctrine of National Sovereignty. It was not his intention to enter much into the subject, but many who were refused the support of Governments in the present day had been respected in the olden time. He would say, that let them look around Europe, and see how few of those who were respected in the olden time now enjoyed that respect and support to which they were entitled. It was the interest of the King of the French to advocate his own opinions—but still he ought to recollect that as there had been great changes, so other great changes might still happen. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dungarvon when he said that the Crown of the "King of the Barricades was not established either on the principles of legitimacy or on the principles of democracy." He should recollect that the Duc de Reichstadt and the Duc de Bourdeaux had been born under circumstances not less glorious, and had been surrounded in their early years by courtiers not less obsequious than the youthful Members of the present Family of France. One of these Princes died in exile, and the other was now a wanderer about Europe, and whose misfortunes did not render him secure of a hospitable retreat even in England. Therefore, who was to say that where such great changes had happened, there might not be some further changes still? He would ask the House and the country to consider the conduct of those who endeavoured to reconcile inconsistent and discordant principles. The right hon. Baronet supported Christina in Spain and Espartero in London. At the time that he acknowledged Espartero he sent a Minister to Madrid, and he explained this on the principle, that he recognised Espartero as de jure Regent of Spain, whilst he recognised the Government to which he accredited a Minister as the de facto Government of Spain. Well, then, why not apply the same principle to the case of the Duc de Bordeaux, and, while they admitted the present King of France to be the de facto King of that country, why not acknowledge the Duc de Bordeaux as the de jure King of France? For his (Mr. Cochrane's) part, he could not understand that sort of Toryism which could attempt to combine the support of the principles of legitimate monarchy with the support of the principles of democracy. That was not the Toryism of the olden time. That was not the Toryism that was understood when Mr. Pitt was alive, and that great man never acknowledged Napoleon to be the Emperor of France, and our blood was shed, and our treasure expended, and our energies exerted, under the guidance of Mr. Pitt, in support of the principle of legitimacy. It was the duty and the interest of a great country like this to encourage and maintain a high public morality. He had witnessed a strange scene the other day in the French Chambers, when the Prime Minister of France uttered the words "moralité publique." There was not one man who heard them, whether upholder of the Empire, of the Restoration, or of the Usurpation, who did not receive the expression with contemptuous cries. He wished to see this country maintain a high public morality, but where were they to look for the high public morality of former days? He found that in February 1830, his Majesty came to Parliament, and declared in his Speech from the Throne, that his relations with Foreign Powers, and amongst others Most Christian France were uninterrupted, and at the end of that same Session the Prime Minister of that day came and informed the House that the elder branch of the Bourbons had ceased to reign in France, but that that event would not lead to any change in our diplomatic relations with that country. Now, if the people of France by their free will, placed the Duc de Bourdeaux on the Throne of France, and the people of Spain placed Don Carlos or his son upon the Throne of Spain, would not the British Government acknowledge them? He believed that they would, and he believed that they would do so for this good reason, that there was great virtue in success, and that misfortune was generally disregarded. He would say, in conclusion, that it was a dangerous principle in our own country to talk so much of revolution. He thought it would be better to conceal from the people the basis on which these modern Thrones were founded, because a generation of men might rise up stronger than the present generation and say that their idea was in favour of national sovereignty, and that the people ought to have a sovereignty for themselves. He had spoken warmly—perhaps too warmly—but he did so because he spoke on behalf of a Prince who was unfortunate, and who, if he were not unfortunate, but successful, they would, he was sure, have been delighted to honour.

Sir C. Napier regretted that he was not present when the noble Lord brought forward his Motion; for he would have been glad to hear the noble Lord's reasons for taking up the case of Don Carlos. He thought the noble Lord could not be acquainted with the atrocities Don Carlos had committed in the north of Spain, or he would have been the last man to wish for his release from prison, or, rather, from a comfortable retirement. He believed the career of Don Carlos was pretty well known. When Don Ferdinand wished his daughter to be acknowledged as his legal successor, Don Carlos, by stealth, or without permission, took up his residence in Portugal. After the Cortes had taken the oaths of allegiance to Don Ferdinand's daughter, Don Carlos was invited to return, and take the same oaths; and, if he did not think proper to do so, a frigate was sent to Lisbon to convey him to Italy. Don Carlos had promised the Spanish Minister not to leave the place where he then was; but he broke his promise and went to Cintra, where he met Don Miguel, who had quitted his headquarters to meet him. After a short interview Don Miguel—who did not wish the circumstance of the conference to be known—returned to his head-quarters, unaccompanied by his staff, and in a naval uniform. Don Carlos then went to the frontier of Spain, where an army under General Rodil was collected; he thought, no doubt, to play a great part, and advanced towards the frontier with a small escort, but the Spaniards would have nothing to do with him, and with some difficulty he retired to the interior of Portugal. After the destruction of the Miguelite fleet before Oporto, and the occupation of Lisbon, Don Carlos still remained in the interior of Portugal. During the winter, when it was uncertain which party might be successful, Don Carlos endeavoured, under various pretexts, to introduce a Spanish force into Portugal. Don Carlos joined Don Miguel, and in a short time afterwards the insurrection in Portugal was repressed. A ship was then sent to the coast of Portugal to receive Don Miguel, and, with great difficulty, he contrived to embark, and was rescued from his perilous situation. At this time, a Frenchman attached to Don Carlos, the Baron Roncesvalles, wrote to Sir W. Parker, the British Admiral, on the part of Don Carlos, praying for an interview. The request was granted, and an interview took place secretly, on board the flag-ship. The Admiral and the British Minister fell into the snare which had been laid for them. Don Carlos professed his wish to go to Italy, but the Admiral and the Minister told him he must go to England, and that was just what he wanted. Don Carlos was asked to give a pledge, but he refused to do so; and, in this case, therefore, he was free from the charge of having broken his word. There was not, however, any doubt that he succeeded in bamboozling our Minister. He said at the time, that Don Carlos ought not to have been received on board a British man-of-war; there ought to have been no interference either on the part of the British or of the French Government—if the French Government did then interfere, of which he was not certain; but, at all events, Don Carlos ought not to have been allowed to quit this country until the decision of the Allied Powers was known. Don Carlos was, then, embarked on board the Donegal, without having given any pledge; he was brought to this country; the then existing Government again wished him to give a pledge, but he declined. He was allowed to live quietly in England; but the Government little knew what a cunning fellow he was. In fourteen days after his arrival in this country, Don Carlos was across the Channel; and in a few days afterwards he was in the Basque provinces. Did the hon. Member wish Don Carlos to return again to Spain? Did the hon. Gentleman remember how much blood Don Carlos had been the cause of shedding, in a useless attempt to become the Monarch of a people who did not wish to have him for a Sovereign? It was true Don Carlos was popular in the Basque provinces, but would any hon. Gentleman assert, that he was popular in any other part of Spain? Did not Don Carlos send 3,000 or 4,000 men under a very active and experienced General, who went throughout Spain, plundering every province they visited, laughing at the Queen's troops, and who afterwards returned with their plunder to the Basque provinces, where they were ill received by their master? It was known that an army of English auxiliaries thought proper to enlist themselves against Don Carlos. He (Sir C. Napier) considered this a very improper interference; and he certainly thought, that English troops were generally the worst auxiliaries to be found anywhere. Don Carlos issued a Decree that every prisoner taken should be put to death. Had hon. Gentlemen opposite never heard of the Durango Decree? Not only was this order given, but it was carried into effect. Did the English auxiliaries retaliate? He defied hon. Gentlemen opposite to show that General Evans, who commanded the English auxiliaries, had ever issued an order, or even given a hint, that prisoners taken from the party to whom he was opposed should be put to death. He believed, that if Don Carlos had fallen into the hands of General Evans, he would have been treated with every consideration and respect; while if General Evans had been taken by Don Carlos he might have anticipated far different treatment. Lord John Hay had been mentioned; and he (Sir C. Napier) must say, that he considered the conduct of that noble Lord throughout had not only been that of a brave and excellent Officer, but also of an admirable diplomatist. Lord John Hay had, in fact, conducted the whole business, and though, as he (Sir C. Napier) believed, that gallant Officer was a Conservative in politics, the Government had such confidence in him, that he was selected by them to discharge this duty, and he fulfilled it to the entire satisfaction not only of the noble Lord (Lord Palmerston), but of the Conservative party, who were opposed to the then Government. He conceived, that too much credit could not be given to Lord John Hay for his conduct; and he was astonished that a man who had rendered such extraordinary services remained without any reward from the Government, although an extensive promotion of the Order of the Bath had taken place. Lord J. Hay sent to the Government a list of Officers who had distinguished themselves under his orders, and whom he recommended for promotion, but he asked nothing for himself. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. B. Cochrane) had complained that in France Don Carlos received only 15,000*l.* a-year and his house-rent. Who was to give him an increased allowance? Could he expect it from the English Government? Could a man who sanctioned the most horrid murders under the Durango Decree expect anything from the English Government? He conceived, that the British Government would act most unjustifiably if they made any provision for him. If Don Carlos had a claim upon any one, he conceived that it was upon his relations of the Bourbon family; and he certainly thought they would evince their liberality by making him an allowance in conformity with his dignity, always having due regard to his security. He (Sir C. Napier) would give his most decided opposition to the Motion of the noble Lord opposite.

Mr. P. Borthwick supported most cordially the Motion of his noble Friend. The question it involved was one not merely personal to the fortune of Don Carlos, but one which affected the interests of his children, and his children's children, as well as our own in all time to come: because it was a question of legitimate succession. He (Mr. Borthwick) denied that Don Carlos had ever given any engagement not to return to Spain, as the noble Lord, the late Foreign Secretary, had alleged; and he maintained, therefore, the distinct right of that illustrious Prince to leave this country and go back to his own, on the invitation of a portion of its people. In 1835, Don Carlos joined General Zumalacarregui, who had but 200 men under his command, with not as many pounds to provide for them, and no horses; but nevertheless they defeated and disarmed an entire army of the Christinos. It was that great man who, when he was asked where were his arsenals, replied, pointing to the 30,000 enemies encamped before him, "There they are." And sure enough his troops were soon armed with muskets proved in the Tower of London, which had been supplied to the troops of the Queen of Spain. He had travelled in Spain on that occasion, and he maintained, that at all times, and in all places, the supporters of Don Carlos had expressed themselves to the effect, that if the moral influence of England was withdrawn from the side of the Queen of Spain, Don Carlos would be seated on the Throne in six months, notwithstanding the efforts of the Legion, and even of an army three times its numbers. He admitted that the Legion, from its original constitution, from the fact of its not being officered by English officers, and from its being hurried about at a disadvantage, was not, perhaps, of a character best qualified to sustain the credit of England or the English name; but even if it were, and even if it were trebled in numbers, he had no doubt in his own mind that it was the moral influence of England alone that decided the struggle against Don Carlos. All the hon. Gentlemen who had spoken on the other side had declared that the reason why Don Carlos was confined so closely, and treated with so much rigour, was to establish peace in Spain, and thereby to keep it intact in the rest of Europe. But had they succeeded in effecting that object—if such was their object in reality? No; peace had no residence in Spain. Even now there is not a village not at war with its neighbour or with the Government—and not a father of a family who could calculate for a single night upon the lives of those dearest to him being safe. If peace had any residence in the Peninsula, it was in those châteaux en Espagne, whose name was synonymous with self delusion; it had no reality. In the debate on the Address to the Crown in 1838—the first year of Her Majesty's accession to the Throne—he had called the attention of the House to the State of Spain; and he would be pardoned for adverting on this occasion to what he had then said. In that debate he told the noble Lord (Lord Palmerston) that the question was one—not as of Don Carlos, or of his Generals, because if they were all imprisoned in France, it would be the same in the issue—but of the people at large, and the principle of monarchical government; and, he added, that until that was satisfactorily settled, there would be as little tranquillity found in that country as before. The result had verified his predictions—amply verified them—for there was now as little peace there as there had been then. That most infamous convention had been concluded. He did not mean to cast reflections upon those engaged in it on the part of this country; but the papers on which it was based—papers laid before the House by the noble Lord—exposed to the view of Europe, and to the whole world at large, a mass of treason so black that the page of history was never blotted with its equal. These were the records of the convention of Bergara. He did not impute this treason to Lord J. Hay, but he did maintain that the British Government of that day had purchased the prospect of peace for Spain at a price which should not be paid for anything in the world, viz., good faith and honour. These principles, which should actuate all nations, were grossly violated by the convention of Bergara, and the result was peace less than ever. The Treaty of Bergara, however, and the present detention of Don Carlos, had been attempted to be justified by the Durango decree. It was asked what could be done after that decree? In his (Mr. Borthwick's) opinion, that decree was a decree of mercy. It was a decree of mercy to General Evans, and to every one of those unfortunate men who had been deluded by the hollow pretences of the Government then in power to take part in that unhappy struggle in Spain. The Durango decree however, was no invention of Don Carlos. It was no more and no less than the simple promulgation of a law fundamental not only to Spain, but to England, and to every other country; and it was the law in Spain and in England before Don Carlos was born. He (Mr. Borthwick) would put a parallel case. Suppose a foreign force had landed to support, he would say, the Orange lodges, accused by hon. Gentlemen on the other side of wishing to change the succession to the Throne of this country, and to place upon it a usurper; would any quarter be granted to them? Would they not be shot when taken? Would they be allowed the rights of war? Would it not be the duty of those in command to hang them on the first tree they met with? That was the law of Spain also. General Evans had stated repeatedly that the English in the service of Don Carlos were fighting against the forces of the Queen of England; but such was not the fact. The auxiliary British Legion was not in the service of the Queen of England; it was not officered by English officers holding Her Majesty's Commission, and it was not fighting under English colours. It was a force permitted to be raised by the suspension of the Foreign Enlistment Act—fighting for Spanish pay, which, unluckily for them, they never got—in a quarrel disgraceful to those who originated it, as well as to those who supported it, and under colours alien to those of England. To that Don Carlos gave notice that they were not entitled to the rights of war, as they neither fought under the banners of England, nor were in the service of the Queen of England, nor were even officered by English officers. He told them that they were unlicensed invaders of the Spanish soil, unwelcome intruders in a national quarrel, and that, therefore, by the law of the land, they should be punished with death. That was the notice—was it not a decree of mercy rather than cruelty? He had heard with much surprise from the gallant Officer who spoke before him, that numbers of Englishmen had been subjected to that decree. He knew of several who were treated as prisoners of war, notwithstanding that decree, but he had never heard of any who were brought under its operation. He was not there to palliate the dreadful system of reprisals which took place during that war, nor to justify the cruelty of Cabrera. But he would ask those who made the accusation of cruelty against Don Carlos, who began those horrors? Was not the very first victim to that fearful system General Santo Ladrón—was he not shot—a prisoner of war, taken from his sick bed—in a ditch before the walls of Pampluna? The immortal memory of Zumalacarregui had been attempted to be sullied by those who knew nothing of the history of that war, or of its consequences. Allowances being made for the national temperament of the people of Spain, a country in which life was considered with far less care than in England—a people among whom its loss was the least that they heeded, there was not a stain of cruelty or crime upon the unexampled career of that hero; for unexampled it was to dispel an army of 30,000 men with only an unprovided force of 200. Again, with respect to Cabrera's butcheries, as they were called.

Look at the provocation, and then call them by that name if possible. He did not believe that there was a man in the House who, if his mother had been butchered, and his sisters treated in the manner Cabrera's were, would not have done as he did. What were the facts of that General's career? He was a student at law in the university. In that capacity he took part in a debate, the thesis of which was whether Don Carlos or Isabella had the best right to the throne; and in that debate he espoused the side of the former. He did not think this subject was the most prudently selected; but it was, after all, but a boyish debate. The consequences were, however, serious to Cabrera. He had to fly to save himself. His mother—a widow lady—who lived near the University, was applied to for information of his abode; but she did not know or would not tell it. On this she was taken out into the Plaza, being placed in the centre of a battalion formed on three sides of a square, she was shot by order, it was stated, of Noguera, but certainly with the sanction of General Mina. That, to say nothing of the treatment of his sisters—of which every hon. Member in the House had heard—was sufficient to madden any man, and almost to justify any act of reprisals, and it was a gallant action of Cabrera when he signed the Elliott Convention to exclude himself and Noguera from its operation. These cruelties began, it would be seen, on the side of the innocent Isabella, and, perhaps the noble Lord would say, the still more innocent Christina. But it was all to procure peace for Spain. Was there peace in Spain now? Were there no shootings, no wholesale slaughter? Where was Diego Leon, who won for Espartero laurels which Espartero could never have won for himself? What had become of him? Espartero wore on his brow the laurels of the Duke of Victory, but it was a well-known fact that he never met a Carlist force, from the time of Zumalacarregui to the days of Cabrera, without leaving it the victory. Diego Leon was shot in the public Plaza, and the Newspapers of that morning announce a number of executions of a similar nature, of recent date in Spain. He would read a specimen to the House.

" FRED. DE RONCALI.

" We learn here to day (but not from any official source), that Boné has commenced reprisals in a spirit of emulation which threatens to outdo the efforts of Roncali and Narvaez, that he has caused fourteen of his prisoners (including Senor Ceruti, uncle of Roncali) to be shot in retaliation! Another report says, that the Archbishop of Seville (the Rev. Cienfuegos Jovellanos) has been executed in revenge by the Insurgents at Carthagena!"

That was civilised, tranquillised Spain! as it was left by the noble Lord (Palmerston). For all purposes of peace and tranquillity, Spain was, in point of fact, blotted out of the map of Europe. And was it because human nature in that country was different from that in other countries? No; it was because institutions had been forced on the people which they did not understand, and a Monarch placed over them whom they did not acknowledge. He could shew, if it were necessary, that Don Carlos was the undoubted Sovereign of Spain by the fundamental constitution of the country; and that the Act which set the Salique law aside was passed by a Cortes called in the reign of Isabella. When the hon. and Gallant Officer stated that Don Carlos was absent from Spain without leave, he stated that which was not the fact. Don Carlos had leave to go to Portugal, and he obtained it from Ferdinand the VIIth., under circumstances which did him the greatest honour. These were the circumstances:—Maria Christina was naturally anxious that her daughter should inherit the Spanish Crown, and, through her intrigues, the question of female succession was mooted in the Privy Council. Don Carlos, as a Member of the Privy Council, said he would not be present when the question was agitated, and he asked permission to proceed to Portugal, which was readily granted, in order that he might not be guilty of the indelicacy of giving his advice in a matter which so nearly concerned his own interests. This was worthy of the character which had been given to Don Carlos by the noble Member for Newark, when he said that he was the exemplar of a Christian cavalier. Well, then, Don Carlos believing himself to be the legitimate heir to the Throne of Spain, being called to occupy that Throne by a large party of the people, and being supported by a vast majority of the people, acceded to that call; and if they disputed that majority, why, he asked, had they thought it necessary to send out so large a force to the assistance of his opponents? The noble Lord opposite had said, last year, that England had only interfered to prevent the Foreign Powers from forcing on the Spanish people institutions to which they were averse; and he agreed with the noble Lord that these were the obligations which rested upon England in this matter; but he maintained that those obligations had been violated; and that they had interfered to force upon the Spanish people an authority and institutions disagreeable to them; and now, forsooth, Don Carlos was to be kept a prisoner in France, because he would introduce into Spain another element of discord. Now, he would ask, was it possible to suppose any country more vexed by civil discord than Spain was at the present moment. If Don Carlos had returned to Spain and re-asserted his rights, could that country have been in a more frightful state of intestine commotion than at present? And as to the three exiles—Christina, Espartero, and Don Carlos—what right had they to make the difference which they did? The noble Lord had said that Espartero was de jure Regent of Spain, because he belonged to the de facto constitution of that country. But here was the Sovereign of Espartero, the de jure Sovereign of de jure Constitution of Spain, detained a prisoner in France, whilst Espartero was fêted at Windsor. Moreover, they had sent back Christina to agitate Spain—she who was the beginning, and the middle and the end of all the intrigues in which this civil discord had arisen. They might rest satisfied that nothing would tranquillise Spain but a system of government which would satisfy the Spanish people themselves. Any Monarch, to be popular, must be a Spanish Monarch. Isabella might be an English Monarch, a French Monarch, a Portuguese Monarch, or a Quadruple Alliance Monarch; but there was not a single man living on the soil of Spain who acknowledged that Queen with a hearty loyalty. But then, Spain must have liberal institutions. Why, she was the cradle of Liberalism in Europe; she showed them the way to Liberal Institutions. The Basque provinces, at the time of the war, had Representatives in Parliament, and every man twenty-five years of age had a vote; and they taxed themselves 50 per cent. on their incomes to support the cause of Don Carlos. Englishmen might dislike the Spanish Inquisition of olden times; the Spaniards might dislike the English Star Chamber; but was it because they disliked their Inquisition that they should prevent the Spanish nation from having the Monarch of their own choice. The right hon. Baronet who had answered the noble Member for Newark, had said that this was a question exclusively for France; and had quoted from the speech of the Foreign Minister of France a passage to the effect that Don Carlos was detained under a certain domestic law of France; he admitted that Don Carlos was treated as all refugees were under that law; that law specified the manner in which refugees were to be treated, whilst they were refugees, but it did not sanction their detention contrary to the Law of Nations: and the broad basis on which this Motion was founded was the Law of Nations. He, therefore, could not hesitate, whether he regarded the character of Don Carlos, his rights, or the interests of Spain—he could not hesitate to support the Motion of his noble Friend. He entertained no doubt that if Don Carlos returned to Spain, a large party would rally round him; and that that party instead of introducing those cruelties which had been alluded to, would be a powerful instrument in putting them down. They had been taunted with the idea that in a general scramble they might get something, but he should be ashamed of himself if, having received the greatest kindness from that illustrious Prince, when he was engaged in a contest not doubtful except for the intrigues of his opponents—he were now to shrink from defending him in his difficulties. But not the interests of Don Carlos—not the interests of Spain—but the interests of Europe depended materially on the adoption of the spirit of the present Motion. He trusted that the time would come when a broad and generous policy, formerly the policy of this country in regard to Foreign States, could be readopted; when friendship with France would no longer imply sympathy with any particular faction in France: when friendship in Spain would no longer imply the support of every succeeding faction which might arise in that country; when our sympathies with Spain would be Spanish and not factious sympathies; and here he could not help regretting the language M. Guizot had used on the famous Report on the Address, when he said, in alluding to the visit of our Queen to France, that that visit had stamped the approbation of her Government on the present policy of France. He trusted that England would have nothing to do with French policy or French revolutions; that she would love France as France, Spain as Spain, separate and distinct from the different factions which might arise in those countries; and if, even at the eleventh hour, England would withdraw that meddling policy which had caused so much evil, he believed that Spain, left to herself, would work out her own redemption—would soon stand on a higher and firmer basis, and lend her aid to advance the general civilization of Europe; and in the hope that England would do that, he gave his cordial support to the Motion.

Sir H. Douglas: However much I admire the generous feelings which have prompted my noble Friend, the Member for Newark, to bring forward this subject, I cannot give my support or vote in favour of a Motion which would urge or impose upon Her Majesty's Government the necessity of interfering with the French Government, in the course which they have adopted with respect to the detention of Don Carlos, in conformity, as it appears, with their own laws, and their own views of policy; but this I will say, that the object of the French Government in thus preventing Don Carlos from asserting, in person, his own rights, in any way he may think fit, far from producing the effect which the French Government appear to have in view, operates most powerfully the other way; for, whatever be the strength or the numbers of Don Carlos's adherents, their influence is vastly increased by the sympathy which is always superadded to the assertion of rights, by such acts of injustice as the adherents of Don Carlos consider his forcible detention in France to be. I rather regret this Motion too, because I disapprove of any interference whatever with Spanish affairs, prepared as I am to show, that the fearful state of anarchy which now prevails in Spain, has already been complicated and protracted by foreign interference, and that troubles in Spain will never cease until the Spanish people, apart from all foreign interference, settle their affairs in their own way. Persons who view recent events in Spain, in the abstract, must consider them enigmatical, and inexplicable, but when traced to their source, and viewed in that unceasing series of disorders, which have occurred in connected succession, from what he (Sir H. Douglas) would show, was the original cause of all these troubles, we see in the present state of Spain, a phasis in that unsettled orbit which all nations are doomed to take, in the frightful course of revolutionary movement, when once thrown into that course, by such violent errors and proceedings as those which have been committed throughout, by the Reformers and Demagogues of Spain, and by such mischievous interferences as those which have complicated and protracted that anarchy. The original error was, unquestionably, the Democratic constitution of 1812, framed at Cadiz, by persons who were not constitutionally authorised or competent to do this, and at the time that city was besieged by the French, and very nearly the whole of Spain occupied by the armies of that country—a constitution which virtually deposed the King, violated all the objects which produced the memorable insurrection of the Spanish people against foreign intervention and innovation in 1808—a constitution which plundered the Church, disgusted the Nobility, and was execrated at the time by the great mass of the Spanish people. The foreign interferences to which I would allude, as having complicated and protracted that anarchy, which had its origin in that most ill-advised constitution (very similar to the French Constitution of 1791, and not dissimilar in its tremendous effects), those interferences to which I allude, are, first, the intervention of France in 1823, and then the far more mischievous interferences of the noble Lord, the Member for Tiverton, between April, 1834, and the termination of the Administration to which that noble Lord belonged. When Ferdinand VII. was restored to his country, by the successful termination of the Peninsular War, in 1814, finding all ranks, classes and conditions of people, dissatisfied and disgusted with the Constitution of 1812, he refused to acknowledge the competency of that act, and to swear to it accordingly. It remained a dead letter till 1820, when the first military pronunciamiento of which there have since been about thirty, took place by the mutiny or defection of the Spanish army, then assembled at Cadiz for embarkation to America, to endeavour to re-conquer the allegiance of the Spanish colonies. This example was speedily followed in other parts of Spain, and so it was in other parts of Europe, and Ferdinand was forced, by the Army, to swear to the Constitution of 1812. The people, whose objects were against such sweeping innovation, took fire, as they had done in 1808, and in 1812. Their determination was to maintain their monarchy, their religion, and their ancient local laws and privileges, most particularly their municipal institutions. Civil war ensued between the bulk of the Spanish people and the army: it raged till 1823, when Louis XVIII. determined to send a French army into Spain, to restore order, and to put down military despotism. The Government of Great Britain used every endeavour to deter Louis XVIII. from this intervention; but not succeeding, there arose a very prevailing feeling in this country, to send a British army to the Peninsula to assist the people in driving the French out as before. On that occasion he (Sir H. Douglas) hazarded a prediction, that the French army, whose officers and soldiers had been massacred by thousands, when found straggling from their own columns, would make a march of triumph over the whole of Spain, without being scathed or touched; and, if right in that prediction, he could not be wrong in venturing another, that if we did send a British army to Spain, to oppose the French, we should be the party opposed and massacred by the Spanish people. This, at first, appeared enigmatical; but the prediction as to the reception of the French army, proved correct. He (Sir H. Douglas) endeavoured, at the time, to account for this. Had it not been for French intervention, the parties then conflicting in Spain, the serviles and liberales would have worked out the issue to some settlement, and there can be no doubt that some compromise would have been made, which would have produced a constitutional system, by which rational freedom, the rights of the Church, the privileges of the Aristocracy, the municipal establishments, and the just prerogatives of the Crown, would have been duly conciliated. The French army remained in Spain for several years, during which perfect tranquillity prevailed. In December 1829, Ferdinand married Christina of Naples, his fourth wife. Isabella was born on the 10th of October, 1830. The French Revolution stirred up the embers of disorder and Revolution in Spain, as well as elsewhere, and troubles recommenced. Ferdinand having no son, and being in declining health, began in 1832, to entertain intentions, or at least to yield to solicitations, to alter the Law of Succession in favour of his daughter Isabella, to the exclusion of his brothers, the heirs male of Charles IV., failing from Ferdinand, and accordingly promulgated, in September, 1832, a declaration that he had thought proper to abrogate the Law which settled the Succession in the male line, in conformity with an alleged petition, or memorial of the Cortes of 1789, which document, if authentic and competent, had remained an entire secret till this time. Queen Christina's sister, Donna Carlotta, the wife of Don Francisco Paulo, Ferdinand's brother, prevailed upon him to revoke this declaration. But poor weak Ferdinand, on the instigation of Christina, again revoked the revocation, and died on the 29th September 1833. Now here commenced the disputed succession, which led to the Carlist War. That question is not settled; it is only suspended by foreign intervention, and has yet to be determined by the Spanish people. He (Sir H. Douglas) had looked as fully as he could into all the arguments and merits of this question. He may have formed his own opinion upon it, but no opinion is, or can be, of any avail, none can be decisive, but the free will of the Spanish people. On the one hand, we have the last will of Charles II., (for there were several other wills) which led to the War of Succession, the great object of which was, the independence of the Spanish Monarchy by the settlement of the succession in the heirs male of Philip V., according to the act known as l'auto acordado, of May, 1713, a Decree settled with every solemnity, formality, and competency. For this all the privileged cities, towns, and communities of Spain, were called upon to nominate, and send to Madrid Delegates duly authorized to take into consideration, and decide that most important question, it was settled in favour of Philip V. and his heirs male, and inscribed accordingly in the Code of Law. If the memorial of the Cortes of 1789 had any existence at all, which is very much doubted, it was at best nothing more than an intention, entertained by Charles IV., Ferdinand's father, at the time he, Ferdinand, was a sickly infant, to make an alteration in the Law of Succession in favour of his, Ferdinand's, sister, La Carlotta, in the event of the decease of Ferdinand, then Prince of the Asturias, and of which there then appeared the greatest probability. But Ferdinand survived; and this memorial, if real, which I repeat, is very much doubted, remained but the annotation of an intention which was now made known, of the completion of which, no record is to be found, and the declared object of doing which was annulled by Ferdinand surviving. The Constitution of 1812 takes no notice of it; but, on the contrary, affirms and decrees the succession to be in the heirs male of Philip V.; and yet Zea Bermudez, in his memorial, dated Berlin, February, 1839, calls Ferdinand's death the extinction of the masculine race, although his brothers were then living! It does appear to me, that the claims of these competitors to the Throne being thus fairly before their country, they should have been left to the assertion of their own rights, and the Spanish people, to determine which competitor should wear the Crown or by what compact or compromise to settle it. He (Sir H. Douglas) did think that the greatest mistake the noble Lord had ever made was to throw the judgment of England into the scale, by advising the recognition of Isabella. There is no doubt that the independence of the Spanish Monarchy is of vast importance to the tranquillity of Europe, but the way to provide for that great object, was to refrain from any intervention, which would practically destroy that independence, nor did he (Sir H. Douglas) think that, in the present circumstances of Spain, the independence of the Spanish Monarchy is less provided for by the abrogation of the law of Philip V.; but the noble Lord thought otherwise. The Foreign Enlistment Bill was repealed, and the Quadruple Treaty concluded. One would have thought that England and France, as parties to this compact, should have contracted equal obligations for the common object. But, no; France engaged only to prevent succours of men, arms, or munitions of war, from being carried into Spain; whilst Great Britain engaged, not only to do this, but, moreover, to furnish any succours and munitions of war, which the Queen Regent pourra reclamer, and to assist her with a naval and marine force, if she should deem it necessary. And what has not this cost? Thus commenced the Carlist War; continued till 1838, when the contest was suspended by the Convention of Bergara, brought about by the intervention of England, by moral, political, and physical force, but which contest has only been adjourned, as we shall see. A series of the most frightful and complicated disorders now ensued, in lieu of the noble Lord's expectations and assumptions that he had settled the affairs of Spain. Sir, in the course of this sad history may be numbered three constitutions, and about thirty military insurrections; forming altogether a chaos of anarchy, endangering the very existence of Monarchy in Spain, and which has not yet run its terrible and ever-destined course. In May, 1834, the Constitution called L'Estatuto Reale, or Royal Statute, drawn up by Martinez de la Rosas, was disclosed. It consisted of two Estamentos, or Estates, the Proceres, or Peers, and Procuradores, or Deputies. It was some improvement upon the Constitution of 1812, but still a code full of imperfections, the greatest of which was, and that proved fatal to it, the extraordinary melange, in the composition of the Proceres, which was not a Chamber of Peers, but formed of Ministers, Ambassadors, Generals, Judges, landed proprietors, merchants, and manufacturers; and which, by Article 81, reserved entirely to the Sovereign, the initiative in the enactment of laws. This Constitution had but a short existence. The troops under Lieutenant Cordero, pronounced against it in 1835; the Captain General Carvalala was murdered, and the Constitution of 1812 again proclaimed. Then came the pronunciamiento against Toreno's Administration, by the troops, which had been sent to quell some disorders, joining the insurgents. This insurrection was appeased by the retirement of Toreno, and Mendisabel's Administration succeeded. The new Cortes was opened by Queen Christina, who, instead of assembling the legislative body in the Upper House was compelled to deliver her speech in the Chamber of Procuradores, or Deputies, decreed thenceforward to enjoy that superiority and privilege. Now came a sweeping plunder, robbery, and persecution of the Church. All Prebendaries, Canonries, and other Ecclesiastical bodies, not connected with the cure of souls, were abolished, and their revenues confiscated to the State. It passed a Decree authorizing the immediate sale of all Church, Monastic, or other property, that might fall into the hands of the State, the tithes had long previously been abolished. Mendisabel's Administration was overthrown in May, 1836, by French intrigue; and Isturitz, a respectable Cadiz merchant, thought to be in the interest of France, succeeded. Then came the well known pronunciamiento of La Granja, headed by a Serjeant Garcia, who forced his way into the Queen Regent's apartments, and obliged her to swear to the Constitution of 1812. Then the disorders in Madrid, and the murder of the Captain General Quesada. In August, 1836, Calatrava's Administration succeeded, and we have another Constitution, in 1839, which still more disgusted all those classes, orders, communities, and interests, that ought to have been conciliated. The upper Branch, decreed by that code, is not a Chamber of Peers; it is an elective Chamber, amounting in number to three-fifths the number of Deputies, chosen by the Sovereign, it is true, but the selection is made from a list of persons elected by the electors of the Deputies, one-third of the Senate going out by rotation annually. This is merely transforming into a branch of the legislature the democratic conformation of the Constitution of 1812, of the Consejo D'Estatu. A power of Convocation is indeed given to the Sovereign, but this is so far nugatory, that the Cortes, if not convoked, meets on the 1st of December, of every year; but it cannot deliberate unless a majority of Members be present. The Constitution of 1837 is, at this moment, in a state of infraction, in an organic Article (56) which decrees the Royal minority to extend to the completion of fourteen years of age, which has not yet been abrogated by competent authority, but only set aside by an arbitrary act. Then we come to the general rising against the law of the Ayuntamientos, by which Queen Christina intended greatly to circumscribe, if not to abolish all municipal rights, and to centralize them in Madrid, by which, together with her private conduct, she lost entirely the confidence of the Spanish people. Christina applied to General Espartero, for military aid, to put down the insurrection of September, 1840, against the promulgation of the law vesting in the Crown the nomination of alcaldes, and other municipal officers. He declined to do this, upon which Queen Christina abdicated the Regency; and Espartero became sole Regent. Sir, the attachment of the Spanish people to their Municipal privileges has ever been the main spring of their action throughout their history, from the earliest periods of the Spanish Monarchy. Those Institutions formed the foundation and the bulwark of civil liberty, of which there was an earlier promise in Spain, than in any other country. It was the attachment of Spanish people to their Provincial and Municipal privileges, the full enjoyment of which the villages and rural districts of Spain retained, pretty nearly, according to the old principle of popular election, though very much circumscribed in the great cities and towns, it was the attachment of the Spanish people to these institutions, and their devotion to their religion, that produced the memorable Insurrection of 1808; and it is a remarkable circumstance that a main cause of the combined attachment of the Spanish people to Ferdinand VII, was, that he, by a special decree, admitted a certain number of members to the Ayuntamientos or Municipal Councils, by free election to restore to them that popular freedom of which they had been deprived in former reigns. Now appears prominently on the stage, Don Ramon Narvaez. He was first in the Infantry of the Guards, served with great distinction under Espartero in the Carlist war, particularly at Ostabane in 1836: he was then sent in pursuit of the Carlist General, Gomez, who, after having made a military promenade all over Spain, was routed by Narvaez at Villazobledo. Espartero then became jealous of Narvaez; they quarrelled, and Narvaez was placed on half-pay, and retired to Osuna. In 1838 he joined with Cordova in a conspiracy to overthrow the administration, which having failed, Narvaez fled first to Gibraltar, and then by England to France. Concha, another leader in these military pronunciamientos, was one of the officers most favoured by Espartero; but having taken no part in the events of 1840, to force Queen Christina to abdicate, he and O'Donnell were placed in retraite; and were prevailed upon by Don Diego Leon, to join in the conspiracy of October, 1841, the one to attack the Palace, to carry off the young Queen, the other to raise the Basque Provinces to revolt. Roncali, another actor in the present scene, fell into disgrace with Espartero, for having defended Don Diego before the court-martial, by which he was tried and condemned. Roncali is supposed to be a natural son of Conde D'Espana, and of Carlist principles, though he always remained faithful, whilst serving in the Guards. He (Sir H. Douglas) might show in another detail the complications and confusions of rival parties and persons; but, perhaps he had said enough to support his opinion and advice. After some other minor pronunciamientos, and many disorders—after many other pronunciamientos and disorders, came the late insurrection of 1843 against Espartero and the formation of the Lopez administration. The dread of the arbitrary decree for remodelling the Law of the Ayuntamientos, was at the bottom of all this. The troops in Valencia having pronounced against the Regent, he determined to proceed, in person, with a large force, to suppress that defection. As soon as Narvaez heard of this insurrection, he left Paris, where he had been in close consultation with Queen Christina, and was conveyed in a French steamer to Valencia, where he placed himself at the head of the insurrectionary troops. Espartero left Madrid with a large and select force. Admitting fully the bravery of the late Regent of Spain, evinced in the Carlist war, and for which by the noble Lord's recommendation, he had been invested with the Order of the Bath, it did not now appear that the political and military talents of that person were equal to what was required of him at this most critical period. The corps d'armé which he commanded, made a rapid march to Albacete; but there came to a halt, apparently irresolute and paralysed. It remained there for a considerable time, whilst defection was spreading around; neither prosecuting the movement on Valencia, nor returning to Madrid, which he ought not to have quitted, and where the presence of the Regent was most essentially requisite. This corps then threw itself, by a cross country path into the great southern road, and there waiting again for some time, retired without striking a blow, to Baylen and then to Andujar, and thus gave up the contest. This lost the Regent the confidence of the Spanish armies, and led immediately to his downfall, and to the anarchy which necessarily ensued—a minor Queen, deprived of the presence and authority of the sole Regent of her Kingdom with no other means of providing for the royal authority than the alternative of either forming another Regency, whilst that which had been decreed, still existed; or to get rid of that difficulty, by declaring the Queen of age, in direct violation of an Organic Article of the Constitution of 1837. Here we may form some conception, of the anarchy that now reigns through Spain. Liberales, and Serviles; Constitutionalists of three parties; Carlists, Christino's, Isabellists, Monarchists, Republicans, Democrats, Progresistas, Independientes, Affrancesados, Inglesses, Fuerists, Centralists, and then the ambition of rival chiefs. The young Queen, a minor, and, as it may be feared, under all these terrible circumstances, Monarchy at the last gasp. These are the sad and fearful fruits of the noble Lord's policy, and however painful it may be for Her Majesty's Government, to stand by, and see the anarchy which may yet ensue, in that unfortunate country, he (Sir H. Douglas) implored Ministers to meddle not with it. The Spaniards are a fine and a noble people, attached to their country, their monarchy their ancient institutions, their national faith, and above all, abhorrent of foreign intervention. Let us always remember the noble insurrection of that people in 1808, when the upper classes had submitted, and Napoleon had, by a series of the most flagitious acts insinuated his army into every fortress and chief city in Spain. Let us never forget that it was that memorable insurrection, which, supported by Great Britain, afforded her a fair and noble field, upon which she fought for, and to her own renown, achieved the emancipation of the world, from the tyranny of Napoleon. Let us be persuaded that if left to themselves, the Spanish people will, in the end, prove their attachment to their Monarchy their Church and their Law, by bringing this contest to a conclusion, which will conciliate the just rights and prerogatives of all interests and classes, without reverting to those abuses and imperfections which, most certainly, no one can wish to see re-established; and that out of the present disorder, a system will be instituted best suited to the peculiar circumstances, habits, principles, and wants of the Spanish people, although it may not be such as those who have long been accustomed to the enjoyment of free institutions would altogether approve.

Mr. Trelawny said, the party of Young England had shown a great deal of misplaced sympathy for Don Carlos. He wished they would show a little more for the people of Ireland and of this country. The hon. Member for Evesham said he had been in Spain. From the tenor of his speech it might be imagined that Christina had taken Young England captive.

Mr. Borthwick wished to explain to the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down that though he (Mr. Borthwick) had been in Spain during a portion of the war having gone there expressly to ascertain what were the real facts of the cruelties reported—yet he never had the misfortune of being captured by the Christinos, and, therefore, had never an opportunity of experiencing their liberality. A certain school, designated "Young England," had obtained some notoriety, but there was another school of youths—the young Boeotians—who were very talkative in that House.

Mr. Monckton Milnes wished to make a few observations on this important foreign question. He should explain in a few words the grounds on which he should vote. After the speech of the hon. Member for Bridport, if anything could have induced him to vote for the Government, it would have been that speech. The accusation against the King of the French was that he had not been faithful to the Quadruple Alliance, but had permitted arms for Spain to pass through France, and had shown favour to Don Carlos. He thought the detention of Don Carlos rather meritorious than otherwise. He did not think that his liberation would make things worse. The marriage of the Prince of Asturias with the Queen of that country was the only thing that could quiet Spain. So far as he could see into the matter, which he owned in truth was very little, after what had taken place it was the duty of the Powers of Europe to ally themselves together for the pacification of that country. He believed that would be best done by the marriage of the son of Don Carlos with the present Queen of Spain. He should vote with his noble Friend.

Mr. M. Gore thought, that all the practicable purposes of the Motion would be sufficiently served, and the cause of humanity vindicated, by the expression of sentiments which the question had evoked, without pressing for a division. The influence of those sentiments would not be confined within the walls of that House—they would be felt in every part of Europe, and he had no doubt the voice of Europe would be in unison with the feelings of the English Parliament. He thought, with all deference to hon. Gentlemen who had taken another course, that it would be better for the sake of Spain, and the interests of the world at large, if, instead of indulging in a course of conduct calculated to exasperate party animosity, we did all we could to consider Spain as one cemented, one united country. He hoped she would soon take that post which she ought to occupy among the community of European States. Having vindicated the general conduct of Don Carlos the hon. Member said he was sure that a British House of Commons, which was ever ready to sympathise with and admire triumphant virtue, would not withhold its sympathy and admiration from Don Carlos because he was stricken by misfortune. Looking at the subject in a practical point of view, and considering the expression of sympathy which had fallen from the head of Her Majesty's Government, he thought Don Carlos's case could not be in a better situation, and hoped the noble Lord would withdraw his Motion, which was calculated to cause great inconvenience.

Lord J. Manners, in replying, said it had been asserted that this was purely a French question, but in his opinion, the whole course of events proved that England was implicated in the transactions in Spain. He had heard nothing in the course of the debate to alter the conviction he had always entertained that Don Carlos was the popular candidate for the Spanish Throne. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Palmerston) said the present Queen was decidedly popular in Spain, but he must give his positive denial to that assertion. If the Queen were a decidedly popular candidate he would ask the House where was the necessity for all the outrages and underhand interference of which they had heard? He contended that it was foreign interference, and foreign interference alone, which finally put down the Carlist cause in Spain. His own personal feeling on this subject would lead him to divide the House, even if he knew that there were only two for the Motion; but, after what had fallen from the hon. Gentleman that preceded him, and the opinions that had been expressed by other Members, he should not feel justified in dividing the House on the Motion. Having thanked the House for the attention they had given the subject, his Lordship concluded by expressing his conviction, that, before long, justice would be done towards Don Carlos.

Motion negatived.

DUBLIN PROTESTANT OPERATIVE ASSOCIATION.] Captain Bernal rose to move

VOL. LXXIII. {Third Series}

"For the Copy of an Address presented to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland from the Dublin Protestant Operative Association and Reformation Society, dated the 14th day of October, 1843; together with the official reply of the Lord Lieutenant, dated, "Vice-regal Lodge, Oct. 16, 1843."

In proposing this Motion, he could not help drawing the attention of Gentlemen upon both sides of the House to what he thought was a most objectionable practice. He alluded to the practice of the First Minister of the Crown reading letters to that House which he had addressed to himself; for he (Captain Bernal) contended that to read letters which he had written to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was, in point of fact, to read letters which he had addressed to himself. It put him (Captain Bernal) very much in mind of schoolboys writing love-letters to themselves, and by posting them trying to persuade their schoolfellows that they came from their sweethearts. At that late hour he would not trouble the House with any further observations, as their time had been sufficiently taken up by hon. Gentlemen who went down to that House at seven o'clock, consumed the whole of the evening, and then were afraid to go to a division.

Lord Eliot would not, for a moment object to the production of the Papers moved for by the hon. and gallant Member, if he thought their production would serve any useful purpose. But as he thought it would be highly inexpedient to give importance to such documents by placing them amongst the records of that House he must object to the Motion. There was no secrecy about the matter; the correspondence had appeared in all the newspapers, and the only objection he had was, that it would give an importance to the matter it did not deserve. The hon. and gallant Member must have been aware that the address was intended to express approbation of the political conduct of the Lord Lieutenant, whilst their opinions upon religious topics appeared to have crept into it quite inadvertently. He was sure the production of the Papers would only serve to perpetuate animosities, and to resuscitate matters that had better be buried in oblivion.

Captain Bernal expressed his determination of going to a division. It was not he who gave any importance to this matter, but the Lord Lieutenant, who received the address, and returned his warm acknowledgment for it.

Mr. Duncombe was of opinion that the Papers should be produced, in case any hon. Member should wish to found a Motion upon it. The noble Lord said, if it were laid upon the Table of the House it would only serve to perpetuate animosities. What was that but an admission that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had made an answer to an address which was calculated to perpetuate animosities? He looked upon it as an additional reason why the Papers should be produced. No doubt the Ministry had power to do what they pleased, but they could not satisfy the country. He thought his hon. and gallant Friend was justified in pressing his Motion to a division.

The House divided.—Ayes 54; Noes 105: Majority 51.

HORSE-RACING AND PENALTIES — QUI TAM ACTIONS.] The Order of the Day for the third reading of the Horseracing Bill having been moved,

Mr. Christie rose to move that the Bill be read a third time that day six months. Notwithstanding the alterations which had been made in the Bill, it was still most objectionable. It was an ex post facto interference of the Legislature in favour of certain rich individuals who had violated a law, upon the interpretation of which there was no doubt among the Judges. In fact, there had been a series of decisions, bringing horseracing and betting on horseracing within the operation of the Statute. The plea of ignorance of the law on the part of those who had violated it was given up; and with regard to the vexatious motives which had been attributed to those who had brought the actions which had called forth this Bill, that charge was equally unworthy of attention. As to the unreasonableness of the penalties sought under the Statute, that was an objection which would apply equally to the penalties recovered in a qui tam action from Mr. Bond for winning money at rouge et noir. If Parliament wished to act justly and impartially, they ought to indemnify Mr. Bond for the penalties exacted from him three years ago, as well as to indemnify the parties for whose benefit this Measure was intended. There was another case of great public importance, in which it appeared to him every reason was presented for a special interference of the Legislature that could be urged in favour of these proceedings. He would anticipate the cry of "Question" from the other side of the House, by saying at once that he was going to allude to a subject which was unpalatable to hon. Gentlemen opposite, but for the bond fide purpose of illustrating the present question: he meant certain criminal proceedings which had been lately instituted in the Arches Court of Canterbury against certain Dissenters of the City of Norwich, not for refusing to pay a Church-rate agreed upon in vestry, but for refusing in vestry to vote for a Church-rate. That was a proceeding entirely without precedent; it was the first attempt to use the criminal jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court for such a purpose. In the parish of St. George Cole, in Norwich, the majority of the inhabitants were Dissenters, but they had, year after year, come forward to raise, by voluntary subscription, half of the money necessary for the repair of the Church, if the Churchmen would raise the other half. They, the Dissenters, had actually raised the subscription, and paid the money into the hands of the Churchwarden, but the Churchmen refused to do their part, and the Churchwarden was compelled to return the money to the Dissenters. Well, in 1842 the Archdeacon of Norwich determined to have a rate, and to proceed against the Dissenters of the parish who would not agree to the Church-rate, and he called upon the Church-party to raise a subscription to defray the legal expenses. ["Question."] He knew he should be interrupted by that cry, but he contended that the case of the Norwich Dissenters was a much stronger case for legislative interference than that of the betters on horse-races. If the House would legislate in behalf of certain noble Lords and hon. Gentlemen who had implicated themselves in losses by gaming and violating the law, they must legislate for these persons. If this Bill were passed, as no doubt it would be, he should take on himself to bring in a Bill to discontinue the proceedings against the Norwich Dissenters in the Ecclesiastical Courts.

Mr. B. Escott thought this Bill defective, because it allowed persons making bets and losing to run away without paying them. In his opinion, the only satisfactory foundation on which to leave the question would be to declare that all bets should be illegal so far as this, that they should not be recoverable at law. They should be a mere debt of honour, nothing else; but, at the same time, all penalties for betting should be done away with entirely.

Mr. Hawes admitted, that the penalties sought to be enforced in this case were unreasonable, and that they had been incurred in ignorance of the law; but if this Bill passed, all parties who found themselves oppressed under similar circumstances by heavy penalties, at the suit of common informers, would have an equal claim to relief. He thought the case of the Norwich Dissenters a parallel one, because they had been involved in expensive litigation, not in consequence of factious opposition to Church-rates, but in consequence of a law very obscure in itself, which was altogether unknown until declared by Chief Justice Tindal. The House was now establishing a very serious precedent, and they could not afterwards refuse relief to other parties who had not the same influence as those Gentlemen whom he saw opposite, for whose benefit this Bill was intended, and who, he hoped, would not vote on the present occasion.

Lord G. Bentinck.—I never have voted for the Bill.

Sir John Easthope said, he felt it necessary to explain the vote that he must give in favour of this Motion, and more especially in consequence of the observations of his hon. Friends, the Member for Weymouth, and the Member for Lambeth. His hon. Friend, the Member for Weymouth, stated that injustice would be done to Mr. Bond, and that injustice might be done to the Dissenters of Norwich. Surely it was no ground, that injustice should be done to strong parties, because it had been done or might be done to weaker parties? He was most anxious, if injustice had been done to a weak party, that the law which inflicted it should be amended; and he was doubly anxious that injustice should not be done to the Dissenters of Norwich, and he should be most ready to co-operate with his hon. Friends in any measure that they might bring forward, in order amply to do justice to those parties; but he must submit to his hon. Friends, that refusing to do justice to these influential and powerful individuals, and making them the victims of common informers, was not likely to advance the claims to just treatment on the part of those who might be weaker and less influential. With these feelings he could not do otherwise than give a cordial support to the present measure.

Mr. M. Gibson said, after the alterations which had been made in the Bill, he could not support the Amendment moved by his hon. Friend.

Colonel Peel begged to state, in explanation of what had fallen from him on a former occasion, that although in November last he had received a letter from the attorney intimating that he had been directed to commence proceedings against him, the writ had not been served upon him, and he was unaware till he saw by the return made to the order of that House, that proceedings had been commenced against him.

The House divided on the question, that the word "now" stand part of the question. Ayes 87; Noes 21;—Majority 66.

GENERAL ESPARTERO.] Sir H. Douglas said, that he wished to explain what he had said as to General Espartero, as, from a paragraph in a newspaper which had caught his eye, he was represented as accusing him of want of personal courage. The courage of that officer was as unquestioned as it was unquestionable. His (Sir H. Douglas's) observations were confined to the operations of the corps d'armée, which he had thought disgraceful, and he thought so still. He took the earliest opportunity of offering this explanation with respect to an illustrious individual, absent and in adversity.

BUILDINGS OF THE METROPOLIS.] The Earl of Lincoln rose to bring in a Bill, the substance of which he would convey to the House in a very few sentences. His observations should be, not in vindication of the Measure, but in explanation of its enactments. He was relieved from the necessity of saying more from what had passed in the House in legislating upon a similar subject. The voluminous reports made to the House as to the population of large towns must be so fresh in the recollection of the House, and the facts produced so strong an effect upon the minds of Members, that it would be useless to recapitulate the statements in the reports, or to make extracts from them. In the report of a Committee which sat in 1840, and over which the Member for Shrewsbury presided, the Committee stated, that with a view to remedial Measures, they considered that an Act should be passed for the regulation of Public Buildings in the Metropolis. It further stated, that such an Act not only for the metropolis, but for other large towns, would be of essential but primary importance. The first Bill upon the subject was introduced by a noble Lord, then the Secretary for the Home Department, in 1841. It was brought down from the Lords to that House, but from the dissolution of Parliament happening immediately after, it made no progress. In 1842, the Bill was again brought into the House of Lords, and thence to that House, but before it was carried by the consent of all parties—not only with the consent of the Secretary for the Home Department, but with that of the Member for Perth,—it was found so deficient in its provisions, that by the consent of all parties it was sent to the Committee then sitting up stairs. That Committee eventually reported the evidence which it had collected without giving an opinion thereon. At the close of the session, by the desire of his right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department, he had undertaken to examine the subject, and to introduce a Measure. For that purpose he had consulted architects and surveyors of eminence, but looking to the complication of details, the number of towns that would be affected by such a Measure, and the fact that some of those towns, such as Liverpool, had Local Acts of their own, he thought that any general Measure would be inapplicable to different places. With these views he had brought in a Bill during last Session for regulating the buildings of the metropolis alone; but from the important Measures before the House, the Session became so far advanced, that it became impossible to proceed with the Bill. He ought to state that he did not regret that event, as it gave him fresh opportunities for introducing important improvements not only in the details but also in the form, and bringing it forward in a shape more likely to be useful than last year. He would now state the provisions of the Bill. The House was aware that the last Act passed for the regulation of Buildings in the Metropolis was in the reign of George III. An enactment of seventy years must be wholly inapplicable to the present circumstances of the metropolis. He therefore proposed to repeal it altogether. That Act contained provisions for the prevention of fires. He, however, would produce a separate Measure for that purpose in the present Session. It was not necessary to trouble the House with details which were not only not interesting, but unintelligible, such as those relating to party walls. That subject had been examined with the greatest care by men able to judge, and he hoped that the provisions with respect to it would prove palatable to the community at large, and be willingly adopted by parties whose will it was intended to restrict. In the Bill of last year several clauses were introduced for the regulation of Drainage, which were intended to promote the health of the people. In the present Bill he had introduced a clause of a general nature as to Draining, but he had omitted several of the clauses, because the question of Draining and the supply of water, not only as to the metropolis, but as to other large towns in the kingdom, was under the anxious consideration of the Commission for the Improvement of Towns and Populous Places; and he hoped, before long, that a report would be made which would enable the Government to deal with these subjects. On these grounds he thought it unadvisable to enter on that subject. The only regulation he had introduced into the Measure as to Drainage was, that for the future no house should be erected without a proper provision to secure adequate drainage. He also proposed to provide for the width of streets and alleys. Hitherto such enormous mortality had been caused by the crowded state of the large towns, that for the purpose of preventing such, he intended to introduce a clause that the streets and alleys should be of a certain width. He also proposed to prohibit buildings for the purposes of trades injurious to the health of the people, such as were likely to produce fever. These were the details of the Bill, but he hoped that Members would reserve any observations they might have to make for the second reading. The present Building Act was carried out by district surveyors. In the new Bill he would not interfere with the appointment of these officers; he would not deprive the Magistrates of the power of appointing them, but there had been great abuses in the appointment of these surveyors, and the interests of the country had, by the appointment of young men, almost boys, been grossly neglected. He would propose to place some restrictions on the appointment, such as that the office of district surveyor should not be held by a Magistrate—that no person should be appointed to it who was under thirty years old, and that the consent of the Secretary of State should be obtained to all such appointments. The Bill would also contain clauses for the appointment of “official referees,” who would constitute a tribunal to which disputed questions arising out of house surveys should be referred. By this plan much time, litigation and expense, would be avoided. On another point, namely, the limits to which the operation of the Bill was to be extended, he would propose that the Commissioners should have power to extend them to any distance round the metropolis not exceeding twelve miles from Charing-cross. In conclusion the noble Lord expressed a hope, though the proposed Bill did not possess such claims on the attention of the House as others which had occupied its time, that in the course of the Session they might pass a Measure which would promote the health and comfort of the inhabitants of the metropolis.

The noble Lord moved for leave to bring in the Bill.

Mr. T. Duncombe said, he did not rise to offer any objection to the introduction of the Bill, but to call the attention of the noble Lord to complaints which had been made by many persons residing in the localities in which houses had been pulled down to make way for the intended improvements. They complained that they were put to great loss in business and otherwise to much inconvenience by the length of time allowed to elapse between the pulling down of the old buildings and the erection of the new. One consequence of this delay was, that the rating of some of the parishes in which those buildings had been pulled down had been increased. He thought that where buildings were pulled down, they should be replaced as soon as possible.

The Earl of Lincoln was quite aware of the inconvenience to which the hon. Member had adverted, but it was one which it was impossible altogether to avoid, and he could assure the hon. Member that it was not caused by any want of diligence in the office over which he presided. There were many things to be done, such as the preparation of proper sewers and other improvements, before the rebuilding of the houses could be commenced, but when completed it would be found that the individual rating in the parishes alluded to would be diminished.

Leave given.

SHIPWRECKS—HARBOURS OF REFUGE.]

—Mr. Rice rose to call the attention of the House to the Report of the Committee on Shipwrecks, with reference to Harbours of Refuge. He trusted the House would be of opinion that it was the duty of the Government and of the Legislature to adopt such measures as might appear necessary, not only for the security of our commerce, but for the preservation of life and property from loss at sea. These were the objects for which the Shipwreck Committee of last year was nominated. That Committee was appointed with the sanction of Her Majesty's Government, and if the recommendations of that Committee were supported by good and substantial evidence (and he believed no doubt could be entertained on the subject), it would be a waste of time if they should be attended with no practical result. The Committee made several recommendations of considerable importance; but he would confine his observations to that part of the Report which had reference solely to Harbours of Refuge, and it was not his wish to trespass on the time of the House by referring to that part of the evidence which related to the plans of different Harbours; neither would he advert to that part of the evidence which recommended any particular localities. It might be supposed, that he felt some predilections in favour of the town which he had the honour of representing, but whatever might be its claims, he thought he should best consult its interest by divesting his present motion of any local character. He trusted that other hon. Members would adopt the same course, leaving the Government to refer the matter to competent persons to decide upon the most fitting places for Harbours of Refuge. He believed the evidence on which the Report was founded would bear him out in the assertion that the formation of one or more large Harbours in the narrow seas, was not only a Measure of great national utility, but one of immediate and urgent necessity. He would now trouble the House with a short extract from the Report of the Committee. The Committee said—

“Witnesses of the highest authority have given evidence before the Committee, proving the want of harbours accessible at all times of the tide, and urging the necessity which exists for their erection on those parts of the coast where such Harbours do not exist; and your Committee strongly recommend the immediate attention of the Government and the Legislature to the subject. The witnesses, to whose evidence the Committee refer, have pointed out different localities as most eligible; but the Committee abstain from recommending any particular situations for Harbours, from a conviction that these points will be best decided on by a body, composed of scientific and competent persons, whose attention should be specially and exclusively directed to this subject.”

He might observe, that in the Motion which he had submitted to the House, he had adopted, as far as he possibly could, the recommendation of the Committee to nominate a Committee of scientific and competent persons. The Committee went on to say :—

“Attaching the greatest importance to this vast project, on national grounds, as well as for the protection and security of trade, your Committee think it most desirable that as large an appropriation of national funds as can be made be devoted annually to the construction of Harbours of Refuge in such localities as may be recommended.”

The Committee then gave their opinion as to certain Harbours, to which he (Mr. Rice) would not refer for the reasons already given. A great number of witnesses were examined, amongst whom were five or six experienced officers, and several civilians who had taken a great interest in the subject. But, in order not to weary the House, he would only refer to the evidence of two or three individuals, who, from their station and professional experience, were entitled to the attention of the House. He would first take the evidence of Captain Washington, an officer who had been employed by the Admiralty to survey the eastern coast. Captain Washington was asked, “Have you turned your attention to Harbours of Refuge?” His answer was,

“Yes, I have thought a great deal about them; there is a great want of Harbours of Refuge on the East Coast. We have nothing from the Forth to the Humber, an extent of a couple of hundred miles; between the Humber and the Thames there is nothing but the port of Harwich; so that there is on the East Coast of England nothing but the Thames, Harwich, the Humber, and the Forth; between the Thames and Portsmouth there is nothing at all that I know of.”

He thought the House would admit that, considering the position of France, that part of the coast from Portsmouth to the Thames was not the least important. That gallant Officer was then examined as to certain localities which he (Mr. Rice) would pass over, for the purpose of noticing the evidence of Captain Bullock, who said—

“I was directed by the Admiralty to follow the steps of the Commission on Harbours of Refuge, and make examinations of the Harbours they had not time to do; to take the soundings, and so on.”

He was then asked,

“Is it your opinion that it would add to the security of shipping coming up Channel on that coast if there were a Harbour of Refuge somewhere between Portsmouth and the Nore.”

And he replied,

“I reported that that was necessary.”

Mr. Cubitt, who was one of the Commissioners appointed in the year 1840 to survey the South Eastern coast, and the state of the Harbours, was first examined as to the localities of the place which he had the honour to represent; but he was also asked,

"Will you state, without reference to that Report, whether you conceive there is a necessity for a Harbour of Refuge for the safety of Shipping between Portsmouth and the Nore?" And he replied, "I think there is. That was strongly recommended in the Report of the Commissioners; and of those places there laid down—that is, the North Foreland and Dover, and Beachy Head, and so on, we all agreed, that Dover was the most important place, from its fortifications and other circumstances connected with the situation, more so than any of the rest."

His Grace the Duke of Wellington, the Warden of the Cinque Ports, was also examined. He says:—

"The attention of the Committee has been directed to the subject of a harbour of refuge between Portsmouth and the Thames. Will your Grace have the goodness to state your opinion as to the necessity for the erection of a new harbour?" "I have no doubt about it. I entertain no doubt that it is absolutely necessary; there is now no security between Portsmouth and the Downs. Dover Roads is a very secure place in the period of a northerly or easterly wind, but there is no security at other times; but, on the contrary, it is a very dangerous place in a wind from the south-west. They can run for the Downs, but there is no great ease in the Downs; certainly there is no security in Dover, except from warlike attempts. But I should say, that considering the want of protection from the weather and from military attacks in the Channel, the trade of the port of London would be in a very precarious situation, and will be a very losing one in a variety of ways in time of war, if something is not done beforehand, if some precautions are not taken. Steam power in moving ships has made such progress at present, that it must have a most material effect on maritime warfare in future times. I use the words maritime warfare in contra-distinction to naval warfare. If anybody will just consider the advantage the French coast enjoys over the coast of this country, in observation of what is passing at sea; it is to the southward; they have the sun to their backs; they see everything quite clear; and it is possible from the coast of France to calculate to a moment at what period a vessel coming up Channel will arrive at particular points, and they may be in readiness to seize her at any point which may happen to be unguarded, supposing the vessel to be without convoy, and supposing that there should be no naval means at that point to take care of her. I should say that the trade of the port of London would labour under a great disadvantage if it were found that every vessel coming up from Portsmouth was obliged to come up in a convoy, that she should be picked up unless there were a convoy; and there are no means of providing for that safety except by ports; not one only, but there ought to be, I should say, at least two between the Downs and Portsmouth; I should say one about Dungeness, and another possibly at Dover. I have given a good deal of reflection to this subject, and have thought of it a long while, and that is the conclusion to which I have come; and it is a rational conclusion, for it is founded on what the state of the commerce of this port—which is the great port of the country—will be by-and-bye, if something is not done."

His Grace went on further to explain the necessity of harbours for this purpose, and was asked—

"Your Grace is of opinion that it is absolutely necessary there should be one?"

His answer was—

"I think it so desirable as to be in effect absolutely necessary."

He (Mr. Rice) did not care, provided a large harbour were made, whether it was a harbour of refuge or a harbour of defence, because a good harbour of defence would be a good harbour of refuge, and a good harbour of refuge would be a good harbour of defence. It was the duty of the Legislature to attend to the commercial interests of the country, and it was the duty of the Government to watch over and provide the means of security, not only for our commerce, but for our coast. He recollected the state of the coast when the country was threatened with an invasion by Buonaparte, and he was quite sure that if another war should arise, steamers might run down upon our coast at any time, unless some efficient means should be taken to prevent them. At the time to which he had referred, if steam-vessels had been employed as much as at present, Napoleon might have easily landed 15,000 or 20,000 men. He did not mean to say that he should have entertained any fear as to the result, but such an occurrence would have tended to destroy the confidence which had been always felt in our insular position. Supposing every one of the invaders to have been cut off, still it would have been shown this country was liable to be exposed to those horrors with which almost every country was visited during the course of the last war. He felt a strong opinion on this subject; and must say, that although England, conscious in her own strength, could afford to stand thus unguarded, yet looking at the great improvement which had taken place in steam navigation, it would be advisable to take every precaution against what might occur in the event of another war. We were now in a state of profound peace, and it was the wish of every right-thinking man in both England and France, that that peace should continue; and he perhaps might here be excused for expressing the satisfaction which he felt at what passed on the occasion of the opening of the Dover railway. The municipal authorities of Boulogne were present, and he was extremely gratified to hear them express their warmest wishes for the continuance of a mutually good understanding between the two countries. He believed that the sentiments of the right hon. Baronet on that subject were fully reciprocated by the French Government. But were the French Government the less active on that account? Were they not increasing their navy, particularly that branch of it which consisted of steam-vessels? He might be wrong, but if so he was of course liable to be corrected; but he believed he was right when he stated, that at the present moment the numerical force of the French steam navy was greater than our own. He did not say that it was more efficient, but he believed it was greater. They had acted according to the old maxim, that the best way of preserving peace was to be prepared for war; and he thought they had acted wisely in taking advantage of a period of profound peace to complete and render efficient the force of their steam navy. They had also improved the whole coast from Dunkirk to Cherbourg—the entrance to the harbours of Calais and Boulogne had been greatly improved, and the harbour and breakwater at Cherbourg were now completed. When he was there in the summer of 1842, there were 400 men employed at the work, and a gallant officer (Captain Taylor), who was examined before the Committee, stated that the harbour of Cherbourg was capable of containing forty sail-of-the-line. When the French Government were thus acting, why were we content to look idly on without doing anything whatever? He asked the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government, when he meant to act on the opinion expressed by him in 1840? He really did hope that they should no longer hear financial objections to the proposal from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. What was the amount of expenditure considered necessary? In the report laid before

Government by the Commission appointed by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer's predecessor in office, to examine the plans and estimates for a harbour of refuge on an extensive scale, the total amount for the three first years was 500,000*l.* At the end of that time, the harbour, it was supposed, would be so far completed, and would then, in order to give it the solidity necessary for all great national works, require a further period of ten years more at an average of 100,000*l.* to render it perfect. Ought such a sum as this to form any reason for longer delay? He believed that no one—not even those Gentlemen who assumed to themselves a peculiar watchfulness over the public purse—would object to the outlay of such a sum for such an object. He hoped, therefore, to hear the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government state that he was prepared to act on the opinion expressed by him on this subject so long ago as 1840. He felt that the subject hardly warranted him in trespassing so long as he had done on the attention of the House; but as the Committee had recommended this subject to their attention, he hoped the House would not deem the observations which he had made irrelevant to the question. The hon. Member concluded by moving,

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that a Commission of scientific and competent persons may be appointed to consider and advise the best means of carrying into effect the recommendation of the Committee on Shipwrecks.”

Sir J. R. Reid as a practical man connected with the shipping interest, had no hesitation in saying, that Dover would be the best place for a harbour of refuge. He did not say so from being one of its Members; but he said so because it was his firm conviction that a harbour of refuge at Dover would be of the greatest benefit to all those connected with the shipping interest. He trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not offer—he would not say some absurd objection—but he hoped he would not offer any objection of a financial kind. There was no difficulty in raising any amount of money at a moderate interest, and nothing would gratify him more than to be entrusted with a commission to raise the amount of money required. He knew the locality and the necessity which existed for a harbour of refuge, and he hoped to hear the right

hon. Baronet opposite state that it was the determination of Government to proceed forthwith to execute so desirable and so excellent a work as that alluded to by his hon. Friend who introduced this subject to their attention. It was with the greatest pleasure that he seconded the Motion.

Sir R. Peel could assure the hon. Gentleman who made this Motion, that the subject had for some time occupied the attention of Government. He had not the least doubt that the object of the hon. Gentleman in bringing forward this Motion, was to promote the interests of humanity; but he thought it rather singular that such a Motion should have been made by one of the Members of Dover, and seconded by the other. He would ask the hon. Gentlemen whether they did not think that there existed a necessity for harbours of refuge in other places besides Dover. In the evidence taken before the Committee, Admiral Dundas asked Captain Washington, "Have you turned your attention to harbours of refuge?" The answer is, "Yes, I have thought a great deal about them. There is a great want of harbours of refuge on the east coast. We have nothing from the Forth to the Humber, an extent of a couple of hundred miles." He had no doubt that some hon. Member representing some place on the eastern coast would tell him that upwards of a million might be usefully expended in the construction of harbours of refuge on that coast, and although the right hon. Baronet the Member for Dover said, that he could raise any amount of money, he did not point out any mode by which it could be repaid. But with regard to Dover being a suitable place for a harbour of refuge, he found there was a difference of opinion on this point, for on referring to the question (1879) put by the gallant Officer opposite (Sir C. Napier) to Captain Washington, he found that the question of the gallant Officer strongly implied that he did not consider Dover a fit place for such a harbour. But take the west coast, and the evidence was most conclusive as to the necessity of having a harbour of refuge, and for facilitating the communication between this country and Ireland, and if he were asked to say what point should be selected for such a harbour, he should certainly select Holyhead. He did not undervalue the considerations thrown out by the hon. Member for Dover with regard to possessing harbours of refuge in the Channel. Considering the recent advance made in the use of steam-vessels, he thought that steam might make such an alteration in naval power as to form an additional reason for their taking into consideration the question of harbours of refuge. There were, no doubt, strong grounds in favour of Dover, but at the same time there were high authorities against it. The opinion of the gallant Commodore opposite was against Dover being selected; and Government felt embarrassed in making up their minds as to which was the best port at which a single harbour of refuge could be constructed. If they were to do anything let them begin with one. Considering the great expense, they could not undertake to construct at once all that were recommended. If they should undertake the work, it would be true economy to make one harbour complete rather than to begin several in an inefficient manner. He thought that such a harbour ought to be made, not only a harbour of refuge, but a great naval harbour, which in case of war could be used offensively and defensively. A great many considerations were to be kept in mind in selecting a port for such a harbour, but three considerations were especially important. Such a harbour should be able to afford refuge for vessels during a storm, it should also be a great naval harbour, capable of being used offensively and defensively in case of war, and it should also be a harbour which could be easily defended from the attacks of an enemy. He had already said that Government had looked at the whole of the evidence, and he had to state, that they were not prepared to submit any proposition to the House at the present time upon the subject. They would reserve altogether the question of expense, and would commit themselves to nothing on this point; but, while so doing, he proposed that they should appoint a Commission, consisting of eminent naval authorities, of persons connected with the commercial marine, and of one or two civil engineers, acquainted with the construction of breakwaters. No satisfactory conclusion could be arrived at until the whole subject had been thoroughly investigated and considered; and he thought he had said enough to show that Government were fully alive to the importance of the question, and that they could not make any proposition until they knew the opinions of the eminent authorities whom he proposed to entrust with the Commission, and by whose recommendations the Government would be in a great measure guided.

Lord R. Grosvenor was understood to ask whether Government contemplated making Holyhead Harbour a harbour for large steamers, and, at the same time, a harbour of refuge? He asked these questions because the determination of Government would be of great importance to the Chester and Holyhead Railway Company.

Sir R. Peel said, that Government had well considered the various reports made relative to the advantages possessed by the different ports on the western coast, for the purpose of facilitating the communication with Dublin and with Ireland generally; and on a consideration of the evidence they had come to a conclusion in favour of Holyhead. Reflections, however, had been made on the impartiality of the persons who made the report, and Government determined to institute a new inquiry. They deputed two naval officers and an eminent civil engineer (Mr. Walker) to make a second examination of the coast, and they confirmed the report previously made. The noble Lord must give the Government a little time to consider the matter further.

Sir C. Napier had hoped that the hon. Member who brought forward this Motion would not have recommended any particular port for the construction of a harbour of refuge; but would have called the attention of the House to the question of harbours of refuge generally. With regard to Dover, he ventured to say, that it was not at all suited for a harbour of refuge. Vessels were detained in the Downs when the wind was west-south-west, and Dover in that case would be of no use to them as a harbour of refuge, because it would be impossible for them to get there. The best place for a harbour of refuge would be somewhere near the Downs. If the right hon. Baronet was determined to undertake the construction of only one harbour, he ought to give the preference to the Downs. Holyhead might be all very well for the purpose of communicating with Ireland, but it was not of the same importance as the Downs in case of a war breaking out with France. He agreed with the right hon. Baronet in the propriety of appointing such a Commission as that proposed, but he hoped that it would not be made a job.

Mr. Rice was very happy to have heard the statement of the right hon. Baronet, which appeared to him as much as he had a right to expect. He offered his thanks to the right hon. Baronet, and he begged leave to withdraw his Motion.

Motion withdrawn.

STEAM COMMUNICATION WITH AMERICA.] Sir V. Blake rose pursuant to notice, to bring under the consideration of the House the subject of the practicability and utility of establishing a ship canal in connection with a railroad from Dublin to Galway, and facilitating the communication between these islands and America. It was but natural and proper of the hon. Members for the town of Dover to advance the local interests of their constituents, and in emulation of that laudable example he would endeavour to show, that the port of refuge that would be most consistent and valuable for the political and commercial interest of the United Kingdom would be the port of Galway. He would briefly state the grounds upon which he founded his claim for this preference. He brought forward this question early in the last Session, but his Motion was then opposed by the right hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel), on the ground that it was a Motion for a Committee of the whole House, and that it ought to have been a Motion for a Select Committee. In this view of the subject the noble Lord for Tiverton (Visc. Palmerston) concurred, and he recommended that the Motion should be withdrawn and the subject brought before the House again in shape of a Motion for a Select Committee. Thus encouraged on both sides, and in compliance with the suggestion of the right hon. Baronet he (Sir V. Blake) now brought forward his Motion for a Select Committee, with the addition that the present Motion comprehended also the execution of a ship canal across Ireland. The hon. Baronet said, it would be easily seen that the present Motion had important reference to the peace and prosperity of Ireland, and dwelt at great length with much ability on the subject of the late monster debate. He (Sir V. Blake) called upon the right hon. Baronet to show some disposition to do justice to Ireland. Let him increase the number of

Irish representatives, and enlarge the Franchise so as to place them on an equality with England. Let him imitate the example of Mr. Pitt when he sent Lord Fitzwilliam to Ireland with ample power to do justice. Let him select such a man as Lord Spencer, with power to sweep out, in one mass, the personification of bigotry by which Dublin Castle had been so long infested. Let him give employment to the people by the establishment of public works of great national importance, such as were now proposed. Let him elevate the most talented man in the Empire to the first judicial seat in Ireland, and then, let him, to crown all, give a six weeks Session in College Green of the Imperial Parliament for the transaction of Irish business only, and then the right hon. Baronet might be placed in the proud elevation of universal confidence and permanent power. With these few observations he would content himself and proceed to the immediate object of his Motion. His plan was to establish a ship canal from Dublin to Galway, and on the bank of that canal he would propose the formation of a railway. The harbour of Galway was formed by nature into one of the noblest harbours of refuge in the United Kingdom—it would be a harbour of protection in case of war, and a harbour of refuge against the elements, to protect the commercial marine of the country throughout the year. [Here the hon. Baronet read a letter from Sir James Anderson in support of his views, and referred to several authorities.] The writer of that letter intimated that there was a new company about being formed to carry out the design of a newly-invented steam-carriage, by which it was intended to be proposed to the Government to carry the mails gratis to Holyhead, in nine hours, and from Dublin to Galway in four hours, without the necessity of the expenditure of 500,000*l.* over the Menai, without which expenditure the present steam cannot proceed to Holyhead. The Railway Commissioners were directed to inquire and report with reference to the most expeditious mode of communication with America across Ireland, and in their report they recommended the establishment of the harbour of Cork, which was an erroneous recommendation, for as expedition in the post-office department was the object, they should have selected the port which was nearest to Dublin, and equally near to America; the time that would elapse after the arrival of a vessel at Cork or Valentia, before that arrival would be notified in Dublin, would be just twice as much as when the communication would be between Galway and Dublin. Besides the Commissioners' reports related to railways, and to the probability of remuneration by the internal trade of Ireland. It had no relation whatever to the making of a ship canal; that was a project which originated several years ago with an Irish nobleman (Lord Cloncurry). He, at his own expense, employed eminent engineers to ascertain the practicability of the execution of a ship canal to Galway. The facility of the undertaking was demonstrated to exceed the most sanguine expectations—meetings were held in Liverpool and Dublin. The gallant and hon. Baronet (the Member for Liverpool) was present at the Liverpool meeting, and was afterwards examined in the House of Lords; and by a paper ordered to be printed on the 11th of August, 1834, it appeared the gallant Officer deposed that he was so present, and that the project of a ship canal was universally applauded. [Sir Howard Douglas was not in the country in 1839.] He spoke from official documents printed by order of the House in 1834, and consequently did not refer to the year 1839. In this last-mentioned year the noble Lord, the Chief Secretary for Ireland under the late Administration, brought forward his proposition in that House for the application of 2,500,000*l.* of the public money for the construction of a railway; that railway would have traversed the country longitudinally, and the distance of its termination would be twice as great, and the expense of construction would be twice as much as the cost of constructing a railway between Dublin and the nearest harbour on the western coast of Ireland. This proposition fell to the ground when Lord Morpeth went out of power, and so the matter rested till the last Session, when the hon. Member for Roscommon renewed the proposition of Lord Morpeth. But that Motion was strenuously opposed by the right hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel), who objected to the Motion on the mere grounds that the State should not interfere in matters of that kind, and that it would be much better to leave them to private speculation. The hon. Baronet proceeded to quote the evidence of Sir John Burgoyne, and many other authorities, and concluded by an impressive appeal to the Government to take this and every other opportunity to alleviate the distress of the Irish people and give them employment. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving, that

"A Select Committee to inquire and report how far it might be practicable, expedient, and useful to promote a more speedy intercourse between Great Britain and America, by the establishment of steam carriages (in connection with a ship canal also to be executed) across Ireland, and thence by steam communication across the Atlantic Ocean."

The Motion having been put,

Sir R. Peel said, it would be impossible for the House to concur in the Motion of the hon. Baronet without consenting to make Galway the particular port of communication between the United Kingdom and the United States, and it would, therefore, be highly inexpedient to acquiesce in a Motion of this kind, emanating from an hon. Member, representing a local interest, as other hon. Members representing other interests might claim a similar privilege. Without disguising the importance of others, still having regard to the great interests of Ireland, the Railway Commissioners in their report recommended two great lines of railway as the preferable means of communication in that country, one a south-western and the other a northern line, and of the south-western line they proposed that Cork should be the terminus, deeming that port the most convenient packet station or port of call in the event of a communication being established with America through Ireland. Should this line be determined on, it could not fail to confer benefit on Galway. The Commissioners did not recommend the construction of any railroads which could interfere with the interests of the two great canals, in which a large amount of property was invested. He had that day had an interview with some Gentlemen who were disposed to construct a railway in the direction of Galway to Cashel, and who would, if they had succeeded in serving their notices sufficiently early, have brought in a Bill for that purpose during the present Session. He trusted that they would be able to bring it in early in the ensuing Session of Parliament. Under these circumstances, where the object was in a fair way of accomplishment by means of private enterprise, he thought the interference of Parliament would be injudicious, and therefore suggested the withdrawal of the present Motion, as likely to have a prejudicial effect on the efforts of those who were endeavouring to accomplish the same object in a legitimate way.

Mr. Sergeant Murphy rejoiced to hear that a probability existed of the construction of a railway between Dublin and Cashel by individual enterprise, the effect of which must be a great stimulus to the investment of capital and the employment of labour in Ireland. He hoped, therefore, that if after Easter they came prepared with their Bill, the House would give their favourable attention to the subject, and consent to the suspension of the Standing Orders, which had been done on a former occasion with so beneficial a result. In reference to the right hon. Baronet's observations respecting the demands likely to be made by other Members representing local interests, he could only say that his regard for the interests of Cork would never make him regret an advantage conferred on Galway.

Sir V. Blake replied, the Commission issued, had reference to voyages from land to land with sailing vessels only. Post Office expedition was not the primary object, nor were steam vessels then in existence. If Post Office expedition had been the primary object, the ports of Cork or Valentia would not be thought of, because the distance of those ports from Dublin would be an insuperable objection, in as much as the nearest western port to Dublin, was equally as near to America, as Cork or Valentia. The preference given by the Commissioners to Cork harbour, would not have been so given if a ship canal was contemplated, and upon looking to a work published in Ireland by that early, constant, talented, and patriotic advocate, for the execution of railways in Ireland, Thomas Birmingham, Esq., it will appear that the able and eminent engineers, Messrs. Bald and Henry, have actually made a survey of the line from Dublin to Galway, and report that that line consists of a "series of levels, straightness of line, and cheapness of execution as yet unequalled in railway engineering." One thing is certain, that whatever difference of opinion may exist as to railways, none can exist as to the station of the line for a ship canal—nature has ordered that Galway should be selected for that purpose, if ever it be executed—nor would the interests of the Grand Canal be prejudiced as the property would be purchased for the purpose of executing the ship canal, on the line now occupied by the Grand Canal—and the Grand Canal proprietors would probably become parties in the more comprehensive national undertaking. In the event of a war with France, you must have a ship canal across Ireland, or the trade of Liverpool will be extinguished—the responsibility belongs to the right hon. Baronet. He had done his duty in bringing the matter forward, while there was time to anticipate and prevent the evil, consequent upon a war, which will be a war of extermination on the one side or on the other.

Motion withdrawn.

[THE CLONTARF PROCLAMATION.] Colonel Rawdon rose, in pursuance of his notice, to move a resolution—

“That it is the opinion of this House, upon considering the lateness of the period at which was issued the Proclamation of the Irish Government, intended to prevent the assembling of a meeting announced to be holden at or near Clontarf on the 8th day of October, 1843, that a risk of disastrous collision was incurred, and a precedent thereby created dangerous to the lives and liberties of Her Majesty’s subjects.”

He had not yet heard a satisfactory reason why Ireland, and the Representatives of the Irish people, should not call upon the House for that which had not yet been given, viz., the expression of its opinion upon that Proclamation. He gave the noble Lord (Lord Eliot) full credit for being sincerely anxious to perform the duties of his office for the benefit of Ireland, and he was quite sure every Irish Member who had heard the noble Lord’s speech must be convinced of the deep sympathy he felt for the Irish people. But he charged the Government of which the noble Lord was a Member, in reference to the Clontarf Proclamation, with supineness and inactivity, and with a neglect of their duty which might have led to the most deplorable results. It had been happily said by the right hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Macaulay) that the Government had been weighing words when they should have been weighing lives. If he understood the facts correctly, the noble Lord the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had left London for Ireland on the Wednesday, but it appeared that he did not arrive in Dublin until the

Friday morning. Seeing the necessity for his presence, why had he not as he might have arrived on the Thursday? The Council, it appeared, met on the Friday, and deliberated, and why was not the Proclamation issued on Friday? They had as yet received no explanation of the delay. A Proclamation was the exercise of a portion of the Royal Prerogative; but the Proclamation issued by the Irish Government was destitute of the most beautiful feature of the Prerogative—mercy. The Proclamation was not issued till the Saturday night when the meeting was to take place on the Sunday. It had been asserted that it was issued early on the Saturday, but he had received a letter that day which said—

“There can be no question whatever that three o’clock, or a few minutes before, on the Saturday afternoon, was the earliest moment at which the Proclamation was issued. I am surprised at the statement of Sir Robert Peel that the Government Proclamation was out early on the Saturday, for he must have known the contrary.”

The right hon. Baronet at the head of the Home Department, and the noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland, stated that measures had been taken for posting up the Proclamation, immediately upon its being issued, in all places within thirty miles of Dublin. The hon. and gallant Member read several documents containing declarations from various persons in humble life in Dublin, as to the hour at which the issuing of the Proclamation became generally known in Dublin, and the towns around it. One person had gone on the evening of Saturday to Leighlin town, where he saw no Proclamation; and at Bray, at a quarter past ten o’clock at night, there was no Proclamation posted. Another person had gone to Maynooth on the evening in question. He started from Dublin at ten o’clock, and passed various populous towns, amongst others, Farmer’s town, where he had seen no Proclamation posted. He reached Maynooth at half-after two o’clock next morning, where the Proclamation was generally exhibited. Surely, these declarations proved that the instructions issued by Government to post up the Proclamation had not been observed. The persons whose declarations he had read were ready, he believed to depose on oath to their statements, and they added that the police had information of the intended proceedings of Government with regard to the people. Was such the conduct of a paternal Government? Surely, when information was given to the police it might have been given at the same time to the people. The declaration of the guard of the Naas caravan was to the effect that he had not seen the Proclamation on the evening on which it was issued in any of the towns betwixt Dublin and Naas. In some instances the people were only informed of it, next morning, through the medium of their clergymen. A bill-sticker in Dublin who might be supposed to be a tolerably good judge of such matters, stated that he had not seen the Proclamations stuck up in the principal streets in Dublin until four o'clock, when he saw a policeman posting one up with wafers. Now, if the places to which he had alluded were English towns, the proceedings of the Government in regard to their delay in posting up the Proclamations would not have been allowed to pass without severe question. With reference to the Cavalry Proclamation issued by the Repealers, of which so much had been said, and upon which the defence of the Ministry had so specially rested; that Proclamation appeared in The Nation newspaper upon the Saturday week before the Clontarf meeting. As soon as it became known at the Corn Exchange that such an article had appeared, a message was sent to The Nation office, and another edition was published without the Proclamation. The Pilot evening newspaper appeared without it. It was well known for three weeks previously, that the Clontarf meeting was to take place. The fact had been advertised over and over again. The Cavalry Proclamation had been suggested upon the Friday, and left at the office of The Nation for publication that night. It was his firm belief that had it not been for the Repeal Association—had it not been for the indefatigable exertions of the hon. Member for Cork, a collision would have taken place at Clontarf between the military and the people. He complained that the Proclamation had not been published in The Gazette before the meeting, at all events it should have been published upon Friday; it actually appeared in the Gazette upon the Monday after the meeting. Now, if this had been done exclusively by Irishmen, how much they would have heard of blunders of the Irish—of the new mode of warning people of danger after the danger was over. Why, the people in many cases, as stated by the declaration he held in his hand, believed that both the Government Proclamation and Mr. O'Connell's counter proclamations were hoaxes issued by the Orange party. Many people even went in the direction of Clontarf, and were only convinced that the Proclamation had really been issued by the formidable array of troops near the place, and by the exertions of Mr. Steele, who had the blessing of God upon his head that day, as one of the instruments in warding off an appalling massacre. From these facts, therefore, the House must draw the inference, that the people had not been sufficiently warned. Adverting to the circumstance that the Clontarf meeting was called principally upon the requisition of clergymen, he thought that it was curious that the Government should have prohibited that particular meeting. It was well known that people had come to attend the meeting from Liverpool and Manchester. Now, could it be believed that the same wind which wafted them across the Channel, also brought over vessels of troops for the suppression of the meeting. Surely notice should have been given on the English side of the Channel of the intentions of Government as to the suppression of the meeting. It was notorious that the meetings up to the time of the Clontarf assemblage had been perfectly peaceable and tranquil. He was in Italy when he heard of the Clontarf Proclamation; and he certainly thought that something was expected at that meeting different from what had taken place at the others; that the Government were in possession of some information respecting it, of which the public knew nothing. But the result proved that such was not the case. Donnybrook, where a meeting had already taken place, was much in the same position, as regarded Dublin, as Clontarf, so that no objection could be taken to the latter on the score of situation. Some difference should have been made between the Proclamations issued to put down the meetings in Wales and Ireland. The Welsh meetings were attended with riot and violence—the people there were disguised, and armed with guns. But in Ireland nothing of the kind had taken place—no circumstance had occurred which could have given the Government cause to fear a breach of the peace. The people met constitutionally to express an opinion—to express in the face of heaven an opinion against the justice of the Act of Union. He considered that there was no crime in that—he considered these meetings more in the light of their forming a safety valve than anything else. But there was another difference between the Welsh and the Irish Proclamations. The Welsh Proclamation called on "civil officers" to repress the outrages—the Irish Proclamation was addressed to the "officers connected with the preservation of the peace." Now he thought that this would apply to military as well as civil officers. He might be wrong, but still that inference might be drawn. By the wording of the Proclamation Government condemned itself; for it was clear, upon their own showing, that if the meetings should have been suppressed at all, they should have been suppressed long before the issue of the Proclamation forbidding the Clontarf meeting. So far as he could see, the military arrangements for the suppression of the meeting were well conducted, but at the same time he believed that, so great was the tranquillity and order of the people, that a corporal, with a file of men, could have effected the object. But complete as those military arrangements were, proper precaution had not been taken—due notice had not been given to the people. By their having permitted similar meetings so long, Government must be understood to have connived at them, and surely a better reason should have been given for their late and arbitrary proceeding than some miserable allusions to the cavalry Proclamation. By affirming his Motion, the House would show that they were alive to, and jealously watchful of the exercise of the Prerogative of Proclamation, and as mindful of the public peace and prosperity. He would tell the House that it would be a dangerous thing to allow the impression to go back to Ireland that they were not to have equal justice. Ireland was asking for equal laws, but it was also asking for equal justice. That equal justice it was determined to have, but by refusing to entertain a resolution on the subject—so guardedly worded as it was—he thought that they would be incurring a heavy responsibility. The hon. and gallant Member concluded by proposing his resolution.

Mr. Villiers Stuart seconded the resolution. Although he thought that it was brought forward under disadvantageous circumstances, not on account of the unwillingness of the House to listen to it, for he was bound to say that they had paid the utmost attention to the gallant Member, but in consequence of the long debate which had recently taken place in reference to Ireland,—notwithstanding this, he yet felt, that however unwilling he was to take a part in the present question, he would be neglecting his duty if he failed in coming forward to support it. It would certainly have been more consistent with their duty to the public if the Government had given a more early, a much more early, notice to those parties who intended to attend these great meetings, that they were in so doing acting illegally. There was danger likely to arise from the postponement of the Proclamation till so late a period as the Saturday preceding the Sunday on which this intended meeting was to take place, from the fevered and anxious state of mind of the friends of Repeal, who looked to the Clontarf meeting with the most excited interest, and were actually on their way to it from the neighbouring counties of Ireland. He would ask the noble Lord who represented the Government of Ireland in that House, why was it that the Crown Solicitor (Mr. Kemmis), who acknowledged that he might have done so, did not file his affidavits upon which this Proclamation was founded three weeks sooner? This was the more necessary when the advisers of the Crown must have been aware of the condition in which all who joined in these great meetings involved themselves, namely, that by so joining they rendered themselves liable to prosecution for all the consequences of the Repeal Agitation. But this was not the only instance of neglect the Government displayed in reference to those transactions. It appeared to him that when they were called upon more particularly to be present they had thought proper, under some pretext, to absent themselves and run away. Indeed, it would appear to him, from all the inexplicable conduct of the Irish Government at the time, that there was something radically imperfect and wrong in the constitution of the Irish Executive Government. It would, perhaps, be better that its form should be changed, and that the Irish people should be no longer subject to any but an effective and responsible Government, perfectly adequate on occasions like this to act without waiting for instructions from the Cabinet Ministers. Under these circumstances he felt it was desirable—for the sake more particularly of the effect such a vote would produce upon the minds of the Irish people—that a Vote should be taken upon the Motion of the hon. and gallant Officer, and it should therefore have his decided support.

Lord Eliot must answer the speeches of the mover and seconder of the resolutions almost in the words used by himself and by his right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department in the late Debate. He must say, that when the whole conduct of the Government of Ireland was made the subject of a nine days' Debate, on which the House had pronounced, a strong and decided opinion, if the present course could be justified, a discussion might again be revived on every particular act of that Government. He, nevertheless, was not disposed to shrink from all or any portion of the responsibility imposed upon him in consequence of the part which he had taken relative to the intended Repeal Meeting at Clontarf. The serious indisposition of his noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had appeared to most persons acquainted with the fact as a sufficient apology for his temporary absence from his government in the hope of re-establishing his health. The Lord Chancellor of Ireland had been unremittingly engaged in the business of his Court for many months, and it was but proper and customary that at that period of the year he should be enabled to enjoy some recreation. With respect to the character of the proposed Meeting at Clontarf it had quite altered from what it appeared on the first announcement of it to be, and that would be seen by the placards which were circulated immediately preceding the day appointed for the meeting. At first the invitation was addressed only to the people of Fingal, a district of inconsiderable extent. Subsequently the intention that was announced by means of placards, of mustering and marching in military array, through the streets of Dublin, large bodies of horsemen, perfectly authorised, or rather made it the duty of the Government to prevent the meeting. Indeed, if he had been left alone, and without the means of communicating with the Government here, he should have considered it to be his duty to assume all the responsibility of the act, and issue the Proclamation. The alterations that took place in the placards subsequently, such as substituting groups for troops, and which also appeared in the advertisement in the Nation, one of the papers of the Repeal party, could not be supposed to change the character of the meeting. It would be worse than quibbling to attempt to maintain that this artifice at all altered the object or the nature of the meeting. But he had thought it advisable to apprise

the Government here of that alteration of this advertisement, and of the placards upon the 2nd of October, and it was not until the 4th that that communication reached London. A fresh consultation became necessary, and it was then determined by Her Majesty's Ministers, that the Lord Lieutenant and the Lord Chancellor, should return forthwith to Dublin, and that if circumstances remained unchanged, the Lord Lieutenant in Council should issue a Proclamation, prohibiting the Meeting. On Friday morning they reached Dublin. In the afternoon of that day a Meeting of the Members of the Government took place. The Lord Lieutenant, the Lord Chancellor, the Commander of the Forces, the Master of the Rolls, the Attorney and Solicitor General, and himself were present; and it was determined that a Proclamation should be issued. A Proclamation was accordingly drawn up that evening, and submitted the following morning to the Privy Council: by two o'clock on that day, it was in the hands of the printer. Immediately upon its appearance there were placards posted on the walls of Dublin, in which the conduct of the Irish Government, and even the language of the Proclamation, were commented upon and censured. The hon. Gentleman had referred to letters relating to the time at which the Proclamation was posted in Dublin and its neighbourhood. His evidence was of a negative character, for the gentleman on whose authority he relied only said that he did not see any Proclamation. He (Lord Eliot) held in his hand a statement under the authority of Colonel M'Gregor, whose veracity was unimpeachable,—a statement which was signed and certified by the officers of the Constabulary Force under his command, about the stations within a circuit of nearly thirty miles round Dublin, where it was stated that at Howth, the Proclamation was posted at seven p.m. of the evening of Saturday; at Julianstown, seven p.m.; at Bray, at five o'clock; at Celbridge, between seven and eight p.m.; at Wicklow, between seven and eight p.m.; at Kilcock, at eight p.m.; at Drogheda, at nine p.m.; and so on. These meetings did not take place until one o'clock in the afternoon, and this very Proclamation which summoned the Repeal Cavalry did not summon them to meet in the heart of Dublin until twelve o'clock on Sunday; and, therefore, he contended that there was sufficient notice to parties proceeding to Dublin, and that very slight inconvenience and no danger was occasioned to any persons by the delay. He could speak from his own knowledge that he saw the Proclamation posted on the quays, and in many other parts of Dublin. It was in the hands of the persons at the Corn Exchange before three o'clock on Saturday. It was admitted that the military measures were well taken. It was true that there was a large and overwhelming force, but that was done from motives of humanity, to prevent any danger from the people taking possession of the ground. He regretted that any individual should have been inconvenienced. If he was, it arose from unforeseen circumstances over which the Government had no control. He did not contend that the meetings on previous occasions had been illegal, and there was no reason to apprehend till the Saturday, on which the placard had appeared, that this meeting would have differed from the others. The hon. Gentleman had commented on the policy of allowing meetings to Petition as a safety valve of the Constitution. In the course of the meetings, which spread over a period of nine months, he did not believe that a single Petition had been adopted, and therefore those meetings were only meetings under the pretence of Petitioning. The hon. Gentleman who seconded the amendment had said that Government were in possession of means of instituting a prosecution before the Clontarf meetings. He (Lord Eliot) had already said, that Government would have been guilty of a dereliction of duty if they had allowed a meeting, under such circumstances, to take place in the heart of Dublin. Although Clontarf was at some little distance, yet the assemblage of these men on horseback, and in military array, would have been a defiance of all law and of all order. The Government entertained no moral doubt whatever of the existence of a dangerous conspiracy, but had not obtained that legal evidence which would have enabled them, with hopes of success, to prosecute the parties. He believed he might appeal with confidence to the Attorney General for Ireland if the first proceedings were not taken the very moment Government were in possession of evidence which they believed would enable them to prosecute with effect. He denied that there was any intention of entrapping the people into the commission of crime, and indeed he was happy to find that that charge had been withdrawn. Under these circumstances he thought the hon. Gentleman had no ground for calling on the House of Commons to express its disapprobation of the conduct of Government in respect to the Clontarf Proclamation.

Mr. Somers protested against the sophistry of the noble Lord. There was no getting over the fact that it was by a miracle almost that a large unarmed multitude was not brought in contact with an overwhelming force, when the slightest accident might have occasioned an indiscriminate butchery. The present Government received Ireland prosperous and peaceful, and it was now a camp.

Mr. Sharman Crawford said, the noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland had objected to this discussion on the ground that the whole question of Ireland had been so fully debated on the recent occasion, but he did not see any reason why every question relating to Ireland should not be repeatedly discussed in that House. With regard to the delay in issuing the Proclamation, if the Lord Lieutenant were obliged on every occasion to refer to the English Government and consult with them, where was the use of that Functionary? He contended that the use of the words "troops" in the Repeal Proclamation did not constitute illegality. The noble Lord said that the illegality of the meeting arose from the Notice, which indicated that the people were to assemble in military order. Had they not assembled in military order before? Did the mere use of the word "troops" constitute illegality, when such things had been done before? But he denied that the appearance of military array constituted the illegality of the meeting. There were precedents, in Irish history, of military array being adopted for thirteen years and not noticed by the Government. When the Orange processions took place, they formed in military array and carried arms and fired shots. The noble Lord said the real purpose of the meetings was not to prepare petitions, but was the noble Lord in the House on a previous day when the hon. and learned Member for Cork presented a whole pile of petitions agreed to at those meetings? He gave the most decided support to the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend, and he hoped that more Motions of a like kind would be made on other points connected with the late proceedings. He trusted that some constitutional lawyer would yet take up the conduct of the Attorney General for Ireland in the Court during the late trial, which he could regard in no other light than as an insult to the dignity of justice, an outrage on the bench, and a dangerous attack on the liberties of the subject.

Mr. E. B. Roche would support the Motion on the ground that Ministers had not meted out the same measure of justice to Ireland in this case as they would have done under similar circumstances to England. Whatever were their motives, the effects of their acts might, perhaps, have been to have created a slaughter of the people on the ground of Clontarf, had it not been for the aid they received from the hon. and learned Member for Cork. Government ought to have had recourse to a Baal-fire on the top of the castle of Dublin, to give notice of the stoppage of the meeting; if they chose to wait till the night before, they ought to have employed some extraordinary means to spread the intelligence. He did not doubt that the military measures had been good, and that the ground had been judiciously occupied; but the publication of the Proclamation would have served little purpose had it not been for the aid of the hon. and learned Member for Cork. He did not know why so much stress had been laid on the gasconade inserted by some senseless blockhead in the Nation newspaper. Every party had some brainless fools attached to it; but was a nation to run the risk of being plunged into civil war because some foolish thing was done which was not acknowledged by the party? He thought the hon. and gallant Officer was quite right in bringing forward this Motion. It was the contemptuous treatment which Irish affairs and the claims of the Irish people received at the hands of that House which had made him a firm and decided Repealer, and he should continue to be so, so long as there was one measure of justice for England and another for Ireland. He had but one course to pursue, and that was, in spite of the threats of Gentlemen opposite, to continue the Agitation of the Question of Repeal, as long as he could, and as ardently as he could within the limits of the Constitution.

INCLOSURE OF COMMONS.] Lord Worsley said, it would be in the recollection of the House that he had, last Session, brought forward a measure for facilitating the Inclosure of Commons, but in consequence of the late period of the Session he had not persevered with the Bill. It was important, in considering this subject, to bear in mind the resolution which had been passed by the House, and adopted into the Standing Orders, with the object of reserving a certain portion of every tract of waste land on its inclosure, for the health and recreation of the people residing in the vicinity. He believed that a very erroneous impression existed as to the effects with which the inclosure of land was attended, in reference to the interests and to the amusements of the humble classes of the community. It was his opinion that if the management of the waste lands were placed under a Board properly constituted, the result would be found to be, that in many places where there was now very great difficulty in finding employment for the poor, there would be, in the course of eight or ten years, a very large number of persons employed in draining the land and inclosing it; that additional encouragement would be given to the poor to cultivate the land, to say nothing of the increased produce they might expect to obtain from it. He was connected with a county in which agricultural improvements had been carried into effect to a very great extent. Looking to the state in which that county now was, and its condition thirty years ago, and to the facilities which modern science placed in their hands for further improvements, he did not despair of seeing a very large portion of England, which was capable of being cultivated, brought into a high state of tillage, and that, be it remembered, by employing persons who were now lamentably in want of employment. He had obtained much information from persons who were well acquainted with the great changes which had taken place in the course of the last generation in the agriculture of this country, and had received communications from persons who were well entitled to be considered as authorities on this subject, which all tended to confirm the views he had endeavoured to express. It might be said, why do not parties now come to Parliament for power to inclose lands capable of improvement? The answer was, that the expense of passing an Act for that purpose through the House was so great as very generally to deter them from doing so; and he believed that this was the reason why parties did not oftener apply for Inclosure Bills. He had received a letter from a gentleman of the county of Norfolk, which said,

"There is a piece of common in this parish, on which feed asses and three-quarter starved horses and cattle, which are a disgrace to the county. All the owners interested are anxious to inclose the land, but are deterred by a dread of the enormous expenses of an Act of Parliament and the lawyers' charges. I have now before me a statement of the expense of procuring an Act for a small inclosure in this neighbourhood."

The items were as follow:—

Parliamentary Agents.....	£309	13	5
Solicitors .....	336	15	2
Ditto Clerkship .....	206	1	10
Ditto Award, &c.....	168	12	10
	£1,021	3	3
Commissioner, Surveyor, &c.	692	13	9
	£1,713	17	0

This business might have been completed by the Tithe Commissioners for less than 500*l*. There was a Return presented to the House last year, showing the great amount of land which was still in a waste state throughout England and Wales, but referring only to those districts in which the Tithe Commutation had been effected. It appeared from this Return, which was delivered in June, 1843, that of 6,718,523 acres in England, there were 1,358,419 acres of common or waste land; and of 1,877,502 acres in Wales, there were 501,815 common or waste. He had a letter from a gentleman of much experience in North Wales on this subject. He had written to this gentleman, being fearful that what he had heard might not be correct, as although there was much waste land in Wales capable of cultivation, still there were large mountain tracts in Merionethshire and other counties which were not susceptible of tillage. That gentleman said,

"It is true that large tracts of mountain land in Wales cannot be cultivated as corn-land; but these tracts, comprising the greater part of the counties of Caernarvon and Merioneth, would not be affected by the contemplated Inclosure Bill, as they are already held in severalty as distinct sheep-walks, many of them even being inclosed with stone walls. The Snowden range is all thus already private property, and most of the higher hills. The remaining mountain pasturage, which might not perhaps be well adapted to tillage, would experience the great benefit of being allotted in severalty, like the Snowden range; by which each proprietor would be enabled to ascertain his lands, and the contention caused by the disputes perpetually arising as to rights of common extinguished. Large portions of the lower hills, which would be the object embraced by the Bill, are capable of great improvement, and this comprises all the range in a circular direction round the great mountain masses, from the promontory at Lluyn, in Carnarvonshire, through the counties of Denbigh and Flint to Montgomeryshire. Certainly, many of the best parts in this district have been enclosed under special Acts of Parliament for that purpose, but the operation of them has been so expensive as to check any probable continuance of such measures. There still remains much that would be essentially benefited under the operation of some of the provisions of the Bill. There probably may be in North Wales 100,000 acres or more remaining, for which the measure would be applicable."

He had heard yesterday, on this subject from a gentleman in the county of Surrey, in which it appeared there were upwards of 60,000 acres of waste land. Although he did not pretend to say that all this could be cultivated, he was assured that there were many large pieces of ground, now useless wastes, which could be brought under cultivation and which would well repay the expenditure necessary for that purpose. In the Bill he now moved for leave to bring in, he should propose to give power to those who were to carry it out, not only of inclosing, but also of regulating the right of pasture on the commons. He would refer to a letter from a Gentleman in Wales, which he held in his hand, showing the necessity of such a provision. He said:—

"During the last year a neighbour of mine, who kept about 1,500 sheep on a range of hills called Radnor-forest (absorbing thereby the pasture on which very many others had rights), kept two men for the whole year as fighting men, in addition to his regular shepherds. It was their duty to quarrel with and challenge any shepherd or farmer who attempted to put sheep on the hill engrossed by this man. One of the men was convicted for an assault and frightened away, but I believe the evil still prevails."

Thus it was evident that the rich were very often benefited by these wastes. In the Report of the Committee that sat last year upon allotments to the labouring poor, there was some evidence by Mr. Mott, which showed not only the vast extent of uninclosed land in the north of England but also that a great deal of it might be brought into cultivation. A farmer in Yorkshire also deposed that some of this was very good land, and would be profitable if properly cultivated; but that in consequence of the great expense of an application to Parliament, there was no intention of inclosing it, although there was great anxiety to do so. The same witness, alluding to other populous places in Yorkshire, stated his opinion that the greatest benefit would accrue from bringing the land into cultivation, and that if the first expense were got over parties would be ready to invest their capital. There were 18,000 or 20,000 acres of waste land around Bingley, a great deal of which was good, and a petition had been presented by the Board of Guardians stating their strong impression of the importance of a measure for general inclosure. Mr. Mott stated, that he believed there were in Lancashire 200,000 acres of uncultivated land, and in answer to the question whether the improvement of the land would repay the outlay, he stated that land valued at 30,000*l.* would be worth 50,000*l.* What he (Lord Worsley) wished to propose was, that Commissioners should be appointed as Inclosure Commissioners, and that some such plan should be adopted, as that if two-thirds in value of the parties interested in the land, either as common land, or land in common, should wish to have it inclosed, there should be a meeting called, and that then they should make an application to the Commissioners, who would send down Assistant Commissioners who would take into consideration, not only the interests of the parties, but the locality and the general advantages to be derived from the inclosure. Then, if they should be of opinion, that it would be advantageous to have the inclosure, they would so report to the Commissioners. A day would then be appointed for hearing the claims, and after award should have been given upon them, a certain notice should be given to enable the parties to object. Then if one-fourth of the parties objected to the inclosure being proceeded with, they should petition the House of Commons, and give notice to the Commissioners not to proceed until six weeks after the meeting of Parliament, or after the date of the notice. He thought that plan would prevent all hardship upon the parties, by giving power to that House to adopt the inclosure if they thought it right, and if not, it would prevent great expense and loss. He assured the House, that he had endeavoured to form the Bill with a strict regard to the rights of the poor commoners, also considering well whether it would be advantageous to the parties to whom the property belonged, as likewise to the population of the surrounding districts; and he hoped the House would allow him to bring in the measure. Much evil had arisen from local acts not having in some instances been fully carried out, and in others unfairly, the consequence of which was, that many persons holding common lands, but really having no title, had been put to great inconvenience in the sale or transfer. He proposed, then, that instead of putting them to the expense of applying to Parliament for powers, an application to the Commissioners should be sufficient. Some hon. Members were anxious that provision should be made for allotments to the poor; and he conceived that a general inclosure measure was so much wanted, and would be of so much benefit to the country, that if a majority of the House should be of opinion such a clause ought to be added, he would not abandon the bill on that account, although he might not approve such an addition. The noble Lord concluded by moving for leave to bring in "A bill to facilitate the Inclosure and improvement of commons and lands held in common; the exchange of lands, and the division of intermixed lands; to provide remedies for the defective or incomplete execution of the powers of general and local Inclosure Acts, and to provide for the revival of such powers in certain cases."

Colonel Sibthorp knew that it was considered in this House uncourteous to oppose the bringing-in of a Bill, and regretted that he considered it his duty to oppose the Motion. He assured the noble Lord that he gave him every credit for his desire to support the landed interest, and for being an excellent landed proprietor, but when he looked at the Bill he could not but oppose it. It contained 140 clauses affecting the country generally. Innovation was at best a dangerous thing; and he had seen in his own time so many dangerous results from innovations—for instance the Reform Bill, which had done everything to cause revolution—railroads, and other dangerous novelties—that he felt disposed to oppose everything savouring of innovation. The noble Lord attempted to force this Bill through in a former Session of Parliament, though on its introduction he (Colonel Sibthorp) might have counted out the House, had not courtesy prevented him from doing so. The Bill was brought in on the 2nd of June, 1843, and read a second time on the 14th, but afterwards fell to the ground. Why, he knew not, except that the noble Lord found that the House did not approve of it. His great objection to it was, that it was too general an Act to be brought in by any private Member of the House, and that if it were a measure deserving of consideration, and for the public good, it should be left to the Government to bring it in. Hon. Members opposite talked much of the rights of the poor, but why bring in a Bill to deprive them of the means of recreation and amusement? Why not let them play with their boys and girls, and enjoy the manly and healthful sports of foot-ball, cricket, bowls, and hurling, as they and their fathers had enjoyed for ages? There was another question he would wish to ask. The noble Lord the Commissioner of the Woods and Forests was every day labouring to open wide streets to give free air to the people of the metropolis; but by enclosing these commons they would not only deprive the poorer classes of their pastimes, but in some degree deprive all classes in the neighbourhood of the free circulation of air which they had hitherto enjoyed. Then they were to have a host of Commissioners and Assistant Commissioners and Clerks, and, as a matter of course, a fair amount of jobbing. Who was to pay the Commissioners? This Bill would diminish the protection which the farmer and occupier of the soil now enjoyed, as it would give a power to any one proprietor to call a meeting at any time or place he thought proper, and there originate proceedings for enclosure, which would deprive others of their rights, or, in defending these rights, entail on them heavy and indefinite expense. There was another objection to the Bill—that it gave an absolute veto to the Lord of the Manor, and enabled him to say to the other proprietors, "Unless you accede to my demands, you shall have no inclosure." That was a power none but a Dey of Algiers would require. There were many other objectionable provisions, to which it was unnecessary for him then to allude. The noble Lord had quoted a few letters from Surrey, Yorkshire, Lancashire, and Wales, but was that sufficient to justify the House of Commons in reading, even for the first time, a measure so extensive and novel? It was a dangerous precedent to allow such a measure to emanate from a private individual. The right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Home Department, should take it up, and assure the noble Lord that his endeavours should not be forgotten on so important a measure. As a public servant he felt it his duty to oppose this Bill, and should take the sense of the House on the first reading. He had gone to a division only on one occasion; and on that he had not been so unfortunate as not to hope for success now. The noble Lord might urge that the Bill should be allowed to pass the first and second reading, and that it might be fully considered in Committee; but he had seen enough of the mode in which business was managed in that House to know that nothing was better than stopping such a measure in limine, for if it went through the first reading, vires acquirit eundo. Many a wicked man would have been saved from the commission of numerous crimes if he had been only hanged for the first one.

Mr. Trelawny should not have addressed the House on the present occasion, had he not opposed the Inclosure Bill brought in by the noble Lord last year. He was prepared, however, to support the introduction of the present Bill, in consequence of an understanding he had received, that provision would be made in it for the healthful recreation of the working classes. It was evident, that if all the land now unenclosed became enclosed without reference to this, hereafter large towns would grow up near which the people would find no place to enjoy themselves. It seemed to him that a small tax would be levied on parties proposing to enclose in order to create a fund by which ground might hereafter be purchased when required for towns not now in existence. One thing should not be forgotten, that the speculation ought to be profitable without the aid of a Corn-law. For, looking at the present state of public opinion, no one could believe that law would stand; of course, there was always this advantage in enclosing, that the consumer must gain if the speculation be economically sound, to the extent of the expenses of the importation of a given quantity of corn. Under all circumstances, then, he would support the Bill on its first reading, on the understanding, that if, on attentive perusal, it seemed unsatisfactory in the points interesting to him, he should be at liberty to oppose it in a future stage.

Lord J. Manners supported the Motion, but he should be most anxious, at a future stage, to promote the introduction into the Bill of provisions, for securing that which he believed in his conscience was the equitable right, and if not the legal right, ought to be so, of the poor.

Mr. Sharman Crawford opposed the Bill, and said, that if the hon. and gallant Member for Lincoln (Colonel Sibthorp) divided the House, he should vote with him. From the explanation of the noble Lord, he found the Bill did not essentially differ from that of last Session. He was of opinion, that no land should be allowed to be enclosed in this country without securing allotments for the working-classes. The recommendations of the Allotments Committee ought not to be disregarded. They recommended, that in any general, or even private Enclosure Bill, that might hereafter pass into a law, provision for making allotments for the poor should be introduced. He cordially agreed in that opinion. The report went on to state, that from the evidence examined before the Committee, it appeared, that the effect produced on the labouring classes by their being enabled to hold land on their own account was most beneficial; that their condition was bettered; and that great advances were made by it in reforming the criminal and dissolute. He thought, therefore, that the House, before allowing this Bill to be brought in, ought to consider how enclosures might be made effectual for these purposes. With regard to establishing playgrounds for the people, he despised the idea, if it was to be the sole idea for which provisions in favour of the poor were to be introduced into Bills of this nature. Allotments would give occupation, and pleasing occupation, to the manufacturing and industrious classes at times when they were discharged from work. That occupation would supply the remedy against their going on the Poor-rates. In places where the system had been adopted, the effect had been greatly to reduce the demands on the Poor-rates. Among other persons that he might mention, who had tried the system with eminent success, was Mrs. Gilbert, who had given great encouragement to the Allotment system in Sussex, with the best effect. The House ought not to go on enclosing land without considering the best means of effecting this great object. Considering that Enclosure Bills, almost without exception, were calculated to give a monopoly to the rich at the expense of the poor, he was opposed to this Bill among the rest.

Sir C. Burrell was understood to say, that according to the law of England, no man had a right to take from any one that to which he had by law a right in order to give it to another. With respect to manorial rights, the fact was, that a very great part of those rights belonged to poor persons who had claims on the manor. He knew a very large tract of land in Sussex, which it would have been most beneficial to the parish to have had inclosed, but the inclosure was prevented by the copyholders and free tenants. While persons were so ready to object that too little corn was grown in this country, he could not see how they could at the same time object to the enclosure of waste land, but he thought great injustice might be done to the country and to the poor, and industrious classes, if full consideration were not given to a measure of such importance as this. Even where land had been enclosed at great expense, he had known instances where the enclosure had been eventually of great benefit. Near Horsham lands had been enclosed, which he himself had never thought would pay, but they now produced as large crops as some of the very best lands. Considering how great would be the advantage of being able to enclose waste lands at a small expense, instead of the present enormous expenses of obtaining an Act, he should support the Motion.

Mr. Bright looked upon this Bill with considerable suspicion, and especially when it ran to the length of 140 clauses; but it appeared to him, as the noble Lord had taken the trouble to prepare such a Bill, it was only fair, that it should be submitted to the House, in order that every Member should have the opportunity of seeing it. He was much gratified at hearing the hon. Member for Sussex express his anxious desire to preserve what he considered a great constitutional principle—that the property of one man should not by law be given to another; that property should not be taken from the poor and given to the rich. He trusted, that in some subsequent discussions in which the hon. Baronet might be engaged before long, with respect to the proprietors of land, he would keep the opinion which he had this night expressed in view.

PRISONS AND PRISON DISCIPLINE IN SCOTLAND.] The Lord Advocate moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law with respect to Prisons and Prison Discipline in Scotland. Previous to the year 1839, the law of Scotland in regard to Prisons and Prison Discipline had been in a very unsatisfactory state. The prisons were hardly in a fit condition for the reception of human beings, and they afforded no security for the detention of the prisoners. The expense too for building and maintaining these prisons, was imposed upon the Royal Burghs of Scotland—the counties generally not contributing anything. The burghs being poor, the consequence was that a very defective state of things arose. There were, it was true, certain local statutes that made a difference in some places, but it clearly appeared by various reports laid before the House, that much was required to be done. At last the attention of the public was attracted to the matter, and in 1839, a Statute was passed to improve Prison Discipline in Scotland. That Statute had ever since been in operation, and great improvements had resulted from it. The prisons were in a more fit state for the reception of those confined, while there was greater security against escape. Boards were established in different counties, and a General Board was established in Edinburgh to superintend the prisons. But it was not wonderful that in the operation of a new system introduced by one Act of Parliament, some defects should exist. During the two last years reports had been laid on the Table, noticing these imperfections, and suggesting alterations. The last report, after expressing a complete conviction of the soundness of the principle which had been in operation for four years, at the same time pointed out some imperfections which required to be amended. The learned Lord read an extract from the report, recommending the adoption of measures to carry out the principle of the Bill of 1839. It was in order to accomplish this object that he now proposed to introduce the present Bill. Since 1839 there had been a new census—that of 1841—and the apportionment of the expenses laid on the population being according to the census of 1831, a very imperfect mode of assessment necessarily existed. Again, imperfections were found to exist in the mode of transmitting prisoners from the general prisons to local prisons; and also with respect to the means of providing for the sustenance of the prisoners. He concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

Leave given. Bill brought in and read a first time.

TENURE OF LAND (IRELAND) COMMISSION.] Lord Monteagle wished to put a question to his noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Devon) on a subject which deeply interested the public generally, but which more especially interested the public in Ireland. He alluded to the proceedings of the Commission appointed to inquire into the Occupation and Tenure of Land in Ireland. He entertained no distrust of his noble Friend; he believed that the greatest credit was due to him for the energy and diligence with which he had prosecuted the objects of the inquiry, and he should be very glad to hear from him, if he were at liberty to make any communication on the subject, what progress had now been made in the inquiry, and when it was likely the result of the labours of the Commissioners would be made public?

The Earl of Devon had no difficulty in answering the question, nor was he sorry that such an opportunity was afforded him of [explaining why he was then present in Parliament, instead of proceeding with the investigation in Ireland. He had made arrangements to go to Dublin for the purpose of collecting further evidence, and had intended being in Dublin at the present time; but a few days since he had received a subpoena from the Court of Queen's Bench commanding him to attend as a witness in a criminal case at the next Devonshire Assizes. He had endeavoured to get the evidence which he should have to give made matter of admission; but the defendant considered it essential to the case that he should be examined personally; and he was afraid that he should be detained in England till the trial was over. His colleagues were, however, empowered to proceed with the inquiry during his absence, and they had consented to do so; no delay, therefore, would take place in consequence of his detention in this country. He was not sorry that he had the opportunity of stating that he was not idly or unnecessarily neglecting his public duty. It was generally supposed, although the supposition was incorrect, that the only business of the Commission was to collect evidence. That was, indeed, a most important part of their duty; but, any persons who took upon themselves the responsibility of offering suggestions as to any proposed change in the existing law should make themselves acquainted with that law; and, therefore, a not unimportant part of the duties of the Commissioners was to digest the information on the subject of the relations between Landlord and Tenant which was already accessible to the public. The labours of the Commission would be prosecuted with as little delay as possible.

TAHITI.] Lord Brougham moved for a copy of the correspondence which had taken place between the Missionaries in the South Sea Islands and the Government.

The Earl of Aberdeen—My Lords, there is no objection whatever on the part of the Government to lay such information before the House as can conveniently be produced. In the course of last year a noble Marquess (Lansdowne), not now in his place, asked me a question as to the effect likely to be produced with respect to the British Missionaries in the South Sea Islands by the recent protectorship of Tahiti by France. I then stated that the French Government had assured me that every security would be afforded them in the free exercise of their functions, and such appeared to be the fact when some papers which were laid before the other

House of Parliament were read; but no complaint whatever was made on the part of the Missionaries. I may mention that only two days ago I received a Deputation of the London Missionaries, and I am glad to inform your Lordships that they had no complaints whatever to prefer. My Lords, I will take this opportunity of saying a few words on another subject. Your Lordships are aware of what has taken place on the part of a French Admiral in the South Seas at the island of Tahiti, and that that act has been disavowed by the French Government. My Lords, I think it right to state that this has been done by the French Government as an entirely spontaneous and voluntary act on their part. I have not written a single line on the subject to Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris, nor has any remonstrance or representation been made by Her Majesty's Government to the French Government. I felt that when once the subject was known and understood by the French Government, a sense of their own dignity and honour, as well as a sense of justice, would lead to such a result. My Lords, although the statement that I have just made is most explicit, nevertheless I am prepared to see it said that the French Minister has yielded to the British Government, and I take it for granted that the war party in that country will not lose the opportunity of taking advantage of accusations so absurd. In like manner, whether from what I have done or not done, I shall be set down by the friends of that party in this country, though rather absurdly, as having been guilty on my part of a base and truckling policy. This I expect also. I only wish that the war party in France was as little regarded in that country as it is in this.

Lord Brougham said, that nothing could be more satisfactory than the statement just made by his noble Friend, and so it would be universally felt to be the case. It would be a complete answer to the war party on the other side of the Channel. He would not say more on this subject, because he was astonished as well as pleased to find that the existence of that party was altogether disavowed; and his noble Friend and himself were accused of creating that party out of their own imaginations; and when the subject was recently named in the Chamber of Deputies, as to whom the party consisted of, there was a cry of "Name, name," and they were challenged to name any person of that party. For his own part, however, he should be but too much rejoiced to find that there really was no war party in that country.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned.

STATE TRIALS (IRELAND) — THE WITNESSES.] Mr. Sidney Herbert having moved the Order of the Day for a Committee of Supply,

Mr. T. Duncombe rose to call the attention of the House to the subject of which he had given notice on a previous evening. He was about to move for "A return of all moneys paid to Richard Bond Hughes, Charles Ross, and John Jackson, on account of any communications made by them to Government relative to the Repeal agitation in Ireland, distinguishing the amounts paid to each; also, the dates of the several payments, specifying the respective periods at which they commenced; together with copies of any instructions given to the above-named Richard Bond Hughes, Charles Ross, and John Jackson, with respect to the duties to be performed by them in Ireland. Also, a return of the amount paid to the above-named for expenses during their attendance at the trial of the Queen against O'Connell and others. Also a return of all the moneys paid to the late or present proprietor or proprietors, managers, conductors, or persons in the employ of the Morning Herald and Standard newspapers, or any of them, on account of communications or information made or given by the said parties, or any of them, to the Government, in reference to the Repeal agitation in Ireland; distinguishing the times at which the said communications or informations were furnished, and the period at which the several sums of money were paid."

In opposing, for a short time, the Motion that the House go into Committee of Supply, he was desirous to state that he did not do so in furtherance of the Motion of the hon. Member for Roudale, but in the exercise of his undoubted right, as a Member of that House, to call on the Government to explain, before they went into the Committee of Supply, the manner in which they had expended certain sums of money which had been already placed at their disposal for the public service. It was more especially the duty of the House to make that inquiry when they had good reason to believe that a portion of that money had been expended in a manner neither creditable or honourable to those who so expended it. They were told that the object of the State prosecutions in Ireland was to vindicate what had been called the majesty of the law—to create increased respect for the institutions of the country, and to inspire the people with confidence in the wisdom and justice of those in authority. He listened with much attention to the late Debate on the subject of Ireland during the fortnight which it lasted. He had looked carefully through the whole evidence that had been given on the State Trials, and he felt justified in saying that it was impossible to find any portion of those transactions creditable to the Government which instituted the prosecutions—to the Judge before whom the traversers were tried—to the Jury who tried them—to the Officers of the Crown who were engaged, in fact to any of the parties concerned, or especially to some of the witnesses produced on the part of the Crown. The branch of the subject to which he should direct the attention of the House on that occasion was that which more immediately affected the conduct of the Government towards the press and those employed upon it. A perverse Government had two ways by which it could proceed for the purpose of destroying the freedom and public utility of the press; namely, persecution and corruption. He could either strain the law to prosecute the press, or could attempt to corrupt those who were connected with it. Now, the present Government seemed to have employed both these means. They had not rested satisfied with corrupting members of the press, but they also strained the law to persecute and prosecute the press. He would not go at length into that question on the present occasion, but wait another opportunity to bring it before the House, and he should not, therefore, trouble them with more than one observation on the subject.

He could not avoid remarking, that the law of conspiracy affecting the press, as it had been laid down in Ireland, was not the law that was laid down by the Attorney General for England and Baron Rolfe in 1842, when trials took place at which the question was brought forward. They had seen on the late trials Mr. O'Connell made responsible for articles which appeared in Dublin newspapers that he had not read, and they had seen the proprietors of those newspapers made responsible for speeches delivered by Mr. O'Connell which they had not heard. Now it had been laid down by the Attorney General for England and Baron Rolfe, at the trials at Lancaster in 1842, that the only person who was responsible for articles in a newspaper, was the proprietor, and that even the editor was not to be held responsible for those articles, though he might be one of the parties charged with conspiracy. That was not, however, the branch of the subject to which he wished more immediately to direct the attention of the House. He wished to apply himself particularly to the employment of Reporters by the Government—to the employment on the part of the Government of hired spies—to the employment for that purpose of persons connected with the press; for if the object of these prosecutions had been to create a great moral effect, all the proceedings connected with them, should have been of such a character as to bear the light of day. There should not be in such transactions the slightest appearance of treachery, or the slightest appearance of meanness. The conduct of the Attorney General for Ireland and the Government towards Mr. Bond Hughes, had been most extraordinary, and in moving for a return of the money paid to that gentleman for his services, he did not mean to cast the slightest imputation on his character. It was quite clear from the speeches of the several Counsel for the traversers at the late trials in Ireland, that they acquitted him of any improper proceeding, and the party that Mr. Bond Hughes had the greatest cause to complain of, was the Government. The Attorney General assigned as a reason for not furnishing certain names, the feeling that had been excited amongst the traversers and the public generally, in consequence of the mistake which Mr. Bond Hughes had made with respect to Mr. Barrett, one of the traversers, and yet, the Attorney General and the Crown Solicitor, and his Clerks allowed Mr. Hughes to suffer all the consequences of that mistake long after Mr. Hughes had explained it, and had shown that it had not been a wilful mistake. A few days after the occurrence of the mistake, Mr. Barrett attended at the Police-office to swear informations against Mr. Hughes for perjury, on which occasion Mr. Kemmis attended on the part of Mr. Hughes; and although Mr. Kemmis, the Crown Solicitor, knew that Mr. Hughes had acknowledged his mistake, he persisted before the Magistrates, in maintaining the truth of Mr. Hughes's first statement with respect to Mr. Barrett. Now, that was, in his opinion, most discreditable to Mr. Kemmis, and to the Crown that employed a Solicitor who acted in that way. How was Mr. Barrett to know that Mr. Hughes had not wilfully made a statement that was not true?—that he had not been wilfully swearing falsely? When Mr. Barrett, in the month of October attended before the Magistrates for the purpose of swearing informations against Mr. Hughes, Mr. Kemmis, the Crown Solicitor, attended on the part of Mr. Hughes, and gave no indication that Mr. Hughes had admitted his error. He would read to the House from the Pilot newspaper, what took place on that occasion.

“When Mr. Barrett came to read the informations, he found the false statements that had been made against him. No doubt, it turns out they were not wilfully false; but how was Mr. Barrett to know, that, all explanation on the point had been most studiously, ay, and most improperly, withheld? Immediately on making this discovery, Mr. Barrett put the matter in a train of legal investigation. A summons to answer a charge of perjury, was issued against Mr. Hughes, and copies of it are served at the residence of Mr. Hughes and the Crown Solicitor. That summons is discussed before the Magistrates of College-street Police-office, on Saturday, the 21st day of October, and one of the persons in attendance is the Crown Solicitor. Nay, what is more, on the same occasion that Gentleman made a speech to the Bench, in which he not only withheld all explanation on the subject of the mistake which he then knew had been made by Mr. Hughes, but he had the indelicacy and the indiscretion to indirectly maintain the truth of the then impugned, and the now admittedly false portions of the informations. Readers, mark what Mr. Kemmis said on that occasion, Yes! we say, mark it, and remember, that when making the observations we now give, Mr. Kemmis had five days previously heard from Mr. Hughes's own lips, that he had sworn in mistake. We quote from the Freeman's Journal of the 23d October, 1843:—‘Mr. Kemmis, (Crown Solicitor) stepped forward, and said, that Mr. Hughes was not at present in the Kingdom, and he (Mr. Kemmis) could pledge himself to the truth of this statement. He considered the present proceeding as a most extraordinary one, for Mr. Hughes had remained several days in Dublin after he had sworn his informations, and yet the prosecutor, during that time, never thought proper to take any exception to his depositions; but now that the gentleman had left the country, certain parties came forward to make allegations against his veracity, when the accused, not being present, could not possibly rebut the accusations made against him.’”

The application to receive the informations was refused by the Magistrates, on the ground that the reserving the informations against Mr. Hughes would prejudice the State Prosecutions. Would the House believe it—would the country believe it, that Mr. B. Hughes left Ireland at the desire of Mr. Kemmis, he was told to leave it, or that his life would not be safe. Why should his life not have been safe? Could they not have made it so by stating to the public the way in which the fact stood? Could they not have put an end to the denunciations against Mr. Hughes by saying that he had made a mistake in his information? He understood from the friends of Mr. Hughes that he was not at all aware that he was to be a party to informations, and that he would rather have cut off his right hand than consented to such. Mr. Hughes was not a person who would descend to be a common informer. The fact was that he was deceived in that matter, having been told by the Solicitor for the Crown that he was only swearing an affidavit verifying his notes, instead of which he was swearing to an information upon which a number of parties were to be arrested. When Mr. Hughes went over to Ireland he had instructions to wait on the Attorney General; but the Attorney General was not at home, and then he went to Mr. Brewster to receive instructions; and he now asked for a copy of those instructions, and a return of the sums of money paid to Mr. Hughes, not that he believed any sum of money could repay Mr. Hughes for the anxiety of mind which he must have suffered and the injury that had been inflicted on him during the period whilst he was allowed to remain under a cloud. From October until January he was allowed to remain under a cloud, although the Attorney General and the Crown Solicitor were aware that he had corrected the error into which he had fallen. He had been brought before the Grand Jury, and he then stated his error; yet until January it was not made public. Mr. Hughes had a right to complain, and by the returns for which he (Mr. Duncombe) moved, the House would be able to see whether Mr. Hughes had received the same compensation which had been given to another—to a favoured individual, Mr. C. Ross. He had now done with Mr. Hughes, and he hoped that in the observations which he made he said nothing derogatory to that Gentleman's character. He now came to the Carlisle Patriot, or rather to the case of the late Editor of that Journal; Mr. Charles Ross it appeared had lately been employed as a Reporter for the Morning Chronicle, and in his evidence, at the trials in Dublin, being examined by Sergeant Warren, he stated that he arrived in Dublin on the 3rd of July. He was asked,

"Did you come to this country (Ireland) for any particular purpose?"—Answer: Yes, I came to take notes of Mr. O'Connell's speech at the meeting at Donnybrook.

"Did you come of your own accord, or who suggested it to you—I do not ask you who suggested it?—It was suggested to me.

"Did you attend that meeting?—I did.

"For whom did you attend that meeting?—On the part of the Government."

The House would perceive that the Government suggested to Mr. Ross to go over, the Government at that time knowing that he was employed as a Reporter for the Morning Chronicle, a Paper opposed to the views and Politics of the Government. He was asked by Sergeant Warren,

"Had you any other object in coming over but to Report on the part of the Government?—I had not; but I was engaged on a London Paper at the time I was sent over by the Government."

The House would recollect that the witness was in the pay of the Morning Chronicle at the time he went over to Ireland. He was cross-examined by Mr. Henn, who asked him the following questions:—

"I believe you have stated to my learned

Friend, that your mission to Ireland was suggested on the part of Government?—Yes.

"Now Government you know is a very comprehensive word. Have you any objection to tell us who it was, on the part of the Government, suggested this to you?"

When this question was asked, up jumped Counsel for the Crown, Mr. Sergeant Warren, and directed him not to answer, that he was not allowed to tell the Court or the Irish people, or the English people, who sent him over to those trials. He stated that a high person—a person high in office, sent him over. Now he wanted to know, and he thought he had a right to ask who that high personage was that sent him over? He had a right to know, what Member of the Government condescended to employ Mr. Charles Ross, who was a Reporter for, and the servant of, a Newspaper opposed to the Government. Could the Government find no other persons but persons connected with Newspapers (and those Newspapers not in the interest of the Government) for this base purpose?—could they not find other persons, instead of employing this individual? Of course the Government knew perfectly well that this man going over under false colours—going as the representative of the Morning Chronicle—would hear secrets, if there were any to be told, which an avowed Reporter of the Government could not obtain. That was an advantage they were desirous of securing, and to show that it was so, he could state that, after the meeting at Mullaghmast, Mr. Ross, who was known to be connected with the Liberal Press at this side of the water, was treated with every sort of courtesy by the traversers. After the Mullaghmast meeting, so little idea was there that Mr. Ross was a Government spy, that one of the traversers, Mr. Steele, as he had secured no means of getting home, took him back in his own carriage, forty-two miles, to Dublin. Mr. Ross had by these means the opportunity of hearing secrets disclosed, and of possessing himself of private information to be used in aid of the proceedings adopted against the Repeal Association. He wanted to know whether this sort of proceeding was fair, upright, or honourable to the Government which had employed this man? Mr. Ross admitted that he had received 350*l.* for his services; 50*l.* for the Donnybrook meeting, and 300*l.* for the rest. He came back to England. He believed

Mr. Ross's connection with the Morning Chronicle ceased at the close of the last Session of Parliament, but he returned to Ireland as a reporter for the Standard, being at the same time employed to do the dirty work of the Government; and he again asked who was the high personage that had employed this man to do this dirty work? He said it was necessary that the country should know this; and, more than that, it was necessary that the people should know who had appropriated 400*l.* of their money in payment of such services. He could not believe that the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government had any hand in such transactions, nor could he think the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department had any hand in it; because, on a former occasion, the right hon. Gentleman had said that the Government had never employed spies in the outbreaks in Lancashire, and that if any had been employed in such a character, it must have been under the countenance of some local magistrate; and he said that the Government never sanctioned the employment of spies, and that every thing done by him should be plain and above board. Well, he could not believe that the right hon. Gentleman was the "high personage," and he wanted to know whether it was a Member of the other House of Parliament. Was it any individual who was a Member of the Cabinet? This he would say, that, let it be whom it might, they had inflicted eternal disgrace upon themselves. So much for the Carlisle Patriot, otherwise Mr. Ross. He was now an ornament to the Standard newspaper. He was now, he (Mr. Duncombe) believed, a reporter on that paper; and as an agent of the Government, he should like to know what he had received as a remuneration for the services he had rendered. Before he went to the case of Mr. Jackson, he would read to the House what was the opinion of the Irish press upon these transactions. There was an account of Mr. Charles Ross in the Dublin newspapers which he would read to the House:—

"Mr. Ross (said the Dublin Monitor) came to this country, and sought and obtained access to public meetings avowedly as a reporter, first for the Morning Chronicle, and secondly for the London Standard. In his character as a newspaper reporter he was associated with by Gentlemen connected in that capacity with the Dublin press, yet all the while he concealed the real purpose that brought him to Ireland—he concealed the fact that he was a paid agent of the Government, to spy and ferret out information that might afterwards be rendered available in procuring the conviction of individuals. The plain truth is, Mr. C. Ross acted a treacherous, and therefore an ungentlemanly, part—a part that no person actuated by feelings which are characteristic of a gentleman would consent to act. He deceived those with whom his professional duty brought him in contact—he represented himself to those with whom he associated in this country to be here in the honourable capacity of a newspaper reporter, whereas he was secretly working in the capacity of a hired informer for the Government. No sophistry can palliate, let alone justify, such duplicity."

He concurred in every syllable of those observations. There was also a letter from the correspondent of the Morning Chronicle itself, which stated that former Governments had called upon newspaper reporters as witnesses for the Crown, but that those gentlemen had refused to attend. The letter said:—

"Frequently before now have those in office attempted to compel reporters to become witnesses for the Crown; but in no one case have they ever succeeded. In 1824, when Mr. O'Connell was prosecuted for sedition by Lord Plunket, then Attorney General, amongst the witnesses summoned to support the indictment before the Grand Jury were two of the reporters—Mr. Leech and Mr. Kelly. Both refused to appear, and were called upon fines of 100*l.* each. They left Dublin. The bill was thrown out; but it is to be mentioned, to the credit of Lord Plunket, that he did not afterwards attempt to enforce the penalties incurred by them. Several other reporters were summoned on the occasion, before the magistrates; but they all declined giving the slightest information; and the principle on which they acted was this—that newspaper reporters are the representatives of the absent public—that their duty is a simple one, to give information of all that is said or done that it may be interesting to the public to know—that to perform that duty facilities are afforded to them which would be refused, and properly refused, if persons were led to suppose that they were dealing with witnesses for the Crown. It went on to say, 'Change newspaper reporters into Crown witnesses, and freedom of discussion is at an end. Men will fly from public meetings into secret conspiracies; and the first intimation which a government will receive of its danger, will be like to that which was given to Otho of Greece, when his palace was invested with an armed population, and he was 'requested' to give to his subjects a new form of government.'"

There had also been a meeting of newspaper reporters, at which very strong resolutions were adopted, condemnatory of reporters becoming witnesses for the Crown. He came next to Mr. Jackson, of the Morning Herald, who, it appeared, was not a regular reporter, but a correspondent of the Morning Herald, and who used to write some very interesting and entertaining reports for that paper, or to use his own terms, "rather spicy reports" for those readers who indulged in the Morning Herald. At the close of that person's examination he stated that the Morning Herald had then lately changed hands, and that it was a short time previous to the change of proprietors he had been directed to put himself in communication with Mr. Kemmis, the Crown Solicitor. The witness then said that he wished to say something, as comments might be made on his conduct. The Lord Chief Justice then asked him what he wished to say?

"Mr. Jackson: Those manuscript documents, (Mr. Jackson's reports), my Lords, were given by the proprietors of the Morning Herald to Mr. Kemmis, the Crown Solicitor, and, so help me God, I never saw them, or knew he had them, until he produced me the letter of those gentlemen, stating that they had furnished him with them, and requiring me to initial them. I considered it was due to my character before the world to make this plain explanation of the truth."

No person could cast the least blame upon Mr. Jackson after this statement. It was evident that Mr. Jackson was ashamed of the conduct of the Crown, and that he was very anxious to cast the odium of the transaction from himself. Those documents were handed over by the proprietors for reasons best known to themselves. He knew it might be said that this took place before the transfer of the Morning Herald, which happened on the 1st of January. But there were reasons for handing over these documents before the money was paid, and before the Government assisted in advancing the money. The Government no doubt had very equitable claims to the documents which they found in the Morning Herald office before that establishment was transferred, and before it was incorporated with The Standard. But it was clear Mr. Jackson was ashamed of the transaction, though it appeared the Morning Herald was not ashamed of handing over the documents. He said that the Government ought to be ashamed of their conduct in availing themselves of those documents. He would read some of the opinions of the press on this subject. The opinions were strong, but not stronger than the conduct of the parties would justify. The Dublin Monitor of the 22nd January, says—

"It may be right to inform our readers that the Morning Herald was purchased about a month ago; and we presume, therefore, that the present proprietors and editors are not responsible for the perfidious conduct we are now deprecating. Be this as it may, the Morning Herald stands charged with an offence which we believe is wholly unparalleled in the history of the public press. The charge is clear and unmistakable. The Herald received communications under the seal of confidence, and then traded on those communications with Government in a prosecution against its subjects. This strikes at once at the root of all confidence in public journalists. Instead of maintaining a character for principle and honour, they become spies and informers—for to this it comes. The words are harsh, but they faintly express the perfidious conduct to which we allude. In fact, it is a 'toss up' in turpitude between the Herald and the Crown; for the Crown is as inexcusable in availing itself of such sources of information as the Herald is in their betrayal."

He (Mr. Duncombe) concurred in that opinion, and he thought that even if The Herald was base enough to hand over the documents to the Crown, the Crown ought not to avail themselves of them in a trial of such importance. The trial became tainted by such conduct; and they had better have left the prosecution alone than conduct it by such means, which reflected so little credit on the Government. The noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies informed the House the other night, with more candour than discretion, that the right hon. Gentleman wrote a letter to the Attorney General for Ireland, commending him for the judgment, the firmness and the good temper with which he conducted the prosecution. As Ministers had thus passed a vote of thanks to the Attorney General for Ireland, he hoped that others connected with the trials would not be excluded. He hoped the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench would receive a vote of thanks for the charge he had delivered. He hoped that Mr. Kemmis, too, the Crown Solicitor, would be thanked for his services in procuring the jury. No doubt the proprietors of the Morning Herald and Standard found a sufficient recom-

pence in their own consciences, and were above any idea of remuneration; but he must say they would not do justice to the Chief Justice and Mr. Kemmis if they only thanked the Attorney General for the judgment and temper with which he had conducted the prosecution. Now, he wanted to know if a verdict so obtained would gain any moral influence whatever? He doubted it very much; it certainly had not produced that effect in England. The impression, from one end of England, to the other was, that Mr. O'Connell had not had a fair trial. At the close of last Session, the right hon. the Secretary of State for the Home Department told the House that, if it did not strengthen the hands of the Government, and assist them in putting down what he called the "rebellious spirit in Ireland," England—all glorious England—would exhibit a melancholy spectacle in the eyes of surrounding nations, if there was the slightest shadow of a shade of foundation for that opinion. The Government must now be in a sad state of alarm, because looking at what had occurred during these Debates, and to the general opinion of the conduct of the Government, he must say he had never known a Debate so damaging to a Government. They must be on the eve of the fulfilment of the prediction of the right hon. Baronet, if there was the slightest foundation for his assertion of last Session. He had no apprehension of that prediction being fulfilled. The only apprehension he had of their becoming a melancholy spectacle in the eyes of other nations was a fear that Members of Parliament would not speak out on this question, and would not do their duty; but if hon. Members on both sides of the House would do their duty in this matter, there need be no alarm. He knew it was perfectly competent to Her Majesty's Ministers to refuse the returns he moved for, and that without adducing one single argument in support of their conduct, just as they had the other night the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend near him, for a copy of a memorial to the Lord Lieutenant. On that occasion they relied not on argument, but on their numerical majority. They might do so on that occasion, they might refuse the information he sought for, and which Ireland had a right to have, but if they did so, the country would not be satisfied, but every impartial man would come to the conclusion that these proceedings had been conducted, from first to last, in a way which reflected no honour on them, either as men or as Ministers of the Crown. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for the returns.

Sir J. Graham: Sir, I should indeed entertain a melancholy opinion of the future prospects, not only of Ireland, but of the whole United Kingdom, if I could believe that the majority of this House sympathized with the opinions of the hon. Member who brought forward this Motion; and, let me add, that under ordinary circumstances, after the speech which the hon. Member has delivered, and more especially after the invectives and accusations in which he has indulged when speaking of the Government, I should consider it my duty, as a Member of that Government, to oppose altogether the Returns for which he has moved. But, considering the whole circumstances of the case, the particular time at which the Motion is made, and the necessity of a Vote of Money during the present Session connected with the late trials, I could not bring myself to give to the whole of the Motion a direct negative; I am willing to assent to a certain portion of it. I would beg of the House to consider in what light the hon. Member presents himself with this Motion this evening. If I mistake not, the hon. Member was last night attending a meeting of his constituents in Finsbury, where, after a warm discussion, a motion was carried instructing him to obstruct the progress of the Supplies in this House. [Mr. T. Duncombe: No such motion was made.] The debate I understood was a stormy one, and after the great variety of topics introduced and the various opinions expressed with respect to them, it was somewhat difficult to say what did or what did not pass. [Mr. T. Duncombe: I will tell the right hon. Gentleman.—Cries of "No, no."] The hon. Member will have ample opportunity of explanation, if he will allow me to proceed. I wish also to remind the House that the hon. Gentleman has been advertised as the chairman of a dinner about to be given to Mr. O'Connell. The hon. Gentleman has informed the Government that they were very much damaged in the late debate—that we are not so strong as we think ourselves to be—and that a change has taken place on his own side of the House. I wish him joy of that change and of the new compact alliance which he and his friends have entered into. Sir, I will now proceed to touch upon some of the topics to which the hon. Member has adverted, but it is not my intention to reopen those questions which for nine nights have occupied the attention of this House. Sir, my hon. Friend the Member for Bridport is about to ask me this evening when it is the intention of Government to proceed with measures of great importance, and respecting which much anxiety prevails in the public mind. I allude to the Factory Bill and the Poor Law Bill. Now, I beg to remind the House that since the protracted debate on Irish affairs we have had two Supply Days, and on each of those days the hon. Member for Rochdale has made a Motion on the question of going into Committee of Supply for the avowed purpose of obstructing the Supplies. The hon. Member who has moved the Motion now before the House, adopting the same line and pursuing the same course, has on this one Motion reopened all the questions referring to the conduct of the late trials, which have already undergone a protracted discussion. Under these circumstances I feel it my duty to anticipate the question of the hon. Member for Bridport by stating, that it is impossible for Her Majesty's Government thus designedly obstructed to fix any precise time for going on with the Measures to which his question refers. Now, Sir, with reference to the hon. Member's Motion, I at once avow that Her Majesty's Government, observing in the course of the last summer the language that was used at large meetings in Ireland, which were assembled in rapid succession, did think it their imperative duty to obtain clear, full, authentic, and satisfactory evidence as to the speeches, which were addressed to those vast assemblies. I contend that I should have been wanting in my duty to the public if I had omitted every fair opportunity of obtaining such information. Sir, I see hon. Members on the Benches opposite who are opposed—bitterly opposed, I am afraid—to me in politics; but I would ask them if, at all times, it has not been the practice of the Executive Government, when popular excitement has run high, and immense public meetings have been assembled, to obtain authentic information, by means of shorthand-writers, as to the language addressed to such meetings? The simple question, therefore, is, whether the means used by Her Majesty's Government were fair and legitimate? The hon. Member has thought fit to use, I will not say offensive, but certainly very strong language, with respect to the course which has been pursued in the case which the hon. Member has brought under our consideration. Sir, I do not hesitate to avow that all the means which have been adopted to obtain information in the case have been adopted by me, and on my own individual responsibility. I do not wish to throw any portion of my responsibility on my Colleagues. I am the person who is responsible, and from that responsibility I will not shrink. Now, I will state the course which I pursued, and I will do so in the first place with respect to Mr. Bond Hughes. I applied to the person at the head of the Stenograph Reporting Department for the Government and both Houses of Parliament (Mr. Gurney), and requested him to select an intelligent person, versed in shorthand-writing and competent to verify his shorthand notes and to give evidence in a Court of Justice specifying the words spoken in his presence; and I directed Mr. Gurney to send, on the usual terms of remuneration, some such person to Ireland, in whom he could place confidence, and which he safely could recommend. Mr. Gurney, in accordance with those directions, selected Mr. Bond Hughes, and that gentleman was accordingly sent over to Ireland for the purpose of attending the meetings there, and taking a shorthand note of the whole of the proceedings. I am perfectly willing to produce a return of all the monies paid to Mr. Bond Hughes, and also the instructions given to him. In a short time there will be laid before the House a return of all the sums paid to Mr. Gurney on account of the persons now employed in taking notes of the proceedings of the Landlord and Tenant Commission in Ireland, and on account of the shorthand writers who attended the Special Commissions in South Wales, and it will appear from that return that Mr. Bond Hughes did not receive for his services in Ireland a greater remuneration than that which is usually paid to shorthand writers employed by the Government on similar service. I feel quite satisfied that even the hon. Member for Finsbury will say, that the remuneration is not extravagant, and that the instructions are unexceptionable. The hon. Gentleman has referred to what has occurred in Dublin, with respect to the information sworn by Mr. B. Hughes; but with the single exception of a mistake about the presence of Mr. Barrett at a particular meeting, not one point of his evidence was shaken in the slightest degree. Excepting the mistake with reference to the presence of Mr. Barrett at one of two meetings which were held, I think, at a particular place on the same day, though Mr. Hughes was subjected to the closest cross-examination, no portion of his testimony was shaken; nothing was wrong in his statement except that one particular in which he fell into an error. But the fact of the presence of Mr. Barrett at those meetings—and my hon. Friend the Attorney General will correct me if I am wrong—did not rest singly on the evidence of Mr. B. Hughes; there was the evidence of other witnesses, who clearly proved that on one occasion at least Mr. Barrett was present at a meeting specified in the indictment. Now, with respect to Mr. Ross, I will tell the House exactly what occurred. The first occasion on which the Government thought fit to send a shorthand-writer to Ireland was in the month of June, I think. I avow at once that I have known Mr. Ross for many years. I know him to be a most accurate reporter. I believe him to be a trustworthy and honourable man; and, knowing him to be such, I, on my own responsibility, sent for Mr. Ross and told him that it was desirable that a shorthand-writer should proceed to Ireland for the purpose of attending at a particular meeting to be held at Donnybrook. My directions to him were—"You will proceed thither; you will take accurate notes of what is said, and be prepared to verify upon oath your report of the speeches you hear." I think the pecuniary arrangement was made that he should receive 50*l.* and the payment of his expenses. Mr. Ross did proceed to Ireland, he attended that meeting, and he furnished a verbatim report of the proceedings. Subsequently, towards the end of the Session of Parliament, before Mr. Hughes was sent, a further arrangement was made with Mr. Ross, that he should proceed to Ireland and remain there during the whole of the recess, from the first or second week in August, I think, until the first week in February, and for his services during that period he was to receive the sum of 350*l.* Now, it will appear, when the return of the payments made to Mr. Gurney is presented, that the rate of payment to Mr. Ross was considerably less than that made to Mr. Bond Hughes and others employed in Mr. Gurney's establishment. But the accusation made by the hon. Member for

Finsbury is, that Mr. Ross was sent by me to Ireland as a spy. I, in the most solemn and positive manner, deny that accusation. My instructions to Mr. Ross were to go to Ireland and avow himself to be a reporter for the Government. I knew that at that time he was connected as a reporter with one of the morning papers, the Morning Chronicle, I believe; and subsequently I was aware that at the end of the Session he was connected with the Standard; but my instructions were, "You will proceed to Ireland as the reporter for the Government." I did not sanction any concealment whatever of his avowed mission for that purpose; and I believe I may say, even after all the hon. Gentleman has stated, that it was well and perfectly known in Ireland that Mr. Ross was employed as a Government reporter. I understood the hon. Gentleman to say, that Mr. Ross concealed the fact, that he was a Government reporter, that he travelled with Mr. Steele and other parties forty-two miles, they not being aware that he was a Government reporter—that, in point of fact, he was employed as a spy for the Government. Now, that I absolutely and positively deny. [Mr. T. Duncombe: It is his own evidence.] Any concealment used by Mr. Ross was not in obedience to my instructions. I am ready to produce an account of all monies paid to Mr. Charles Ross and Mr. Bond Hughes, and the instructions given to them, which I have already said were verbal. But I, on my own responsibility, for the satisfaction of the hon. Gentleman, will state the terms of the instructions. I will put them in an authentic form and lay them on the Table. With regard to the case of Mr. Jackson, with him neither directly nor indirectly have I had any communication. It appears that he was a reporter employed by the Morning Herald, and resident in Dublin, and the Crown Solicitor in Dublin, as was his bounden duty, in seeking evidence to corroborate the testimony of Mr. Hughes and Mr. Ross, ascertained that Mr. Jackson had taken notes at some of these meetings at which language had been used which was about to be questioned in a Court of Justice, and he communicated with Mr. Jackson, and with the editor or conductor of the Morning Herald, in whose service Mr. Jackson was. A return shall be made of all the law expenses incurred in this prosecution on the part of the Crown Solicitor, and by that return it will appear what money was paid to Mr. Jackson. I must again declare, that excepting by the Crown Solicitor, on the part of the Government, there has been no communication directly or indirectly with Mr. Jackson. [Mr. T. Duncombe: Nor with the Morning Herald.] I will state what communication was made to that Journal. I do not disavow this. The House must determine whether, in a case of this description, when everything turned upon the strict proof of the language which had been used, it was not the duty of Her Majesty's Government to have clear and irrefragable evidence, and to put the words used beyond all question by obtaining corroborative testimony, provided always that it was obtained openly and honestly. I frankly avow then, that a communication was made to the proprietors of the Morning Herald and Standard to allow the corroboration to be obtained by means of the reports made to them, of the speeches delivered at the meeting and about to be brought into question. It was necessary that corroborative testimony should be obtained of the short-hand notes of the reporters employed by Government; and I say it was the duty of the Government to obtain that evidence. I have told the House, on the part of the Government, that I am prepared to assent to a portion of this Motion. I am prepared to make a return of all monies paid, of all instructions given; and shall add, either now or on some future occasion, a return of the rate of payment to the reporters employed in Mr. Gurney's establishment, both in Ireland and in Wales, on similar occasions. But I now come to a portion of the Motion which I feel it to be my duty most decidedly to resist. I must oppose the last two returns. The right hon. Gentleman made an insinuation not to be misunderstood, that either the Morning Herald or the Standard, or even both of them, had received a sum of money from Her Majesty's Government,—that some corrupt practices had taken place between them and Her Majesty's Government. Now, in the most solemn manner, as a gentleman, I deny the truth of that statement; and I do maintain, that the hon. Gentleman has no right, in the shape of a Motion for a return, to make so base an insinuation. I might as well make a Motion for an account of the money obtained by any Member of this House for a vote which he has given. This species of insinuation is calculated to convey an indelible stain. I say the gentlemen connected with the public papers are gentlemen of high and honourable feeling. I will not use the same expressions as the hon. Gentleman—though I might—and say that it is dirty and dishonourable to convey a contrary insinuation; but I do say it is unworthy of any Member of this House to do so. I am quite resolved, therefore, to take the opinion of the House against that part of the resolution. I am aware I give the hon. Gentleman an advantage, of which, perhaps, he will not be slow to avail himself, and because I refuse the return he will repeat the insinuation with double effect; but, I again assert, in the most solemn manner I can use in this House, that there is not the slightest foundation for the aspersions of the hon. Gentleman. So, with regard to the last return, the names of the persons now employed by Mr. Gurney for the purpose of taking notes of the present proceedings at the Corn Exchange in Dublin—after the experience we have had of the posting of Mr. Bond Hughes as a spy, I am not prepared to hold up those persons to public execration, and, possibly, to place them in danger of sustaining personal injury. [Mr. T. Duncombe: Not the names of those employed at the Trial.] The words of this part of the hon. Gentleman's Motion are,

"Also the name or names of the short-hand writers appointed to furnish the Government report of the proceedings at the Trial of 'The Queen against O'Connell and others.'"

Well, but I say those persons are still employed by Mr. Gurney; they are still attending meetings at the Corn Exchange, and I am not prepared to hold them up to public resentment, and probably to popular fury—I shall oppose therefore this part of the hon. Gentleman's Motion. But before I sit down I will just observe, that it is, in these times, no easy task to insure public justice against great offenders without incurring some public obloquy. I have thought it my painful duty to risk the incurring of such obloquy; but it is my pride and satisfaction to know that, upon the whole, I have succeeded in administering the law without asking for any extraordinary powers; putting down dangerous turbulence in England, and bringing to condign punishment great public offenders in Ireland. I have faithfully and honourably, I trust, pursued the path of duty, and I am not to be deterred by any taunts or attacks of the hon. Member. I will remind the House, that the hon. Gentleman has, in his accustomed manner, given his own account of the proceedings. At one time he attacks the Judges, at another the humblest officer of the law—the parish constable; sometimes he appears as the advocate of his friend, the doctor, who is now an outlaw and who spouted sedition from the pump at Deptford; sometimes he attacks the public prosecutor, at others the jury; nay even the witnesses, are the objects of his attacks. Upon the whole, the hon. Gentleman has a most morbid sensibility, which is excited on behalf of political offenders; he has, as it were, an instinctive dread of political trials, and he wishes to bespatter everybody who—as it would seem, to his great terror—has been instrumental in causing justice at last to overtake those who violate the law. I wish him joy if that line of conduct recommends him to any portion of the community out of this House; but my appeal is to the majority in this House. [Cheers from the Opposition.] To this majority, I say, on both sides of this House. Yes, I see ranged opposite to me, not without some preparation, a strong muster of the party opposed to the Government. We have made no such preparation. But still I am very confident, of the success of an appeal to the sense, the good feeling, and the judgment of this House. I am convinced that the hon. Gentleman will not succeed in his Motion.

Lord J. Russell: Sir, I certainly have made no preparation for taking part either in this debate or in the division upon the Motion; nor is it my intention to address the House otherwise than I think myself called upon in consequence of one part of the observations of the right hon. Gentleman. He says he believes it to have been the practice of those concerned in the Executive department of this country, so far as the Home Department is concerned, to send persons in an excited state of the country to obtain correct reports of what passes at public meetings. I must say at once, and I should be wrong if I were to declare what I should consider to be my duty, if there were an excited state of the public mind either in England or Ireland, if large meetings were held, and if it appeared, by reading the reports in the newspapers, that what passed at those meetings had anything of a seditious or dangerous tendency, I should consider it my duty if I were in office to send persons to obtain correct reports of the proceedings. I do not know that I should do it in any other way than the right hon. Gentleman says he took, namely, by applying to Mr. Gurney, the short-hand writer, to ask him to name some person in whom confidence could be placed, and sending that person to the meetings, in order that he might take accurate notes of the proceedings. I should then be enabled to judge—consulting others, of course, and more especially the Law Officers of the Crown,—as to whether the language used, and the tendency of it, were such as to make it necessary to institute proceedings; and allow me to say, that I do not think there would be any security for the country if the Executive Government did not act so. Is it possible to allow that there shall be in all the newspapers of the country reports of meetings, at which language—I am supposing a case, I am not taking any particular case,—language of the most seditious, of the most disloyal, of the most revolutionary kind shall be used, and that be known, not only to the meeting to which it was addressed, but to the whole country—is it possible, I say, to allow all this, and that the Government alone should have no means of ascertaining and verifying the fact of such language being used? I should think the country would be placed in great danger if the Minister neglected his duty so much. I say, therefore, at once, it was the duty of the right hon. Gentleman to take the course he took; and I maintain, leaving it to his responsibility with respect to the meetings in Ireland, that it was his duty to ascertain correctly what language was used at those meetings. I know, that on a former occasion, persons have been employed in that avocation; when it has been the case, as it appears at present, that short-hand writers have been so employed and regularly paid a salary for their services, I know that a person so engaged has been termed a spy. But nothing can be more different. I understand a spy to be a person employed to act in secret, a person who goes, not to public meetings, but to the secret councils of discontented or disaffected persons,—a person who watches the language used at those secret meetings. The obvious danger of employing such persons is, that they not only may report beyond the truth, but they may excite that very disaffection, and sedition, and treason, they were employed to counteract. But a person who goes, executing fairly and faithfully the commands he has received, to take down a report of what passes at a public meeting, excites no one, he instigates no one to the commission of any crime. He merely observes what he sees, and takes down accurately the words he hears. How can people complain that a public meeting, held professedly to consider their grievances, should be attended by reporters for such a purpose? What right have they to complain of persons taking down their words and observing their conduct? But the right hon. Gentleman proceeded to the other part of his conduct, upon which I certainly should not be so willing, because I am not able, to give an opinion. He referred to the corroboration which he had required from the reporters and writers of certain newspapers. If that was merely asking that they who had taken down reports of these proceedings should appear at the trial and should give their evidence of what they had taken down, in order to verify what had been taken down by the Government reporters, I own I cannot see that there is matter for blame in that case. Whether or not the credit of a newspaper may be injured from its being known that their reporters are in the habit of assisting Government in State prosecutions—that is a matter for the consideration of the proprietors of such newspapers—that is a question of newspaper policy—a matter of newspaper morality. It is a question with which, I think, the Government has no concern. The right hon. Gentleman was not to consider the interests of the newspaper proprietors in the matter; but merely to ask whether or not they were prepared to corroborate the testimony of other witnesses. I must say, however, that the validity of his defence upon this point, with regard to Mr. C. Ross, depends upon the correctness with which Mr. C. Ross observed his instructions. If Mr. Ross said openly he was to make his report to the Government department, either in Ireland or in England, and if he did not conceal his character of Government reporter, why, then, the instructions given him were proper instructions, and properly carried into effect; but if, on the contrary, Mr. Charles Ross had concealed his character as a Government reporter, and if he had thus wormed himself into the councils and the projects of those engaged in the repeal agitation, then there can not be a doubt but the right hon. Gentleman himself must see that some injury has been done, and that his instructions have not been properly carried out. I rose for the purpose, and no other, of stating what I should consider it to be my duty, had I been employed in the service of the Crown, and having done that I should now sit down; but the right hon. Gentleman indulged in a taunt, which had been addressed to him, in that House, and he could not forbear from alluding to it. It was, when the right hon. Gentleman spoke of a "compact alliance," which, he says, has been made with Mr. O'Connell, and wishes me joy of it. Sir, I am perfectly aware of the effect that was produced during the existence of the late Government, by the constant reiteration of Mr. O'Connell being the director of the proceedings, and the disposer of the patronage of that Government, and how much injury was produced by that entirely unfounded slander. Although I may suffer—although the statement of the right hon. Gentleman of a "compact alliance" between Mr. O'Connell and myself has no foundation—yet, Sir, I will never shrink, if I see Mr. O'Connell or any one else—if I see Mr. O'Connell, or some one who has done less for the country to which he belongs—some one who has less talent than Mr. O'Connell—some one who is in a more humble situation in life than Mr. O'Connell—yet, whatever obloquy it may expose me to, I will never shrink from declaring that which I think, when it is my opinion that that person has not had a fair trial. No obloquy which the right hon. Gentleman may cast upon me—no obloquy which the right hon. Gentleman's party can cast upon me, shall deter me from doing my duty—nor from stating that which is my belief—nor what is my sense of the right hon. Gentleman's proceedings with respect to that trial. My belief is, that if the same offence had been committed in this country—supposing the Attorney General here had pursued a somewhat similar course to that adopted in Ireland—my opinion, I say, is, that there would have been a different charge from the judge, and a different verdict from the jury. That, Sir, is my opinion, and I say that be the persons brought to trial who they may, never will I cease to endeavour to obtain for the people of Ireland the full enjoyment of all those rights and all those privileges of which the people of England are so justly proud.

Mr. T. Duncombe wished to be permitted to say a few words, though he was not strictly entitled to reply. He wished to set the right hon. Gentleman right on one or two points. He had never accused the Government of employing spies, when a reporter attended on their behalf, and avowed what was his object at a public meeting. He had never connected the name of Mr. Bond Hughes with that of a spy. Mr. Hughes had attended public meetings, he acknowledged himself as a Government reporter, and at those meetings Mr. Bond Hughes declared that he was received there with every courtesy, and that every facility was given to him to report the proceedings of the meetings. He believed that such would be the case at any public meeting to which the Government might send a reporter, if the reporter only said that he came from the Government, and avowed the character in which he appeared. He believed that no objection would be felt against such a reporter attending—he considered that no objection ought to be felt against his attending; but, on the contrary, that every encouragement should be given to such persons, as it was sure means of making the grievances of the country known to the Government. To come, however, to Mr. Charles Ross, he was not in the same position with Mr. Bond Hughes; and when the right hon. Gentleman thought of employing Mr. Ross, it must have been perfectly well known to him that Mr. Ross was the servant of the Morning Chronicle—that he was in the pay of the Morning Chronicle. He must have known that Mr. Ross was employed in the opposite interest, and then to take such a person—to send him on a secret mission of this sort, it was for the right hon. Gentleman, if he could, to reconcile that to himself. The right hon. Gentleman, no doubt, before he did this, wrote to the proprietors of the Morning Chronicle to say, “I am about to employ one of your servants on a mission of the Government.” Then, the right hon. Gentleman says he gave Mr. Charles Ross certain instructions. Did Mr. Ross obey those instructions? Mr. Ross was examined on the trial, and he was asked if, when he went to the meetings, he had given any notice of his being an agent or reporter of the Government? How was that question answered? With the words “Certainly not.” Well, then, he said this was acting as a spy. He really thought that the right

hon. Gentleman ought to attend to what had been said by his protégé. Mr. Ross was asked if he had communicated to the agent of the Morning Chronicle, that he was deputed by the Government to attend? To this his answer was, “Certainly not.” Here, then, was another part of his examination. He said that he found no difficulty in getting a place on the platform—that he got in through the means of a Gentleman connected with the Dublin Evening Post, who thought that Mr. Ross was in the same interest with himself. He afterwards stated he was in the service of the Standard. He was then asked the question—“Did you apprise the Standard that you were employed by the Government?” Answer—“Certainly not.” This, then, was the person that the Government had employed as their agent. He was the agent of the right hon. the Attorney General for Ireland and the right hon. Baronet. This man, he said, so acting, came under the description of a spy. The right hon. Gentleman might say that such a person was trustworthy; but he left it to the country whether such conduct was honourable—whether it was becoming, that he should have undertaken a duty and not avow it. He affirmed that it never was known in the country that Ross was a Government reporter until he was called to be examined as a witness. And now with respect to the Morning Herald and the Standard he wished to observe that he had never said one word against Mr. Jackson. On the contrary, he thought that the conduct of Mr. Jackson reflected great credit upon him; for he felt ashamed of the duty that had been imposed upon him. At the close of the examination, Mr. Jackson said, “So help me God, I was not aware of my notes having been given up.” Mr. Jackson was compromised by no act of his own. It appeared from the statements of the right hon. Baronet, that he had applied to the Morning Herald and Standard for assistance to carry on his prosecution, and the right hon. Baronet now told him he should not have the Return he had moved for as to what money had been paid. When the right hon. Baronet gave it in the case of Mr. Ross, who was in the employment of the Standard, why refuse it with respect to others? Mr. Ross, in his evidence, says, “I would not have taken 50,000*l.* to come over, unless I had come in the capacity of a newspaper reporter." He afterwards said he might run the risk of being a Government agent for 100,000*l.*, and then lowered it to 75,000*l.*; but by Ross's own confession, they had the fact acknowledged that he was not known to the Irish people but as the reporter of a newspaper, when he was, in truth, the agent of the right hon. Baronet. The right hon. Baronet had alluded to a meeting, at which he was present, and that had reference to the proposition of the hon. Member for Rochdale for stopping the Supplies. That meeting had come to the resolution that they had perfect confidence in him either in stopping or granting the Supplies. [Laughter.] The right hon. Gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, seemed delighted with the idea, for the right hon. Gentleman knew that he was one who had no objection to granting the Supplies. His Motion that day had no reference to the Supplies, and it was uncandid of the right hon. Gentleman to make the assertion, because he knew that it had nothing to do with that subject. Notwithstanding the taunts of the right hon. Baronet—and he must say it was a bad vindication of the Government when the right hon. Gentleman had recourse to old stories—still he was determined to proceed, and whether it were a Judge, a Jury, a Public Prosecutor, or the right hon. Baronet who were mixed up with acts of oppression, he was resolved to submit such acts to the consideration of that House, as long as he had the honour of a seat in it.

Mr. R. M. Bellew remarked, that on this occasion the right hon. Baronet had repeated a statement which had been made before, and to which a full answer had been given, namely, that placards had been circulated, describing Mr. Bond Hughes as a spy and informer. When did that proceeding take place? When Mr. Bond Hughes appeared to have been really guilty of perjury, swearing that to be a fact which was known not to be true. But what was Mr. Bond Hughes's own statement? That he went to Mr. Kemmis's, and to Mr. Kemmis's clerk to explain the mistake—that he did explain that mistake in vain to them—that what he had done was for the purpose of easing his own conscience which they had never disclosed. And now the right hon. Gentleman repeated his statement, whilst he lost sight of this fact with respect to Mr.

Bond Hughes. And now, with reference to the conduct of the Crown Solicitor, it was one to which no explanation up to that moment had been given. He now called upon the Irish Attorney General to give an explanation of that transaction. It was certainly a very gross transaction. A witness deposed to a circumstance which he afterwards ascertained to be false. He told the Crown Solicitor of that fact, and yet, not only had the Crown Solicitor a warrant issued upon the false allegation, but he never allowed the matter to be corrected, and permitted a gentleman for a considerable time to remain under the imputation of having committed perjury. This was the Crown Solicitor's conduct, and up to that time there had been no explanation given of it. It was one of the many proceedings which had produced the impression that from the beginning to the end of those proceedings, there had not been fair play; and however large might be the majority for Ministers in that House, he said that this impression must remain in the minds of the people of Ireland.

Order of the Day read.

On the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair—

REFORM OF THE REPRESENTATION—
 STOPPING THE SUPPLIES.] Mr. S. Crawford rose to move the amendment of which he had given notice :—

"That the several Petitions which had been received and laid on the Table of this House since the commencement of the Session, complaining that this House is not a true representation of the people, be referred to a Select Committee to inquire into the said allegation; and that the further consideration of the Estimates be postponed till such Committee shall report thereon."

The House was aware, the hon. Member said, that many such petitions had been presented, and that up to that moment no notice had been taken of the allegations which they contained. He would beg particularly to draw the attention of hon. Gentlemen to one petition which had been presented from Birmingham, agreed to at a public meeting, and signed by the Mayor, the allegations of which were most remarkable and striking, and yet the Committee on public petitions had not thought proper to print it. The petition to which he referred alleged, in the first place, that the House of Commons as at present constituted, did not represent the people: secondly, that it did not possess the confidence of the country; thirdly, that a large number of the Members of which it was composed had obtained their seats by the most disgraceful bribery and corruption; fourthly, that its proceedings were for the most part influenced by selfish and party motives, rather than by considerations of justice and a due regard to the wants and interests of the people; and further, that the House systematically disregarded the wishes of the people, and legislated in utter recklessness of their welfare. Now, his proposition was, that a Select Committee should be appointed to inquire into the allegations contained in this and the other petitions of the same nature, before they proceeded further in voting the Estimates. He thought, under the circumstances, the House could not claim to represent the feelings and opinions of the country, or if they thought they did, why did they not at once declare that the allegations contained in the petitions were unfounded? He was not now contending for the extension of the Franchise, which he thought ought to be conceded, but he would put it to the House whether some improvement in the representation of the people ought not to take place? If the people had no respect for the Legislature by whom the laws were made, how could they be expected to respect the laws? Thus it was that the country could only be kept under by the maintenance of a large military force. They must maintain the Government either by the respect of the people for the laws, or by a large military force. When he brought forward his proposition on a former evening for postponing the Supplies until the grievances of the people should be considered, it was objected by his hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham (Mr. Gisborne), that his Motion was not sufficiently specific. He hoped the Motion he was now submitting would be considered sufficiently distinct in its object to satisfy his hon. Friend, and that it would have the advantage of his support. He had, however, some ground, he thought, for being surprised at the objection which had been expressed by the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe) to the course he had taken, because that hon. Member had himself proposed that the grievances of the people should be considered before voting the Supplies. That was the constitutional principle for which he was now contending. He was not seeking to delay the business of the House by adjournments, and it was far from his intention vexatiously to persevere in a course which had not some reasonable ground of success. There was no man from whom he had expected more cordial support than the hon. Member for Finsbury, and yet in the very outset the hon. Member for Finsbury had disclaimed all sympathy with the Motion. It was his intention to take the sense of the House upon his Amendment, which the hon. Member concluded by moving.

Mr. Blewitt seconded the Amendment, feeling convinced that it was fully justified under the present circumstances of the country. He had himself presented petitions to this House, denying that the people had any confidence in their present Representatives, and every day's experience tended to confirm him in the opinion that they legislated in that House for themselves. It was but the other day that they had passed a law to exempt certain hon. Members and noble Lords from penalties which they had incurred, and this was done upon the ground of ignorance of the law. He should like to know how far the plea of ignorance of the law would avail any wretched individual who might be charged with—he would not say a crime—but with an infringement of the law? Would his ignorance of the law diminish his punishment one atom? The people saw that the legislation of that House was carried on for the purpose of depriving the people of their bread, and putting money into the pockets of the landlords. He would ask the House to permit him to refer to the opinion of an American writer, which was extremely apposite to the occasion.

“To a man (the hon. Member read) who looks with sympathy and brotherly regard on the mass of the people—who is deeply interested in the ‘lower classes,’ England presents much which is repulsive. Though a Monarchy in name, she is an aristocracy in fact; and an aristocratical caste, however adorned by private virtue, can hardly help sinking an infinite chasm between itself and the multitude of men. A privileged order possessing the chief power of the State, cannot but rule in the spirit of an order, cannot respect the mass of the people; cannot but feel that for them government chiefly exists and ought to be administered; and that for them the nobleman holds in rank as a trust. The condition of the lower orders at the present moment is a mournful commentary on English institutions and civilization. The multitude are depressed in that country to a degree of ignorance, want, and misery, which must touch every heart not made of stone. In the civilized world there are few sadder spectacles than the contrast now presented in Great Britain, of unbounded wealth and luxury with the starvation of thousands and tens of thousands, crowded into cellars and dens without ventilation or light, compared with which the wigwam of the Indian is a palace. Misery, famine, brutal degradation, in the neighbourhood and presence of stately mansions which ring with gaiety and dazzle with pomp and unbounded profusion, shock us as no other wretchedness does. It is a striking fact, that the private charity of England, though almost incredible, makes little impression on this mass of misery—thus teaching the rich and titled to be just before being generous, and not to look to private munificence as a remedy for the evils of selfish institutions.”

The hon. Member concluded by saying that he was much obliged to the House for its attention.

The House divided on the question that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question:—Ayes 91; Noes 15: Majority 76.

House in Committee of SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.] On the Question that a sum not exceeding 544,960*l.* be granted to Her Majesty to defray the Expense of victualling Her Majesty's Navy and Marines,

Dr. Bowring said, he thought when the House was called upon to vote more than half a million of money in one sum, they had a right to expect more detailed information of the manner in which it was to be expended than was furnished in their estimates. The different articles required and their cost should be stated.

Captain Pechell said, that before he should agree to this grant he was desirous of having some explanation from the gallant Admiral opposite on the part of the Board of Admiralty, with reference to a few points connected with the Naval service. First, he wished to know if, in the local newspapers it was true, that Naval officers and the ships of Her Majesty's Navy were employed on the West coast of Ireland, in the enforcement of the Poor-rates, and in compelling Boards of Guardians to make a second rate before the first was collected. This was said to have taken place at Westport; and it was also stated, that the Earl of Lucan, chairman of the Board of Guardians at Castlebar said, that he would encourage every resistance to a second rate. The hon. and gallant Member read extracts from Castlebar and Galway newspapers, to the effect, that Poor-rate collectors had been regularly embarked, with policemen, as protectors, on board Her Majesty's war-steamers; and only a storm bad, by the sea-sickness it occasioned among the land-lubbers, prevented the disagreeable consequences that might have ensued from such unseemly attempts to coerce the collection of rates by the means of thirty-six pounders. But for the “flag of truce,” which had been hung out between himself and the right hon. Gentleman at the Home Office, he should certainly dwell upon this discreditable appropriation of our gallant Naval forces to so distasteful a service; as it was, he would only observe, that when the right hon. Gentleman contemplated the extension of his system into districts at present free from Somerset House despotism, he should consider the inconveniences which might result from having to enforce his scheme by the employment of war-steamers on the English coast. He would now come to another subject, the equipment of our war-steamers; and he must say he thought there had been great neglect in applying the principle of the Archimedean screw, which had not had a fair trial; because if it had, he was satisfied it could have been adopted with the greatest safety and success. The Rattler steamer had been set apart for trying experiments with that screw, but he believed she was employed in trying the experiments of Mr. Brunel and other parties, to the detriment of Mr. Smith. They had ample proof of the superiority of the Archimedean screw, because the French steamer Archimede, commanded by the Prince de Joinville, which accompanied Her Majesty from Treport, had beaten all the other vessels of the squadron, except the Royal yacht. Then, again, he wished to know what was to be done with respect to the Great Britain, that had been built in dock, at Bristol, and when she was finished it was discovered that the dock entrance was so small she could not be got out. There she was caught in a mouse-trap. He believed the present was the most convenient time to call the attention of the Committee to the grievances of naval officers, and he would refer, in the first place, to the Masters. The rank of lieutenant was nominally open to them, but they seldom had it conferred upon them; and felt serious dissatisfaction when they found young gentlemen put over the heads of men who had, perhaps, commanded vessels when the youngsters were unborn. He must mention, however, with great approbation, the promotion of one, the master of the Nemesis, Mr. Hall, who had been engaged in our Chinese operations. That promotion certainly did high honour to the Admiralty and great credit to the service. The clerks, he considered, had not justice done to their merits, for they were doomed to all the hardest work, and had not the honours of the commission opened to them, having nothing to look to but a pursership. When a gallant officer was acting Lord of the Admiralty, matters in these respects should be improved. He could not help alluding to the case of one who had served with him on board a brig under the gallant Officer during the last American war, and who was now no higher than a secretary at Woolwich, where he got hard work on only 150*l.* a year. He condemned the plan of discharging the boys from the Navy, after the term of their apprenticeship had expired, and he thought some regulations ought to be adopted for their re-entry. When there was some difficulty in getting good seamen, they ought to keep in the service those boys who had already acquired some knowledge of gunnery. The rule was to take no boys for the service under 98*lb.* weight, and he believed that the boys coming from the Gilbert Unions and unions under local acts were generally full weight; while those coming from other unions were short weight. The gallant Officer also condemned the use of the ten-gun brigs.

Sir G. Cockburn would endeavour to answer upon every point that had been submitted to the House. The hon. and gallant Member began his speech by finding fault with the Board, for, as it was alleged, permitting their steam-vessels to be employed in the collection of the Poor-rates. He (Sir George Cockburn) told the hon. and gallant Captain, that if he knew of his own knowledge that such was the fact, he would not contradict him. But he could assure him, that he had not heard anything on the subject, and he did not believe it. There was, no doubt, a considerable force on the western coast of Ireland, which had orders to assist and support the magistrates and civil authorities and, their presence might, therefore, have had a moral effect in enabling the civil authorities to collect the Poor rates or other dues, but he had not heard and did not believe, that any naval officer had been employed collecting Poor rates as stated by the hon. and gallant Officer [Captain Pechell: "No."] he (Sir G. Cockburn) appealed to the House whether the gallant Officer had not so stated. In all places on the coast of Ireland, where their ships were moored, the officers were all very well treated, and the people, who came in great numbers on board, appeared much pleased with the sight, and showed no symptoms of ill-feeling, and our officers when a-shore received every mark of respect from all classes: but inquiry should be made as to whether any officer of the Navy had so employed himself as the hon. and gallant Member had insinuated. The next point that was dwelt upon was, that in reference to the Masters. Neither the hon. and gallant Commodore (Sir C. Napier), nor the hon. and gallant Captain, could have a greater respect for this class of men than he had. He did not agree, however, in opinion with them, that the masters ought to be placed exactly in the same rank as lieutenants. The Admiralty had placed the master of a line-of-battle ship upon a higher amount of pay than the first lieutenant of the ship. The other masters were placed on exactly the same amount of pay as the other lieutenants. If they put the masters in the same situations as lieutenants, they would be doing away with that principle upon which the service had hitherto been conducted. That principle was, that these officers should pass through a certain time of servitude before they were made lieutenants, but the masters might have been in the merchant service, and from thence go into a man-of-war at once with the rank of master. He thought that this was a different line altogether to that marked out for lieutenants, and he considered that, for the good of the service, it was fitting that it should be so. The masters in the merchant service were brought up in all the hard work of seamen; most of them had served their apprenticeship. They were excellent men, and no doubt very valuable, but still, as he before said, their line was somewhat different from the other classes of the profession. They were sometimes made lieutenants and captains when they signalised themselves by some particularly gallant action, or performed some good service to the country, but these cases were the exceptions, and not the general rule. He did not, however, wish it to be supposed, that he said anything disparagingly of that class of men. He had no such intention, but, on the contrary, wished to give them every satisfaction that was in his power to obtain for them. It was at present under the consideration of the Board as to how their situation could be possibly improved. The next subject of observation from the hon. and gallant Member was the Archimedean screw. With respect to that, the Board were only anxious, before they laid out much money in its general adoption, to ascertain the fullest advantages that were to be gained from it, and the greatest improvements that could be made in it. Mr.

Smith and Mr. Brunel had agreed to act together in their exertions to discover what was the best description of screw, and he hoped that some material improvements would yet be made, and it was the intention of the Admiralty on the termination of the present experiments, to test the merits of Mr. Steinman Steinman's propeller. Whichever proved to be the best, the Admiralty would adopt. The screw, as hitherto tried, was, after all, a very awkward arrangement, it occupied a large space of the body of the vessel, leaving it only connected by the keel, and consequently rendering the vessel proportionately weak. His impression, however, was, that they would arrive at the knowledge of a screw which would be better than the paddle-wheels. It was only about two or three days ago, that an officer of the Navy had called upon him and said, that he had just come from Edinburgh, where he saw a vessel of seven or eight horse power with a horizontal wheel in her bottom, which enabled her to go at the rate of about eight knots an hour. This vessel was described as a very great improvement, and he had sent down one of the chief engineers to look at it. As to the steam boats, various improvements were daily suggested, Government were trying every thing they possibly could to improve them. They saw of what great importance they must very soon become, and they were endeavouring to find out the best description for sea service, and he had no doubt, that in the event of war, we could turn out a better and a stronger fleet of steam-boats than they could on the other side of the water. With respect to the secretaries to Commodores, the gallant Officer was mistaken. In 1838, an order was made, that the clerk to the Senior Officer at Woolwich, and on the coast of Africa, should receive a salary of 150*l.* a-year each, but they were not entitled to be considered as Secretaries of Flag Officers. With respect to the particular case which the gallant Officer had mentioned, the individual in question, who, he understood, was a good officer, had written to him (Sir G. Cockburn), describing the hardship of his situation, and he (Sir G. Cockburn) proposed to appoint him as a purser, but he stated that he was so circumstanced that he could not serve again afloat, and, therefore sought only for an appointment upon the establishment of the Dockyards. He had accordingly given in his name to the First Lord of the Admiralty, with whom that patronage lay, and he hoped that he would be placed in a situation on that establishment. The next point of the gallant Officer's speech was with respect to the boys. Now these boys were allowed to enter for five years if they wished, and they were kept for that time. As to allowing them to continue permanently in the Navy, it should be recollected, that the Admiralty were tied down to a particular number of men and boys, and they could not keep the boys to the exclusion of men, particularly when they wanted men to man their ships. It was impossible for the gallant Officer to know the claims which were made upon the Admiralty from all parts of the world for ships; and, tied down as he was to a certain number of men, it was impossible to keep more boys in the service. Besides, even if he were able to do so, he was not sure that it would be the wisest course. He was one of those who, after great experience, thought that it was valuable in this country that seamen should run the tour from the Navy to merchant ships, and back again from merchant ships to men-of-war. On board men-of-war they took great pains to instruct the men in gunnery, and when men were paid off they took their turn in the merchant service, having some knowledge of gunnery. Others came into the Navy in their places, and also obtained a knowledge of gunnery, so that if a war should come they would find a large number of seamen in the merchant service possessing a competent knowledge of gunnery. There was another thing—when men went from the Navy into the merchant service, they got some hard rough work, and not so well fed and taken care of, this made them anxious to get back to the Navy; besides which this circulation of men kept up a good feeling between the Navy and the merchant service, and was rather, therefore, a benefit than otherwise. The next point was relative to captain's clerks. The case of the clerks was considered by the Naval and Military Commission of which Lord Minto and others of the then Board of Admiralty were members. But there was this difference between clerks and others—that the clerk was chosen by the captains. If a captain wanted to benefit a man, he took him on board and made him his clerk, and he was responsible to the captain, and to nobody else, and when the captain moved about, he took his clerk with him wherever he went, without asking leave of any one. Therefore, though a clerk might be a long time in the service, yet it should be recollected, that he was not brought into it originally through the Admiralty, they therefore had not quite the same claims on the public as others, but by continuing in the Service, they rose to be Pursers, Secretaries, &c. He did not recollect what was the pay of a clerk, but he knew there were no class of persons from whom he received so many applications for employment, from which it might be inferred, that their situation was not a bad one. The next point was with respect to the ten-gun brig: he thought that those vessels had been very much maligned in that House. He had had a great number of those vessels under his orders, and had found them to be good little vessels. Those vessels were only dangerous from the inattention of those commanding them, by carrying too much sail, and when there was not a good crew of active seamen on board to take in sail quickly. He had often seen them in company with him make better weather in gales than the eighteen-gun brig, and he knew of a ten-gun brig which sailed from Plymouth on a surveying expedition round Cape Horn, and a more violent or desperate sea could not be met anywhere. That vessel remained out for four years, and brought home the identical topmasts and top gallant-masts which she had taken out. Now, he did not think that the same could be said of any eighteen-gun brig. There had also been an instance in the China seas where a ten-gun brig withstood a typhoon, whilst an eighteen-gun brig was laid on her broadside, and nearly lost. However, although he had seen ten-gun brigs make very good weather, and had known them to be most useful, still he admitted that they were vessels he did not entirely admire, for in very few instances were they to be relied on as good sailers. They were now getting rid of them as fast as they could, and substituting vessels of a better construction, and which would sail better. He had now, he believed, answered the different points to which the gallant Officer had referred and he trusted he had shown there was no ground for the complaints that he had advanced.

Captain Pechell wished to explain. He had not said that the Officers of the men-of-war on the coast of Ireland actually went themselves to assist in the collection of Poor-rate, but he had stated that the ships themselves had been made offices for the collection of the rate.

Sir C. Napier said, that it was greatly to be regretted, that when the House was in Committee, about to vote away millions of money, there should be so thin an attendance of Members, for frequently since the House had gone into Committee, there were scarcely more than forty Members in the House. He also noticed, that whenever the House went into Committee upon the Navy Estimates, the reporters shut up their books immediately, and the country was left totally ignorant of the grounds on which millions of the public money were voted away. He denied that it was the wish of himself or his gallant Friend to throw obstacles in the way of the gallant Admiral opposite. His only motive was to benefit the Navy. There were a few points connected with the present Vote to which he wished to call attention. He thought it would be a great improvement, if, instead of paying seamen thirteen months' wages in the year, that they should be paid for twelve months, and that their wages should be raised to 2*l.* per month. This would be a small additional expense and a great benefit to the seamen. He would then go to work with the petty officers, than whom no class of men were more necessary to keep up the discipline of the Navy. He believed that the mutiny of 1797 would never have occurred, or would have been easily put down, had the petty officers at that time been better paid and better treated. He would propose that the first class of petty officers should receive double the pay of the common seamen, and that the second class should receive one-and-a-half the pay of a common seaman. He also wished that there should be an improvement in the mode of paying seaman. The sailor was allowed to draw his wages in slops and necessaries. He was generally careless, and, after returning from long service, he found often that he had drawn the greater part of his wages, and had often only a few pounds coming to him, which were not sufficient to support him until he got another ship. He thought that some change of the present system was worthy of the consideration of the gallant Admiral. He now came to the boys. It appeared that no boy would be allowed to enter who did not weigh ninety-eight pounds, and if those boys got into good ships with good officers, they were treated with the greatest kindness; their education was looked after, their moral conduct was watched over, and they were taught seamanship; but after a certain age they were dismissed. They came home at seventeen—to use a vulgar expression — “Hobble-de-boys, neither men nor boys.” These boys very often could not get ships. They came up to London, and crowded the lodging-houses frequented by their class, where they were taught every description of vice. They were taught to drink and chew tobacco—they had a fiddler to play for them and women to dance with them, and they were made adepts in every kind of vice. He thought, that whatever money it might cost, the Government was bound to take these boys on board the flag ships, and provide for them in preference to introducing new hands into the service. With respect to pensioned seamen, he thought the present Government went too far in allowing them their pension and their pay together—it would be a better arrangement to allow them increased wages, say 25*l.* a year. In his opinion, twenty-one years was too long a period for a sailor to look forward to for a pension, and it would be much better if he got a pension at the end of fourteen years' service. Relative to Masters, he thought that Lieutenants, who had not interest to get on, ought to be allowed to enter the Merchant service, in order to qualify themselves to become Masters, and he was sure that that arrangement would secure them good officers to fill the situation of Master. With respect to ten-gun brigs, nothing would convince him that they were good vessels, and he was glad they were getting rid of them. He (Commodore Napier) was glad to find that it was intended in future not to keep officers and vessels idle in port, but to send them to sea for exercise. The gallant Admiral said, they were to be sent on summer cruises, but he (Commodore Napier) hoped they would be sent on winter cruises. Summer cruises were not what made good sailors, but let them be sent in winter to cruise off the Hebrides, and there they would see what a gale of wind was.

Mr. W. Williams complained of the want of information regarding the details of this Vote. He thought it very hard that the rate of promotion in the Royal Marines should be so slow. He knew Officers who had been in that corps for forty years, and had attained no higher rank than that of Captain.

Mr. Tufnell called the attention of the Board of Admiralty to the claims of a most meritorious class of Officers in Her Majesty's dockyards, the inspectors of shipwrights. These Officers performed duties of a more responsible nature than the quartermen, having to superintend two gangs twenty men and boys each, instead of one gang of twenty-five men, who used to be under the quartermen's superintendence. The quartermen's pay was from 160*l.* to 180*l.* a year, whilst the inspector of shipwrights had only 100*l.* Their duty was to appoint the men to their work, to see that it was properly executed, and to keep the men to their tasks. When the salary was first fixed only five days' work in the week was required of them. They have now to work eight days, whilst their salary remains the same, besides which they had no allowance for working extra hours, when extraordinary exertions might be required as for docking and grounding ships. But besides the lowness of their salary, their superannuation was calculated on too reduced a scale for forty years' service—twenty as workman, ten as leading man, and ten as inspector, they were only entitled to 13-14ths of their pay as superannuation, or 32*l.* 10*s.* a year; whereas, by working for the same time in an inferior situation, they would be entitled to nearly the same amount of retirement. In some cases, he understood, they would even have less superannuation than if they had continued as working men. A shipwright who had served twenty years received a retiring allowance of 20*l.* per annum, whilst if, in addition to these twenty years, he had served anything less than fifteen years as inspector, he would only be entitled to 25*l.* per annum, or 5*l.* in addition for fourteen years' service. He brought the case of this deserving class of officers before the House in no party spirit, but solely from a sincere desire to do justice to men who discharged responsible duties for which they were ill-remunerated, and should leave the matter in the hands of his hon. Friend the Secretary of the Admiralty and the First Naval Lord in full confidence, that if, in considering the case, they agreed with him in thinking the remuneration of the inspectors inadequate, they would (notwithstanding the suggestion might come from his side of the House), rise the salary of this class of officers in proportion to the work and responsibility which were imposed upon them.

Mr. Sidney Herbert was not prepared to say that he agreed in the inadequacy of the salary enjoyed by the inspectors, but thought that their scale of superannuation was calculated, perhaps, on too low a basis, and would consider their case.

Vote agreed to.

On the question that a sum of 126,826*l.* to defray the Salaries of Officers and contingent Expenses in the Admiralty Offices, be granted to Her Majesty,

Captain Rous wished to make a few observations on the state of the Navy generally. It was part of the calculations of the Admiralty, he believed, that in case of war they could command the services of about 800 steamers in the Navy or Merchant-service, who would be able to sweep the narrow seas. Now, he should like much to know whether there were 200 officers in the Navy who had been brought up to know anything of steam-engines or machinery, or about the management of a steam-ship. At least, one-half of Her Majesty's steamers were commanded by officers who could know nothing whatever of steam machinery, and, who, consequently, instead of commanding their own ships, were the mere servants of their own engineers, and utterly incapable of seeing that any necessary evolution was properly performed. As to the complements of the sailing-vessels and their officers in manœuvring, he recollected the anecdote which had been told by the hon. and gallant Commander opposite, who said that when on the coast of Syria an evolution had been performed by the French squadron in a style so admirable that the British ships could not match it. He regretted, as a man who had been at sea for thirty years, that we should have any cause to shrink from competition with the French, a people who had been inferior to us for 500 years. Nothing could be more absurd than to employ officers to command ships who had been twenty years on shore, while young and active officers were laid on the shelf. He had said this himself to Lord Haddington, and told him that while this system was acted upon, it was impossible they could have one man fit to command a ship. He had often seen line-of-battle ships get under weigh with 500 or 600 men, in a manner so shameful and disgraceful, that it was enough to make the tears stand in a seaman's eyes. The French, owing to the great care and pains which their Government had bestowed of late years on the education and practice of the Officers, and the manning of the ships, could now get under weigh in a manner to extort the admiration of their rivals. Officers of twenty-five years standing were considered too young for employment in the British service; he remembered that, some two or three years ago, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had told himself and the gallant Commodore opposite, that they were too young to have an opinion on a naval question. Yet the right hon. and gallant Officer had commanded a fleet before he was of his (Captain Rous's) age, and he was now fifty years old. In the navy no man was allowed to have arrived at the years of discretion until he could no longer see with his own eyes, hear with his own ears, or chew with his own teeth. He wished to say a word as to the ships which were now in process of construction, chiefly on Sir W. Symonds' principle. He would venture to prophesy that this system would share the fate of many former systems, and that the surveyor's ships, on which so many millions had been expended, would one day only be fit for firewood. In 1808, when he entered the service, the 74-gun ships of the same class as the Forty Thieves, were the best ships in the service, except the captured French 80's, of the class of the Malta, Canopus, &c. In course of time they were condemned, and became a bye-word. The 10-gun brigs were at one time considered the best and swiftest ever built, and had superseded the old 14-gun brigs. In the American war we built corvettes so narrow, that they could not stand up under canvass. The first that went to sea very nearly foundered in a gale of wind, and when the captain reported this, and added, that it was one of the severest gales of wind he had ever witnessed, the Admiralty turned round upon him, and said, "No wonder then if it was the case, for any vessel would be nearly lost in such a gale." All the Captains after this reported favourably, for it was well known that the Admiralty did not relish cold water being thrown on any of their projects. The 28-gun frigates, of 500 tons, since known as the donkey-frigates, were at one time considered as desirable ships, he had himself commanded one for four years, in which he had sailed 81,000 miles. He reported to the Admiralty that it would make a fine merchantman, but, that as a man-of-war, it was a disgrace to the country, and he found to his astonishment, that there were only two others who had reported unfavourably, because they knew that they would ruin their prospects if they did. The 18-gun brigs were famous in the service for their excellent qualities, and were converted into ships; this was known to be an Admiralty whim, and every man reported favourably of them, except Captain Dundas, son to the First Lord of the Admiralty, who wrote word back, that they had spoiled a very fine brig, and turned her into a very bad ship. This Officer was written to, both privately and publicly, by Mr. Croker, to withdraw his letter, but he insisted that he was right, and right he certainly was, for there was not a single dissentient voice in the service two years afterwards, when it was known that the Admiralty of the day no longer took any interest in them. He mentioned this in order that when they heard such flourishing accounts of Sir William Symonds' ships, and the Penelopes, they might believe as little of it as possible, unless they heard the contrary side. The fastest and finest vessel he had ever seen, was the Water-Witch, built by Mr. White, which was purchased into the service eight or nine years ago. It remained five years on the coast of Africa, and last year the Admiralty sent down to Portsmouth Dock-yard, to obtain an estimate of the expense that would be necessary to put her into a complete state of service. The surveyors surveyed her, and reported that it would cost about £6,400*l.*, he believed that was the sum, but the right hon. Gentleman would correct him if he misstated it—and that she was not a good sailer. It was supposed the Admiralty would order her to be broken up, but Mr. White, of Cowes, when he heard of the affair, sent up word to say, that he would take the contract into his hands, and complete her for exactly one-half of the estimate of the dock-yard. Why did he mention this, except in order to prove that every report from the dock-yard of ships not built by themselves, or built in a merchant's yard, was to be received with extreme suspicion, if it was not utterly worthless? There they were all combined, and many of them hated one another like poison. Many of these builders in the dock-yards to his knowledge, did so, and all joined to prevent any other person building ships for

Her Majesty's service. Every man who commanded a yacht knew that there were men in London, Liverpool, Bristol, or the Isle of Wight, who were as much superior to Sir W. Symonds, as that naval architect was to a common shipwright. He had heard every Admiralty in turn attempt to humbug the House, because there used to be nobody to find them out, but, thank God, since the peace it was not so easy to do that, on account of so many Gentlemen having yachts of their own, who had made themselves masters of the subject; so that the House could no longer be bamboozled year after year as they had been formerly. If, then, those sneaking fellows were not misleading them, the good sense of the House would rise up in judgment against the Admiralty Board. The question was, whether it was best to employ active men, who had been always at sea, and never had been laid on the shelf, or some valuable old Officers, who had been from a quarter to half a century on shore, who knew nothing about a ship, and of whom the only good that could be hoped, was, that they might have a good right-hand-man as a Lieutenant or Master, that they would invariably hold their tongues on all occasions, and that they would give very good dinners to the Lieutenants and Midshipmen, when they entertained them.

Sir G. Cockburn hoped, when the hon. and gallant Officer did him the honour to quote him, he might be at least quoted fairly and truly, for he would venture to say, that he never had used such an expression to the hon. and gallant Officer, or to any one else, that he was too young to give an opinion. What he did say was, that the gallant Officer had made use of an expression regarding an old and gallant Officer which he thought not very becoming. He apologised for his own age, and said that he hoped, after what had passed, the House would not refuse to hear an old Officer. With respect to the charge which the gallant Officer had thought proper to bring against the Admiralty, he could only say, that what he had stated against them generally was not more true than what he stated against him individually. He defied any Board to take more pains than they had done since they came to the Admiralty in endeavouring to improve the building of the Navy. He considered Sir W. Symonds to be a man to whom the service was very much indebted, and who had made great improvements in the build of ships, but at the same time he was free to say that he did not think his ships were perfect, and he knew that when persons took up a system, they sometimes became too exclusively attached to it; so it was felt right that some check should be kept on that valuable Officer. They had directed all the master-shipwrights to be called together at Woolwich, to endeavour to find out the best mode of building ships for strength and efficiency. He believed they had, between them, got at what appeared to him to be perfection, with regard to the principle of the construction of sterns. Three of the most talented native artists, who had gained the highest prizes in mathematics, and written the best essays, were sent back to Chatham to meet and examine the building of the ships, and they had given in a very elaborate statement, giving reasons why every ship had faults, and why perfection had not been yet obtained. They were now employing those persons to build a ship themselves, in order to show whether they could not produce the best ship in the world. The Admiralty, therefore, were not to be told that they were taking no pains to improve the Naval Architecture of the country. Great advances had been already made. The Vernon frigate, it should be remembered, was nearly of the same tonnage as the Victory, which had been the flag ship in some of our largest naval battles. All classes had advanced; he remembered that even the twenty-eight gun frigates were thought most desirable ships; when he went to sea first, they were looked upon to be almost perfection. There was the little frigate Dido, with twenty-six nine-pounders, which went alongside of one of the largest French frigates and captured her, under the command of Sir H. Blackwood. The gallant commodore had said that the French fleet on the Syrian coast got under weigh in a manner so brilliant, that the British could not imitate them. But, per contra, he (Sir G. Cockburn) had been told by the captain of the Asia, that being under the lee of the land with three or four French ships in a heavy gale of wind, the British ship was the only one which stood it out. He believed that if we had a French squadron off Brest in a gale of wind, and an English squadron after it, the gallant Captain would soon find there were some officers in the Navy who knew their business. It was very easy to get up in the House and say that our officers were unskilled or unpractised, but he would undertake to say, that when occasion arose it would be found that there was as much zeal and arduency as during the war, though there could not well be the same extent of practice, when three-fourths of the officers were on half-pay. He entertained not the smallest doubt that they would manifest as great superiority over other nations as they had ever done.

Rear-Admiral Dundas said, it ought not to go abroad that there was anything like failing in our officers or our men. On the contrary he would say, that having known the Navy forty-years, he had never known it in a better condition. The men were better educated, better fed, with much less punishment than formerly, and better exercised at the guns. He said, therefore, there were just as good fish in the sea as ever came out of it.

Captain Pechell, after expressing his regret that the French fleet should have been praised at the expense of the English Navy, said he was glad to hear the hon. and gallant Officer opposite, Captain Rous, state his opinions in the independent manner he had. It was a good example to naval Officers on the other side of the House. The hon. and gallant Member then proceeded to praise the qualities of the Waterwitch, and to express his approval of the vessels now building. He had not understood the hon. and gallant Officer opposite to impugn those, but to allude to a previous date, when vessels were built which could neither be put alongside an enemy, nor were able to run away from one. The hon. and gallant Admiral appeared offended at the report of the Shipwreck Committee, but he assured him that it was of no use for any individual Lord of the Admiralty to stand up in defence of such ships as were there alluded to, for the country at large disapproved of them. There was a disgraceful instance of a ship of war being in such a condition that she was actually taken by a pirate, and the crew murdered. With respect to the experiments now making with the Archimedean screw in the Rattler, he felt it his duty to say that the experiments were now making by Mr. Brunel over Mr. Smith, who was the inventor of the screw, and the consequence was, that the vessel sailed nearly a knot less every time she was tried. While the vessel made ten knots under Mr. Smith, she now only made eight. This was not fair, and was calculated to be highly injurious to Mr. Smith, who would have the discredit of the failure, and he thought that this explanation was due to that Gentleman. The Members of the Board of Admiralty received their half-pay, while the other officers holding offices of emolument under the Crown, or on foreign service, or in holy orders, had not the like privilege. He had no objection to the hon. and gallant Admiral receiving his half-pay, but let the principle be fairly carried out. There was the Lieutenant Governor of Greenwich Hospital, Sir James Gordon, a gallant Officer who had served his country, and was now going about with a wooden leg; he could not receive his half-pay, and why should he not be put on the same footing in that respect as the Governor of Chelsea Hospital? Why did not the Government apply to the Attorney and Solicitor General for their opinion, whether Sir J. Gordon could or could not legally receive his half-pay and if there was a doubt, let the gallant officer have the benefit of it. He must complain too of the manner in which the Income Tax pressed upon officers and their families. These were points which he trusted the hon. and gallant Admiral would give his attention to: they were subjects which lay Lords might not understand, but officers expected relief from those who had lived with them and sailed with them; and now there was a strong Government he hoped the hon. and gallant Admiral would attend to the suggestions he had thrown out.

Captain Rous explained that he had never entertained the idea that the French navy was superior to ours in anything. He had quoted a speech formerly made by the hon. and gallant Commadore. He (Captain Rous) had the most perfect confidence in the seamen and marines of the country; and if war were unfortunately to arise, he would stake his existence upon them.

Sir C. Napier congratulated the House and the country that naval Officers on both sides of the House, laying aside party considerations, had boldly spoken out as the hon. and gallant Officer opposite had done upon matters connected with the welfare of the navy. When he (Sir C. Napier) had brought the state of the Navy under the consideration of the House, and was supported by the noble Lord, the Member for Staffordshire, the right hon. Baronet opposite said it was a bad thing when naval Officers combined together against the Government on naval matters; but he thought there was nothing more advantageous to the country than for naval Officers to combine together to reform and correct the deeds of every Admiralty, whether Whig or Tory. The Penelope had been represented as a splendid vessel, perfectly dry, and never shipping a drop of water, while it was notorious to all but the captain of that vessel, that so far from being dry, she was almost always under water, and, like a large porpoise, only came up once an hour to breathe. She was only fit to drown the men. The hon. and gallant Officer entered into a technical comparison of the qualities of the Penelope, the Albion, the Rodney, the Powerful, and the cost of the build of each; contending that it was useless to build ships at a vast expence carrying only six guns more than those built at a far less expence. He recommended that vessels of that class now on the stocks should be taken to pieces and begun afresh. In respect to what he had formerly said as to the evolutions of the French fleet, he repeated that their evolutions were performed in a masterly manner in fine weather. But the French ships were manned by young men. As men grew older, they grew more idle, more disposed to rest quietly at anchorage, than to exercise their ships; but if we pursued the same system as the French, and got young officers to command the ships, and young Admirals to command the fleets, we should exhibit the same activity, and there was not the least doubt we should beat them out and out. But that was not our system. At Malta, for example, there was a ship bearing an Admiral's flag who was seventy-five years of age. When it was considered that half of our young officers were brought up in the large ships lying at Portsmouth and Plymouth, could the House be surprised that the French, or the Americans or any other nations beat us? He did not blame the officers, but he blamed the Admiralty, and the constitution of the Admiralty, and he blamed the right hon. Baronet for not assenting to the very moderate proposition he (Sir Charles Napier) had made, of appropriating 15,000*l.* to enable old officers to retire. If they desired to compete with their rivals, they must do as the French did, and have young men of forty to command their fleets. Before he consented to the vote, he wished to know if the hon. and gallant Admiral had changed the opinions he had formerly expressed on the constitution of the Board of Admiralty?

Sir George Cockburn would not say anything about the constitution of the Board of Admiralty, which was not of his creation. While he was at the Board he would do his duty to the best of his ability, and when he was no longer of any use, he would retire. When, however, the gallant Officer said that no one, except the Captain of the Penelope, would say that she was a dry vessel, and when she was called a mere porpoise, he must refer to a letter from Sir Charles Rowley, who was at sea with her, having her under his command; and he declared that during the time she was with the squadron, there were generally heavy seas, and when she was to leeward of him he had ordered her to steam to windward against a heavy sea, and that she appeared to do so without straining, and was perfectly dry.

Admiral Dundas had received a private letter from Captain Jones, saying that she had completely succeeded, and was the best sea boat he ever knew.

Vote agreed to.

On the Vote of 495,656*l.* to defray the charge for Military Pensions and Allowances connected with the Navy,

Mr. W. Williams urged that this Vote should be postponed until further explanation were given in the printed Estimates respecting it. All that he required was, that a similar statement to that affixed to the Army Estimates should be printed with the Navy Estimates.

Mr. S. Herbert explained that formerly the Vote included items which were now contained in it; if they had been, there would have been a considerable reduction this year, instead of an increase.

Sir C. Napier wished to draw the attention of the Admiralty to a subject he had alluded to before, namely, that if an officer lost a limb, or received a wound nearly equal to the loss of a limb, he did not get anything. He (Sir C. Napier) had had a shot wound himself in one of his legs. If he were to receive a wound in the same leg again, two inches deeper, he would be entitled to a pension: but if it were to be in the other leg, and not so deep as to make a wound equal to the loss of a limb, he should get no pension at all. He thought in future it would be fair and just, where an officer received a wound, that he should be examined by a medical man, who should report to the Admiralty what pension he ought to have.

Sir G. Cockburn said, that if the wound were not equal to the loss of a limb, the officer received a gratuity; but if it was equal to the loss of a limb, he got a pension.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, March 4, 1844.

MINUTES.] BILLS. Public.—1st. Judicial Committee of Privy Council Bill Amendment.

Private.—2nd. Bow Brickhill Estate.

PETITIONS PRESENTED. By Earl Powis, from Dyffryn Clwyd, and 17 places, against Union of Sees of St. Asaph and Bangor; and from Bistre, for the same, and in favour of a Bishopric at Manchester.—From Nettlecombe, Treborough, and Stogumber, against Alteration of the Corn Laws.—From Haslingden Union, against Poor Laws Amendment Act.—By the Marquess of Normanby, from Ballysax School, complaining of the Board of Charitable Donations (Ireland).

REPEAL AGITATION (IRELAND).] The Marquess of Westmeath wished to direct the attention of their Lordships to a statement which he made during the debate on the Motion of the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Normanby). He stated on that occasion, that in a certain parish in the county of Westmeath, in Ireland, a Roman Catholic clergyman, who had since died, was suspended from the exercise of his clerical functions in consequence of his having refused to assist in the collection of the Repeal Rent, and the Agitation of the Question of a Repeal of the Union. From the statement which had been made to him (the Marquess of Westmeath) on that subject, he assumed its truth; but when the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Normanby), on a former occasion in that House, read a letter in contradiction to that statement, he appeared to hesitate in reiterating the statement, for, with the courtesy that was due from one Member of their Lordships' House to another, he felt that it would be well to write to Ireland after that contradiction, in order that he might ascertain if the statement which had been made to him would be still maintained. He had, since that period, referred to parties in Ireland on the subject, and he found, by that reference, that what he had stated on a former occasion was substantially the fact. He had stated that the clergyman was suspended, but if he had used the word superseded he would have been more correct in what he said. That clergyman had exercised his influence in preventing the collection of money amongst his parishioners for the purpose of being applied to the furtherance of the Repeal Agitation. He had also refused to assist in that Repeal Agitation, or to aid in one of the monster meetings which had taken place in Westmeath last year; and the consequence of his adopting that line of conduct was, that the Roman Catholic bishop of the diocese sent word to the clergyman (the Rev. Mr. Murray) to the effect that he would send a curate to officiate in the clergyman's chapel for three subsequent Sundays. The curate did, according to that intimation, attend and officiate at the chapel for three subsequent Sundays, and immediately preceding the monster meeting in Westmeath he preached in that chapel; so that the clergyman (Mr. Murray) had been superseded in his own parish. The noble Marquess opposite might ask on what authority he made that statement, but the noble Marquess must be aware that political addresses from the Altar became publicly known in Ireland throughout the surrounding districts, and were very freely talked over whilst they possessed novelty. In order that their Lordships might understand what the nature of the meeting was, at which Mr. Murray refused to assist, he (the Marquess of Westmeath) would describe to them the language which two Bishops of the Roman Catholic Church used on that occasion. The meeting took place on the 14th of May last, and it was stated by the papers which advocated a repeal of the Union, that fifty-one priests attended, and that the Roman Catholic Bishop was in the chair. At the dinner which took place after the meeting, Dr. Cantwell, the Roman Catholic Bishop, said that the Irish deserved and should have self-government, and he congratulated the meeting on the glorious demonstration which they had on that day made, and which showed that Westmeath was fully alive to the hopelessness of England rendering justice to Ireland, and it also showed that they were determined to co-operate with their countrymen, under the peaceful guidance of their wise leader, in removing the degrading stigma of inferiority, and raising Ireland again to the dignity of a nation. That was the language of Dr. Cantwell, and he was followed by another Roman Catholic Bishop, who used language of a similar nature and import. He felt it his duty as a Magistrate to bring this subject before their Lordships, and he trusted that he had done so with sincerity, perhaps with earnestness, but with a perfect freedom from party feeling.

The Marquess of Normanby said, that the substantial portion of the case would be best met by reading to their Lordships a denial with which he had been entrusted on the part of the Right Rev. Dr. Cantwell of any interference with the Rev. Mr. Murray in the discharge of his clerical functions. The noble Marquess seemed to have a strange mode of making out his case. The noble Marquess had made a specific charge, which was met by a specific denial, upon which the noble Marquess retorted, by reading not only a speech of the Right Rev. Dr. Cantwell, but the speech of another titular Bishop also. Certainly that was carrying the doctrine of conspiracy rather farther than it had been carried even of late years. He had received by this day's post a letter from the Right Rev. person, Dr. Cantwell, who assured him that he had never either spoken or written a word to the late Dr. Murray, parish priest of Clonmellon (four miles from the residence of the Marquess of Westmeath), and that for the fourteen years that he had been Bishop of that diocese, in which Dr. Murray had been forty-five years the incumbent of a parish, he had lived with the Rev. Gentleman on terms of the closest friendship, and had always regarded him with respect, esteem, and affection. He stated that he had never written a word to the Rev. Gentleman on the subject of Repeal, and he concluded his letter by stating that though the season when the Rev. Gentleman died was one of great severity, he (the Right Rev. Dr. Cantwell) travelled thirty miles to attend the solemn offices of the Church at his funeral, at which a large number of clergymen and 1,600 laymen attended, and on that occasion he expressed the greatest regret for the loss of so exemplary a pastor, and one characterized by such zeal in the discharge of his duty. That would show that the Rev. Mr. Murray had not incurred the displeasure of the writer. Now, after that letter, what grounds remained for the charge of interference with the Rev. Mr. Murray? The only ground on which the charge rested was, that a curate had attended the chapel of Clonmellon for three Sundays. Why the aged and Rev. Gentleman after having performed the duties of parish-priest upwards of forty years, left his duty to be performed by his curate for three successive Sundays, shortly before his death. The letter further stated that the Right Rev. Prelate perceived that the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Westmeath) said the statement was generally believed in the neighbourhood of Clonmellon, but he (Dr. Cantwell) believed that, so far from its being generally accredited, no man of respectability in that part of the country entertained the opinion that such was the fact. Having acquainted their Lordships with the contents of that letter he would not make a single remark on the subject in addition, as he thought the letter itself was a sufficient answer.

The Marquess of Westmeath said, that their Lordships would be able to decide between the two statements. He believed that it would not be safe as regarded the person who gave him the information if he mentioned his name; and therefore he would sooner have himself exposed to the suspicion of having exaggerated the circumstances than to state the person's name. He had heard the matter at the time, and he still firmly believed it notwithstanding the contradiction which had been read to their Lordships, who would give it its full value when they recollected the language which he had just read as having been used by the Right Rev. person. Their Lordships would judge whether he (the Marquess of Westmeath) would be inclined, without what he considered sufficient ground, to make an attack on an individual with whom he had no acquaintance whatever. There was another thing which he had to state. The noble Marquess opposite alluded to what had taken place as having occurred, in the living of Clonmellon, whereas it was in another chapel, under the jurisdiction of the Rev. Mr. Murray, that the Curate officiated, namely, Kilallen.

deep as to make a wound equal to the loss of a limb, he should get no pension at all. He thought in future it would be fair and just, where an officer received a wound, that he should be examined by a medical man, who should report to the Admiralty what pension he ought to have.

The Marquess of Normanby said the denial had no reference to any particular chapel, for it was a distinct and positive denial, on the part of Dr. Cantwell, that he either spoke or wrote to Mr. Murray on the subject of Repeal.

Subject dropped.

SLAVERY IN LOUISIANA.] Lord Brougham said, that he had recently received many applications upon a very painful subject, and though he refused to present any petition on that subject, he wished very shortly to state to their Lordships the reasons which induced him to refuse to take any part with reference to it. Nothing could be more delicate than any interference of either House of Parliament, or any Member of either House, with respect to any matter or thing which belonged purely to the domestic policy of any foreign country, or belonging to the administration of the Municipal Law of that country; and he thought it no reason for breaking through that rule, that we considered a law to be improper to be enacted, or that it was in its nature or character revolting to our feelings. That would form no reason for our interference, because we had nothing to do with any domestic law, but our own law and its administration; and we had no power to interfere, nor had we had any mission to interfere with any law of whatever character in any foreign country, whilst that foreign country confined itself to its own law and the administration of that law. He held that rule to be of so sacred a principle, that he had refused to take any step with respect to the subject to which he now adverted, although it had been of late frequently brought under his notice, and although it was a case which greatly interested his feelings. A man had been condemned to death in the Criminal Court of Louisiana, for abetting the escape of a slave, and the sentence had been passed upon that man by the learned Judge in every respect as if the man had committed a murder—with the same appropriateness of language to the solemnity of the occasion—with the same lecture upon the enormity of his crime—the same admonition to the unfortunate criminal to make a proper use of the interval that would elapse before he died upon the gallows to make his peace with an offended God—with the same accustomed reference to the sacred truths of religion, as if the man so sentenced had impiously and irreligiously committed a cruel and barbarous murder—that was the case to which his attention had been so frequently attracted, and his answer was, that he had no authority to interfere, or call on the Government of this country to interfere with the laws of other nations. He was bound to suppose that the American law had been duly considered—he was bound to suppose that the American, or he should say the law of Louisiana, had been justly administered—he was bound to suppose that it was under such a just administration of the law of his own country that a criminal had been sentenced to lose his life, and he had no right to impeach the judge's construction of the law, or his ignorance of it, or to accuse him of any mal-administration of the law, or any perversion of it in condemning the man to die for aiding in the escape of a slave—that was the law of Louisiana—that was not the law of England. God forbid! but when he said that he had no right to say one word against the law or those who administered it in Louisiana, he might humbly, however, and respectfully towards the legislature of Louisiana, express his fervent hope that advantage would be taken of the long interval between the time of passing his sentence and the 26th of April, which was the time appointed for carrying it into execution—that advantage would be taken of that period for the sacred purpose of extending mercy to that criminal; for he spoke of him as a criminal because the laws of his country had so dealt with him; but he hoped and trusted that the humane and merciful consideration of the government of Louisiana would be extended to that unfortunate individual. With these observations he would quit this painful subject, and he trusted he should be considered as having completely vindicated himself for having refused to interfere in the way he had been urged.

BOARD OF CHARITABLE BEQUESTS — SYSTEM OF NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND).] The Marquess of Normanby said, he rose for the purpose of presenting the petition of which he had given notice, and wished to call the attention of their Lordships to the statements which it contained, and the important nature of the subject. It was a petition from John and Elisabeth

Ryan, who were the teachers of the Parochial School at Ballysax, in the County of Kildare. The Petitioners stated that for the last twelve months they had not received the annual interest on a sum of 200*l.* left by a former Rector of the parish, the Rev. Mr. Tew, it having been unjustly stopped for the last seventeen months by the Board of Charitable Bequests in Ireland, in consequence of the introduction of the National System of Education into the School. The importance of the subject was not however to be considered as confined to the interests of the petitioners themselves, or the alleged injustice they suffered in consequence of the stoppage of a portion of what they considered to be a fair reward for their services. They lived in a remote district, and they were individuals who were unknown and obscure, and whose income from their occupation amounted to about 40*l.* a year; but to those who were the stopping of the interest of the sum of 200*l.* small as it might appear, was of much importance. It was not, however, as regarded the interests of those individuals alone that he brought forward the subject, but in consequence of the course which the Board of Charitable Bequests in Ireland adopted, in order that they might see how far that conduct was likely to gain credit for sincerity on the part of those who professed to support the System of National Education in Ireland. The rev. gentleman, the Rector of the parish in which the school is situated, when he found that the payment of the interest of the legacy to which he alluded was stopped, appealed to the authorities on the subject, and stated that unless it was paid he would bring the subject before Parliament; and the prayer of the petitioners on this occasion was, that their Lordships would appoint a Committee to inquire into the constitution of the Board of Charitable Bequests. They complained that the interest of the legacy was withheld because the System of National Education in Ireland had been introduced into the school, and they prayed an inquiry into the constitution of the Board. He (the Marquess of Normanby) would make no statements which he could not prove; and if Government did not, after his statement, direct an inquiry into the subject, he would after Easter move for a Committee to institute that inquiry. In the year 1764 a Committee of the House of Lords took upon themselves the examination and control of Charitable Bequests and Donations in Ireland, and they instituted prosecutions with a view to the restoration of sums which had been misappropriated. Just previous to the Union it occurred to the Irish Parliament that something should be done with reference to these trusts, as this Committee would no longer exist, and one of the last Acts of that Parliament was to establish a Board of Charitable Bequests and Donations. That Board was to be composed of the Lord Chancellor, the Judges of the Prerogative Court, of all the Common Law Judges in Ireland, of all the Bishops, and of the nineteen Rectors of the different parishes in Dublin. But its exclusively Protestant character gave rise to many complaints on the part of the Roman Catholics. In 1829, under the Administration of the Duke of Wellington, a Committee of the House of Commons was appointed to consider this subject, and much important evidence as to the effect of the Protestant constitution of the Board on the Roman Catholics was given by Mr. O'Connell, among others. That hon. and learned Gentleman mentioned that in the course of his professional practice he had been several times consulted by persons who felt themselves aggrieved by, and distrustful of, this Board in consequence of the circumstance referred to, and that he had every reason to believe that considerable sums had been left away from schools which would have been bequeathed by Roman Catholics for the beneficial effect of education, had they felt more confidence in this Board. The impression made upon the Committee by this and similar evidence was such that it presented a Report recommending that the laws regulating the Administration of Charitable Trusts in Ireland should be revised. Nothing, however, was done until 1838, when the hon. Member for Waterford brought in a Bill to alter the constitution of the Board, which Bill passed through most of its stages in the other House, but did not reach the Upper House, in consequence, probably, of the state of public business, the attention of Parliament being then greatly occupied with the Municipal Reform Bill, which was then in the third year of its Parliamentary struggle. The facts of the case now before their Lordships, were simply these. The Rev. Mr. Tew, formerly Rector of Ballysax, by his will, left to the then Rector of Ballysax, and

"Passing rich on forty pounds a year,"

"I leave and bequeath to the Minister of the parish of Ballysax, in the diocese and county of Kildare, and to his successors, Ministers of the said parish, for ever, the sum of 200*l.* sterling, in trust, nevertheless and to the intent, that the said sum, when paid, shall be vested and laid out by him in the purchase of such Government Stock, as shall at that time be deemed the most eligible and advantageous, and shall yield and bear the highest rate of interest payable at the Bank of Ireland, which interest only it is my will shall be applied by him and his successors, Ministers of the said parish, towards the establishment and support of a Parochial School therein, and to the payment of the salary or salaries of a Protestant schoolmaster and schoolmistress for instructing the children of the poor inhabitants of the said parish, to be nominated and appointed by him and his successors, and the sole management of the said School to be vested in them, or their licensed Curates assistant, on the express condition, however, that they shall at every annual visitation of the Lord Bishop of Kildare, present a report in writing of the state of the said Parochial School of Ballysax, containing an account of the number and names of the children educating therein, and of the receipts and disbursements thereof for the past year, together with any other particulars relating to the same, which may be considered either necessary or interesting."

By a codicil to his will, the testator says :—

"With respect to that part of the foregoing will, which vests the sole management of the Parochial School of Ballysax in the Minister of the parish, I mean thereby, that the sole management of the pecuniary concerns of the said School, and the nomination and appointment of the schoolmaster and schoolmistress should be vested in them; but it is not my intention to preclude such benevolent persons as subscribe towards the support of these schools, from visiting them, or forming such rules and regulations as they may consider conducive to their interest and prosperity, provided they are concurred in and fully approved of before they are adopted by the Minister of said parish."

He (Lord Normanby) was well acquainted with the parish in question, having spent much of his leisure time there when he held office in Ireland. At that time he frequented the place it was supposed to contain about 3,000 inhabitants, but by the more recent Population Returns it appeared that the number was under 1,300, of whom only 40 were Protestants, and these mostly of the upper class. The present Rector of the parish, Mr. Bermingham, had exerted himself in a praiseworthy manner to make the School what it was at present. The former state of the parish was this—there was a schoolmaster who received the interest of the gift, but there was no school or scholars. At the present period, the school contained seventy Roman Catholic boys and girls, and four Protestant children, all of them educated according to the system of the National Board, to which the parents of the Protestant children made no sort of objection; but, on the contrary expressed themselves as perfectly satisfied. Such was the state of the parish of Ballysax. Now, with respect to the Rev. Mr. Bermingham, he was originally Curate of St. Bride's, the laborious duties of which he always discharged in the most exemplary manner. That gentleman had been appointed Chaplain to the Lord Lieutenant, by the Marquess of Wellesley; he had been continued as Chaplain by his noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Haddington) and by himself. Under the present Ministry the appointment to the chaplaincy had been, he was bound to say, of a more exclusively political character, and Mr. Bermingham had been no longer continued Chaplain. Mr. Bermingham had been appointed by him (Lord Normanby) to the Rectory of Ballysax, and had carried out in this School the system of the National Board of Education, which had been attended with the utmost success, and met with no impediment until the spring of last year, when, in reply to a letter wherein upon their application he communicated to the Board of Charitable Bequests, a lease of some lands which had been granted by the proprietors of the Ballysax estates, for the erection of a School-room, he received from the Bishop the following letter :—

"Dublin Castle, April 7, 1843.

"Sir—I have had the honour of laying before the Board of Charitable Donations and Bequests the lease of the land granted by the proprietors of the Ballysax estate for the erection of a School-house thereon, together with your letter by which the lease was accompanied.

"And I have been ordered to communicate to you that it is the opinion of the Board that the trusts of the will of the Rev. Wm. Tew have not been properly fulfilled, inasmuch as the School has not been conducted as a Protestant Parochial School, and the express condition imposed by the testator, that the Minister shall at every annual visitation of the Lord Bishop of Kildare, present a report in writing of the state of the said Protestant School, has not been complied with; and, in conclusion, I am to intimate to you that so long as this state of things remains, the interest in the fund produced by Mr. Tew's bequest will not be paid.

"I am, Sir, &c.,

"WM. MATTHEWS, Secretary."

Now, the Resolution wherein the Board here, for the first time, took upon itself to interfere with this system in that instance of this School, was moved and supported by two personages who had just been admitted members of the Board, ex officio, as being Judges, then newly appointed by the present Government, namely, Mr. Baron Lefroy and Mr. Justice Jackson, men notorious for violent party feelings, who took a strong part in the meeting at the Mansion House in 1837 — men looked upon as vehement political agitators. The presence of these persons—these ultra-Protestant agitators—had thus made itself felt at that Board. The resolution, in fact, originated with Mr. Baron Lefroy, and Mr. Justice Jackson, and was passed in spite of a strong opposition; the Archbishop of Dublin and the Chief Baron Brady forming part of the minority. He (Lord Normanby) had the very strongest doubt as to whether the decision of the Board, withholding the payment of the interest, was legal. The terms of the bequest would show that the control was limited to the Minister and Clergyman of the parish; for the terms of the bequest stated that it was to be applicable "in such mode or under such plan of education as shall be ordered by such Minister or his successor." He had already expressed his doubts as to the legality of the act of the Board of Charitable Bequests, for he doubted whether they had any such power to interfere. The Act itself, passed in 1800, 40 Geo. III., cap. 75, sec. 2, Irish Statutes, ran thus:—

"And be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, that the said Commissioners, and their successors by the name aforesaid, may sue, and they are hereby empowered to sue, in every Court in this Kingdom, either of law or equity, for the recovery of every Charitable Donation or Bequest which may or shall be, withheld, concealed, or misapplied; and to apply the same when recovered to charitable and pious uses, according to the intention of the donor or donors; or, in case it be inexpedient, unlawful, or impracticable to apply the same strictly according to the directions and intentions of the donor or donors, then to apply the same to such charitable and pious purposes as they shall judge to be nearest and most conformable to the directions and intentions of the donor or donors; and the said Commissioners are hereby authorized and empowered to deduct out of all such charitable donations and bequests as they shall recover, all the costs, charges, and expenses which they shall be put to in the suing for, and recovery of the same. The first section recites that a Committee of the House of Lords had superintended the Charities, but that new provisions was rendered necessary by reason of the Union, and then it constitutes the Board and creates a corporation."

Sect. 3. Quorum Clause, Sect. 4. regulates and prescribes certain returns to be made under an Act mentioned in the title of the 3 George III. The above was the substance of the whole Act. The only expression in this Act establishing the Board which could at all seem to leave the matter within the discretion of the Board was the term "inexpedient;" but here was a case where the term could not apply, the donation being carried out in perfect conformity with the will of the testator and the law of the land. The only way in which it could at all be alleged that the will of the testator had been deviated from was this—the will directed that a statement of the condition of the School should be made to the Bishop on each of his annual visitations. Mr. Bermingham, not being aware of this obligation, neglected, in the first two years of his administration to make this statement; but, in all the three last years, having been made acquainted with the condition he had scrupulously fulfilled it; and, at the very time when the Board of Trusts came to the resolution that this condition had not been complied with, it had received the annual statement supplied by the rev. incumbent, indeed it was upon the Table before them at the very time that they passed this resolution. If this had been the cause of dissatisfaction on the part of the Board, how did it happen that not a word had been heard about it in the two years when the omission actually did take place? How happened it that it was reserved for Mr. Baron Lefroy and Mr. Justice Jackson to discover an omission which occurred so long before they had anything to do with the matter, and three years after the omission had been amply supplied? The next stage of the proceedings to which he must advert was the communications that passed between the Rector of Ballysax and the Bishop of the Diocese of Kildare. He had every desire to show respect to a Rev. Prelate, and more especially to one who, like the Bishop of Kildare, had reached his eighty-sixth year; but, at the same time, there were faults which, proceeding from whatever quarter, exhibiting somewhat of the spirit of oppression, ought to be animadverted upon. The letter would tell its own story, and needed slight comment. It ran thus:

"June 29, 1843.

"Reverend Sir—On Monday, the 26th of June, inst., the Board of Charitable Bequests and Donations met according to appointment, his Grace the Archbishop of Dublin in the chair, and with Judges Burton, Jackson, and Baron Lefroy, some conversation took place, and Baron Lefroy stated the grounds of the former decision, adding some strictures concerning your delegation of your trust, which you will do well to hear from other persons than myself. A motion having been made the Court broke up, by an adjournment sine die. By the judgment of the Court, as it stands, you will and may soon incur the consequences of this, unless you take timely means of restoring the Parochial School to its proper uses. I refer you in this respect to some other person to expound the Penal Statute of Henry VIII., in his 28th year, Statute 13th, no trifling matter you may be assured.—I remain, Your faithful servant,

"CHARLES KILDARE."

"No trifling matter," said the Bishop minaciously. He (Lord Normanby) when in Ireland, had had occasion, from circumstances then engaging much public attention, to pay a good deal of attention to the Statute in question; and, having a perfect recollection that the only section which applied to this particular point was the 9th section, he at once saw that the Bishop had been egregiously misinformed. Those who were acquainted with the Statute would at once call to mind that it was framed with no sort of intention, at that time, of changing the ritual or form of worship; its object was, not to encourage Protestantism, but to promote the spread of the English language. As a proof of this, he need only remind their Lordships, that one section of it commanded the Roman Catholics of Ireland "to tell their beads in the English language." There were other provisions in the same Act against wearing saffron shirts, against the mode of wearing the hair called "glibbs," and against wearing hair on the upper lip; none of these provisions he thought that the Rev. Gentleman in question was likely to violate. He could not conceive, therefore, what connection this respectable but very aged Prelate could have seen between the matter in hand, and "the Penal Statute of Henry VIII., in his twenty-eighth year, Statute 13th," as he quaintly phrased it. In the course of this letter, it would have been observed, the right Rev. Prelate used the expression, "delegation of your trust." In no respect could this imputation be borne out; in all respects had Mr. Bermingham complied with the provisions of the will. But perhaps, considering the circumstances, this was a mere carelessness of expression—the expression, however, was one which should have been weighed more carefully. He would only read a portion of it, as he did not wish to dwell upon any incautious phrases of the Bishop. The next communication ran thus:—

"July 1st, 1843.

"Reverend Sir—Being desirous of taking the Roman Catholic children of Ballysax parish into the system of our Church Education School as to Religious Instruction, I have opened a negotiation with the parent society in Dublin, and also with our diocesan like society, for providing at my own cost, for one year, a proper master and mistress (the same, if amenable), as already are employed. Provided you resume your proper charge, and rescue the property and place from the hands of the National Board.

"If there were no better system to be had I should not oppose the National Board. So far as they go I am favourable to them. But I can do both with your help; and if you will take prudent and bland means to rescue this School, and add it to our Church Education Society, I shall hope to carry this good measure, without any stringent measures.

"CHARLES KILDARE."

Now, in reference to the expression here, about "rescuing the property and place from the hands of the National Board," Mr. Bermingham distinctly declared that the National Board had no more property in the school than any other of the subscribers, or any more share in the management than was pursuant with that part of the will, which permitted donors, by themselves or their representatives, to act as visitors, and to propose regulations for the management of the School, subject to the approval and concurrence of the incumbent. He had understood that threats had been conveyed to Mr. Bermingham, to the effect that if he proceeded in this way, to bring the case before Parliament, it was very possible that the temporary license for non-residence, which had been obtained on account of the ill health of his wife, the mother of seven children, would be withdrawn by his diocesan; but the character of the right Rev. Prelate rendered it impossible to suppose that he would consent to any such monstrous step. This case of Ballysax presented an epitome of the state of Ireland. Nothing had happened here which might not be predicated of five-sixths of the parishes of that Kingdom. Here was presented a striking instance of the struggle going on there between two principles of Government, or he ought rather to say the struggle between the principle of governing with the concurrence and good will of the great mass of the population; and the other, the principle by which the country can only be held and occupied without the golden link of the affections of the people. The system carried out by Mr. Bermingham was one which tended to the diffusion of Christian knowledge, to the establishment of Christian practice, to the reciprocation of Christian good will; under it pre-eminently in this instance the priest and the clergyman were seen acting in cordial concurrence, the former not seeking to intrude himself into the School, but co-operating to his utmost in his own sphere. That system, let him remind their Lordships, was not the creation of the late Government, whom enemies had falsely accused of being indifferent on the subject of religion; it was not the work either of Lord Stanley, that prominent champion of the Church: it dated from the 14th report of the Education Commissioners, a report bearing the signature of the late Primate of Ireland, the Archbishop of Cashel, and drawn up by Mr. Lealie Foster, whom no one could accuse of lukewarmness to the cause of Protestantism. It happened most unfortunately, that there was now a Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whose spirit in the matter might be judged not only from all his clerical appointments, but from the warm acknowledgments which he had made in answer to an address from a hot Protestant body, which contained sentiments most uncharitable, most obnoxious to the Roman Catholics: while the Irish Secretary, however good his intentions, seemed altogether disposed to let, "I dare not wait upon I would." Mr. Bermingham, under the circumstances thus stated, had thought it necessary to address a letter to Lord Eliot explaining the whole matter. The answer he received ran thus:—

"Irish Office, July 25, 1843.

"Sir—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 20th instant.

"I must acquaint you that the Government has no power to take cognizance of a decision of the Board of Charitable Bequests—a Board of which the Lord Chancellor and the Judges are members. The only appeal from it is to a Court of Equity.

"I would, however, suggest that you should lay a statement of the case before the Lord Chancellor who might induce the Board to reconsider it.

"I have the honour to be, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"ELIOT."

Acting upon the suggestion of his Lordship, Mr. Bermingham then addressed a letter to the Lord Chancellor, who made the following reply:—

"Boyle Farm, August 3, 1843.

"Sir—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, with its inclosure. It is not within my province to review the decisions of the Board of Charitable Bequests, of which I am a member; and it would not be proper for me to give an opinion upon any act of theirs. Your point, I observe, is a want of jurisdiction. If you desire to bring this again before the Board, I will willingly attend when the case is heard, and give my best attention to it. This is all I can undertake to do. You will of course exercise your own discretion in appealing to Parliament. There can be no meeting of the Board until the Judges return to Dublin after the vacation.

"I have the honour to be, Sir,

"Your very obedient servant,

"EDWARD B. SUGDEN."

"The Rev. J. A. Bermingham."

Here, then, had applications been made to the two officers of the Crown, to whom application was most fitly to be made, and from that time to this no satisfaction whatever had been obtained from this most unjust, and as he felt convinced, altogether illegal proceeding on the part of the Board of Charitable Trusts. The reverend complainant, then, surely could not be charged with having prematurely called the attention of Parliament to this subject, when, after so long a time, nothing had been done to redress those poor people, or to restore to them that annual stipend to which they were entitled. To resist the hostile influences that were constantly at work in Ireland—to thwart the professed intentions of the Government here—required a firm hand and a strong will. And he was sure that at this moment, when they could induce the Roman Catholic priesthood to go hand in hand with the Protestant clergyman of that system of Education by which Christian feeling and Christian precepts could be diffused amongst the people of that country by discouraging those attempts to interfere with that system, the Government would do a great deal to put the people of that country in that state in which they should desire to see them, and an union of opinions on such subjects amongst such a population was the most likely way to confirm their union with the English nation. He was convinced, that after the statement which he had made, the attention of the Government would be drawn to the subject, and that they would take steps to check in time such injudicious attempts to interfere with the system of National Education in Ireland, which he was satisfied that both the Government and the Legislature desired to see carried out in a fair and impartial spirit. He was afraid that he had taken up much more of the time of the House than it was usual to occupy in the presentation of petitions; but the peculiar circumstances of the case must plead his excuse. He left the matter with confidence to the consideration of the Government, knowing as he did that he had said nothing which he was not able to prove. If he found that the Government, after a certain period had elapsed, did not interfere, he should consider it to be his duty to call upon the House to appoint a Committee to inquire into the subject.

The Duke of Wellington observed that the noble Marquess had truly said, that he had commented at considerable length on the contents of this petition, which he on Friday gave notice that he should present to the House. As was his duty, he (the Duke of Wellington) had taken great pains, since the noble Marquess had given notice of his intention to present this petition, to endeavour to obtain every information on the subject matter of this petition, and he had taken away a copy of the notice given by the noble Lord, so as to prevent delay in his inquiries; but he confessed that he had not been able to obtain much information on the subject; he, therefore, could only give a very short explanation on the present occasion. He rose now merely to state that he had seen a letter from Mr. Birmingham, from which it appeared that the statement of the noble Marquess was nearly accurate as to the facts which he had stated. It appeared that the rev. Gentleman in question became entitled to the administration of certain charitable funds for the education of the poorer children in the parish, in conformity with the bequest of a testator, and he established in his parish, in conformity as he conceived with the instructions of the bequest, a school on the National System of Education; and upon the subject coming under the notice of the Board of Charitable Bequests in Ireland, that body, which had the power, thought proper not to approve of the establishment of this school, thinking that it was not established according to the will of the testator. In consequence of this rev. Gentleman being directed by this Board to apply the funds which were at his disposal in a manner more in conformity with the intentions of the testator, he wrote to the noble Lord the Secretary of the Government in Ireland. Upon this subject, it appeared to him, that he had only done that which he ought to have done when it came under his consideration. He informed the party that if he considered himself aggrieved, he ought to have recourse to a Court of Equity; that there was no other course that could be adopted, and that a Court of Equity alone had control over the Board of Charitable Bequests, which was formed of the Lord Chancellor, the Bishops and Judges, and other eminent persons in Ireland. In the first place, however, he recommended this rev. Gentleman to apply to the Lord Chancellor, who was a member of this Board, to bring the subject under the re-consideration of the Board, and this was stated in the letter which was read by the noble Marquess. The party accordingly applied privately to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and received a reply, dated from this country; and under these circumstances the noble Marquess chose to throw out a taunt against the Lord Chancellor for being absent from Ireland during the vacation in his Court. It should be remembered that this rev. Gentleman did not apply to the Lord Chancellor as the head of the Court of Equity, but applied to him in his private capacity, as a member of the Board of Charitable Bequests, and got an answer accordingly. He (the Duke of Wellington) knew nothing more of the case, but he was informed that the charge against the rev. Gentleman was, that he had not supported such a school with the receipts of this bequest, as it was considered by the Board that he ought to have done, until the bishop of the diocese had ordered him to do so. It was all along said that it arose from ignorance, and not from intention, that the rev. Gentleman had supported an improper school in the first instance, and it was only when he was subsequently better informed on the subject that he made these changes which he was called upon to make. With respect to the decision of the Board of Charitable Bequests, and as to the letter of the Bishop of Kildare, and as to all the other matters which the noble Marquess had thought proper to bring forward on this subject, he had no knowledge whatever; but he contended that the noble Lord, the Secretary of the Irish Government, had done his duty in pointing out to this Gentleman the course which he should take to obtain redress for the alleged grievances which he had stated, and for the complaints which he had made. If this Gentleman did not choose, for some reasons of his own, to follow the advice of his noble Friend, he had no ground of complaint, for it was for him to judge of his own conduct. He did not, however, conceive that while this course was open to that Gentleman, the noble Marquess was justified in calling for a Committee of the House to enquire into a matter of this kind; but he could assure the noble Marquess that if he could furnish him with a copy of this petition, he would take care that the attention of her Majesty's Government should be called to the subject, but the whole matter would be properly investigated if this Gentleman would only adopt the suggestion offered to him by the noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland, and apply to a Court of Equity for a remedy.

Lord Cottenham said, that if the rev. Petitioner would take his advice, he would not apply to a Court of Equity on the subject. He had had some experience of Courts of Equity in charitable cases, and he would at once declare that the rev. Gentleman would best consult his own interests by not taking any such step. There were also peculiar circumstances in connection with this case which should make parties extremely cautious before they resorted to a Court of Equity; for it appeared by the Act constituting this Board of Charitable Bequests that the Commissioners were authorised by Parliament to pay all charges of any suit in equity in which they might be engaged out of the funds of the charity involved in the case. Now, in this case, where the amount of the bequest was small, all the money would be gone before any proceedings could be brought forward in a Court of Equity, and when it was, the rev. Gentleman might find that he would have to pay his own costs. The question also was, whether, under the Clause of the Act empowering the Commissioners to defray the charges of suits of equity, that it did not give the enlarged power which was supposed, for it had to determine as to the inexpediency of proceeding in the case or not. The Clause in the Irish Statute of the 40th Geo. III., c. 75, s. 2., was—

“And be it enacted by the authority aforesaid that the said Commissioners and their successors, by the reason aforesaid, may sue, and they are hereby empowered to sue in any Court in this Kingdom, either of Law or Equity, for the recovery of any charitable donation or bequest which may or shall be withheld, concealed, or misapplied, and to apply the same, when recovered, to charitable and pious uses, according to the instruction of the donor or donors: or in case it be inexpedient, unlawful, or impracticable, to apply the same strictly according to the directions and instructions of the donor or donors, then to apply the same to such charitable and pious purposes, as they shall judge to be nearest and most conformable to the directions and instructions of the donor or donors, and the said Commissioners are hereby authorised and empowered to deduct, out of all such charitable donations and bequests as they shall receive, all the costs, charges, and expences which they shall be put to in the suing for, and recovery of the same.”

It was obvious that the Commissioners had a very despotic power under this Act, and greater, probably, than Parliament would be disposed to confer in the present day; and it was a question whether, under such a case as the present, a Court of Equity or any other jurisdiction could interfere. If it should appear to some parties, that there had been a misapplication of charitable funds, and if an Equity suit were instituted, it would be a matter of difficulty, as he read the clause, to get over the word “inexpediency,” with respect to which such a large discretionary power was left with the Commissioners. It was well known, that at present, by a form of suit in equity, termed ces pres, when it appeared that the instructions of a donor could not be carried into strict effect, that a power was given to a Court of Equity to enlarge the authority or province of the trustees; but, as to the “inexpediency” or not of applying the funds of a charity, strictly according to the directions and instructions of a donor, he did not think that it was a power that should be entrusted to this Board of Commissioners. Such a power given by this clause would be equivalent to allowing the Board of Commissioners to defeat the object of the donors of charitable bequests merely on the ground of their determining as to the expediency or inexpediency of applying charitable funds according to the intentions or directions of the donor. It was obvious under this clause the Commissioners could apply the funds of a charity to purposes very different from the intention of the donor. He was sure, that as the attention of the House was here called to this subject, that it would consider whether such a power should be entrusted to any Board of Commissioners. After all, he was anxious to caution this Gentleman to well consider the consequences that would ensue before he went into a Court of Equity on this subject, for it was clear that all the funds of this charity would be lost before any advance could be made in the suit. He hoped that Her Majesty's Government would take into its consideration the object and intention of this clause, and determine whether it was not of such an extent, and gave such powers, as ought not to be allowed to stand on the statute book any longer, and which affected not only this but many other cases.

The Lord Chancellor was anxious to remind his noble and learned Friend, that the clause in the Act of Parliament to which he referred, was in an Act of the Irish Parliament of 1800, and that it was not an enactment of the Imperial Legislature. He agreed with his noble Friend, that it would be hopeless, in a case like the present, to resort to a Court of Equity, for it appeared that the annual funds of the charity amounted to only 7*l.* 10*s.* a-year, and such a fund would, long before a decision could be obtained, be exhausted. His noble Friend the Secretary for Ireland, had truly stated the Government had no power in this case, but that the jurisdiction rested in a Court of Equity, but he recommended the petitioner to apply to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, as a member of the Board of Commissioners. Mr. Bermingham accordingly did apply to the Lord Chancellor, who, in his reply, did not say this was a proper case to bring before a Court of Equity, but he told the petitioner to bring the subject again under the consideration of the Board of Commissioners, and he added that he should be at Dublin within a short time, and if the matter was brought forward he would take care to attend the meeting of the Board, and that the matter should be examined into. He believed that the subject had not again been brought before the Board, but if it was, he would venture to say, that his right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor of Ireland would pay every attention to it. For his own part, he felt that it would be hopeless to bring the matter before a Court of Equity, not only on the ground of the expense necessarily attending it, but also, as some doubts existed as to the powers given to the Commissioners by the clause of the Act referred to by his noble and learned Friend.

The Duke of Wellington thought he had better read an extract from the letter of his noble Friend the Secretary for Ireland to the petitioner in this case, as that would prevent any misunderstanding.

"I must acquaint you that Government has no power to take cognizance of a decision of the Board of Charitable Bequests, a Board of which the Lord Chancellor and the Judges are members. The only appeal from it is to a Court of Equity. I would, however, suggest that you should lay a statement of the case before the Lord Chancellor, who might induce the Board to re-consider it."

Such was the reply of the noble Lord, the Secretary for Ireland, to this Gentleman, and he thought that it was a most satisfactory one.

The Marquess of Normanby observed, that he had not found fault with the note read by the noble Duke; and Mr. Bermingham had followed the course which was suggested by that noble Lord, and had applied to the Lord Chancellor, and, subsequently to the communication which he had received from the Lord Chancellor, Mr. Bermingham had made another application, and he never could get any information as to when there was to be a meeting of the Board.

Lord Wharnccliffe wished to know whether Mr. Bermingham had renewed his application to the Lord Chancellor?

The Marquess of Normanby was not aware whether he had or had not.

The Lord Chancellor remarked that it was essential that the House should know whether the petitioner had, since his communication with the Lord Chancellor, made any further application to the Board of Commissioners, and if he had what had been the result.

The Marquess of Normanby understood that the petitioner had been informed that the Commissioners had had no further meeting, and that it was not known when there would be a meeting of the board.

Lord Campbell said, that if the petitioner applied to a Court of Equity, he must do so with very little hope of success if he reflected on the constitution of the Board, and on the powers it possessed to resist his application. It should be recollected that the resolution of the Board respecting this Charity had been adopted on grave authority, and at the instigation of Mr. Justice Jackson, who made the Motion, and of Mr. Baron Lefroy, who seconded it. Since the proposition had been adopted on such authority, was it clear that even on the recommendation of the Lord Chancellor the decision of the Board would be revised? With respect to his countryman, the Bishop of Kildare, he would venture to declare that he was a man of the greatest good nature, and that he would not be guilty of any violence or even harshness in the execution of what he conceived to be his duty; and even in this case he was satisfied that the right Rev. Prelate believed that he was exercising a sound discretion, and that Mr. Justice Jackson, and Mr. Baron Lefroy would not give an erroneous decision on the subject. One of the means which the Government had stated that it meant to resort to for the purpose of pacifying Ireland was by increasing the grant for National Education, and he was satisfied that a case of this kind would do more injury to the progress of the System of National Education in Ireland than would be counterbalanced by any public grant which they could propose for the purpose of carrying it out.

The Marquess of Normanby had just been informed that the gentleman did apply to the Board since he received a communication from the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and that he had not received any satisfactory answer. With respect to the resolution of the Board of Commissioners on which these proceedings were founded, he was informed that he was mistaken when he said that it was proposed and seconded by the two learned Judges who had been named, but it was drawn up by them.

The Bishop of Exeter would not attempt to dwell on the matters of fact of this case, which had been alluded to by the noble Marquess and the noble and learned Lord, nor would he then go into the consideration of the propriety of the encouragement which the Government was giving to what was called the National

System of Education in Ireland, for this was not the proper time to do so; but there seemed to him to have been a very singular omission during the present discussion, of the consideration of an important principle involved in the case. The two noble and learned Lords opposite had objected to the constitution of the Board of Commissioners, without looking to one of the most important points for consideration connected with the Act relating to property left in trust for purposes of Education, and he should take the liberty of drawing their Lordships' attention to it. He believed that the facts of this case were shortly these—that a testator left a certain amount of income to be devoted for purposes of education in the parish in which he resided, and that he left the distribution of this fund to the discretion of the Rector of the parish for the time being. He then put it to the noble and learned Lords, whether any person who was appointed by will to administer a trust, and who was admissible to that trust only as Rector of the parish, in which capacity it was his bounden duty, and he was intrusted with the solemn obligation of promoting true religion, would be in any case justified, in the performance of the duties of such trust in dealing with those funds otherwise than according to the terms of the trust which was confided to him, in converting a Parochial into a National School? Could it be said that, in the course which this Gentleman had taken, he was advancing the interests of that religion which he professed, and that he was consistently administering this fund in his parish in conformity with the duties of his station? The bequest was manifestly intrusted to him for the purposes of Education according to the principles of the true religion, and, therefore, he was not justified in doing what he had done, and what was afterwards undone, and properly by the Board of Charitable Bequests. He clearly had not administered the fund in the way intended by the donor, as he was bound to have done, because he had not given the children attending the school the description of religious education designed for them by the founder, and, although as Rector of the parish he had a discretion, yet that discretion was only to be exercised under legal control. He put it to the noble and learned Lords to say whether, under such circumstances, the Rector of this parish could

deal with the bequest otherwise than in educating the children attending the school according to the religion of that Church to which he belonged; and if they could not, and he believed they could not, then it was evident that the decision of the Board was right, and that this Rev. Gentleman had been guilty, though unintentionally, of a mal-appropriation of this fund. For his own part he was prepared to rest on the authority of the two learned Judges alluded to, that in this case there had been a misappropriation of the funds of the Charity; he was satisfied that they were right in the decision which they had given, and he was gratified that they had so given it. He firmly believed that the law of the land was, that funds so bequeathed, if left to the trust of the Rector, or other ecclesiastical authority in the parish, must be expended for the purposes of education in the Protestant religion; but could it be said that, where money was expended on what was called the National System of Education, that it could be said to be expended in connection with the Protestant religion? He was sure it was not so. The noble Marquess smiled, but he (the Bishop of Exeter), could assure him that he would rather attend to his words than his smiles. He would venture to challenge the noble Lord to get up in his place and say that money so laid out in the National System of Education was expended in connection with the religion of the Church of England and Ireland. If it was not, it was vain to allow such a state of things to continue. It should be in the recollection of the House that the National System of Education did not profess to be in connection with the Protestant religion, but it was a system which had been adopted and was administered on the special ground of deference to the feelings and prejudices of the Roman Catholics, and against the feelings and wishes of the members of the Established Church. He, therefore, considered that this was a grave case of misappropriation of the funds of a charity, and he rejoiced that the two learned Judges who had been alluded to had vindicated the law, and had pursued a course calculated to advance principles which he believed to be correct.

Lord Monteagle hoped most sincerely that such advice, resting on such authority, would not be adopted by the Protestant Clergy of the Established Church in Ireland. If the law was of the character which was laid down by the right rev. Prelate, it would appear that a clergyman could not accept a charitable trust for the purposes of education, unless he was to carry out that trust in connection with the peculiar principles of the Church of England. He believed that the greatest good might be anticipated from the admixture of Protestants and Catholics in the national schools in Ireland, and the whole object of education would be frustrated and destroyed if they endeavoured to act upon the principles and suggestions laid down by the right rev. Prelate. The right rev. Prelate had asked whether in any respects the National System of Education could be called a Protestant education? Now, in contradistinction to this, he would refer to the highest authorities of the Church, from whom this System had emanated. Among the names of the eminent men who had signed the Report of the Commissioners of Education in Ireland, on which this National System of Education was founded, he found the names of the Lord Primate of Ireland, the Archbishop of Cashel, the Bishop of Killaloe, the Bishop of Cloyne, and several other dignitaries of the Church, as well as the name of Mr. Leslie Foster, and it was not likely that it would have received their support if it had not been Protestant. Such, then, was the System which the right rev. Prelate felt himself called upon to stigmatise, and to which he said that no Protestant Clergyman should lend a helping hand. ["No, no!"] The right rev. Prelate went to the extent of stating that no Protestant Clergyman should take upon himself the execution of a charitable trust unless the funds to be administered were applied to education exclusively Protestant. He (Lord Monteagle) was rejoiced to find that the Government had promised to inquire into the present case, and he trusted that the effect of such inquiry would be to exclude from the administration of charities all who would act in the spirit suggested by the right rev. Prelate. As was stated by his noble Friend there were seventy Roman Catholics and four Protestant children in this school, and by the principle adopted by the Board, and so strongly approved of by the right rev. Prelate, the whole of the Roman Catholic children would be expelled from the school. Previous to the appointment of Mr. Bermingham to this parish, an attempt was made to administer this charitable fund for the school in the spirit suggested by the Board of Commissioners and the Bishop of Kildare, and the effect had been to drive nearly all the children from the school, and to leave them to run wild on the Curragh of Kildare. He was glad that the case was one which would be taken into practical consideration by Her Majesty's Government, for he was satisfied that it could only lead to one result, namely, directing attention not only to this case, but to the whole of the law relative to charitable bequests in Ireland. A Committee of the other House, of which Lord Francis Egerton was chairman, and of which he (Lord Monteaigle) was a Member, so far back as 1829, recommended that there should be a reconstruction of the Board of Charitable Bequests in Ireland, but it appeared that nothing had yet been done on the subject. If it were necessary for the Government to make any alteration in the law with respect to charitable bequests in the administration of these charities, he thought the noble Lords themselves would see that the Committee was not very wrong originally; but the necessity was still more stringent now to amend the law. If they wished to make the law practical, and not to leave it a dead letter, they would not allow the administration of all the charities of the country to remain in the Board of Charitable Bequests, which consisted of a variety of persons having other and more important and conflicting duties. He had a great respect for the Judges who formed a part of that Board, but their judicial duties must prevent their attending to those which belonged to the Board. But, passing by the Judges and Bishops, they had the nineteen Clergymen who were Rectors of the parishes in Dublin, and there was, in fact, a Board too large for the purposes of responsibility, and too small for the purposes of deliberation. He hoped to see a Bill that would meet the practical objection stated by his noble and learned Friend with respect to the word "expedient," and put the charitable bequests of that country on a better footing.

The Bishop of Exeter said, that the noble Lord had misrepresented what he had said. He stated that he did not mean to go into the question of the policy of the Measure of National Education, so called, in Ireland. He did not say that any clergyman who gave himself to it would do wrong; but this he said, and upon this he rested the whole of his address to their Lordships, that the law of the land required when a bequest was made—and be it remembered, this bequest was made before this National Education scheme entered into the brain of any one—that the education to be conducted by that bequest should be according to the principles of the Established Church. There was a statement of a matter of fact upon which he would be glad to be set right. He meant with respect to that which the noble Marquess supposed to be the original of this scheme of National Education—namely, the fourteenth report of the year 1812, subscribed to which were the signatures of the Lord Primate of that day, and the Archdeacon of Ferns, who lived long enough to express his disapproval of this system of National Education, which was sufficient proof that the scheme was not that propounded in 1812. The Commissioners of 1812 never contemplated that the National Schools should supersede the Parochial Schools, they recommended that the Protestant Schools should be increased in their efficiency, and that these National Schools should be merely supplementary. He maintained that the Parochial Schools were to be exclusively Protestant. As to the law to which he had referred, he might be wrong. He had appealed to the noble and learned Lords, and he would rather have been answered by one of them than by the noble Baron. One of those noble Lords (Lord Cottenham) had left the House while the noble Baron was speaking, but there was one still sitting opposite, whose talents and learning gave weight to his opinions.

Lord Campbell rose amidst loud laughter, and said, that as the right Rev. Prelate had done him the honour of referring to him, he would state his view of the matter, but he would not be bound to any opinion he gave, without time for further consideration. The words of this Bequest were, that a Parochial School should be founded, not a Protestant School.

The Bishop of Exeter: With a Protestant schoolmaster.

The Marquess of Lansdowne: Which a great many of the National Schools have.

Lord Campbell continued. There was not the slightest inconsistency in having a Parochial School with a Protestant schoolmaster, to which the children of Roman Catholics should be admitted. It frequently happened that Protestant schoolmasters educated Catholic children; and he should apprehend the testator, who appointed a parochial school, with a Protestant schoolmaster, if he could now look out of his grave, would not think that his bequest was at all contravened, by seventy Roman Catholic children being educated in the parish along with the four Protestant children. The four Protestant children were educated probably well or better than if they were the sole objects of the care of the schoolmaster: but he would repeat, that the will of the testator did not seem to be contravened by children of another persuasion being educated in that School.

The Bishop of Exeter said, the noble and learned Lord had so adroitly evaded the question, without giving an opinion, that he would put it again. His question was, not whether seventy children could be educated by a Protestant schoolmaster, but whether they should admit seven or seven hundred Papists into it? He asked him to answer his question. He asked him whether it was his opinion as a lawyer, according to the law, that the clergyman of the parish, the rector who was entrusted with the appointment of the Protestant schoolmaster — whether that rector was not bound to have the school conducted according to the principles of the Protestant Church, and had nothing to do with the seventy papist children that came there?

Lord Campbell said, his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cottenham) having left the House, and he (Lord Campbell) having given his opinion, the greatest authority that now remained was the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, to whom he begged to refer the right Rev. Prelate.

The Bishop of Exeter said, that at all events his law had not been contradicted.

Petition to lie on the Table.

RAILWAY COMMITTEES.] Mr. Gladstone rose to call the attention of the House to the following Report, agreed upon by the Select Committee on Railways:—

"1. That in each case, where Bills are now pending, to authorise the construction of new Railways, competing with one another, such Bills be respectively referred to one Committee.

"2. That the Committees for the consideration of such Bills be specially constituted.

"3. That Bills now pending to authorise the construction of new lines of Railway, which will compete with existing Railways, be in like manner referred to Committees specially constituted.

"4. That such Committees be composed of five Members to be nominated by the Committee of Selection, who shall sign a declaration that their constituents have no local interest, and that they themselves have no personal interest, in the Bill or Bills referred to them; and that they will not vote on any question which may arise without having duly heard and attended to the evidence relating thereto; and that three shall be a quorum.

"5. That a Select Committee be appointed, to consider which of the pending Railway Bills shall be deemed competing Bills according to the foregoing resolutions.

"6. That such Select Committee be composed of five Members, of whom three shall be a quorum, and that the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

"7. That such of the Standing Orders as relate to the composition of the Committees on Private Bills, and the orders consequent thereon, be suspended, so far as regards competing Railway Bills pending in the course of the present Session."

The right hon. Gentleman said he would in the first instance, call the attention of the House to a particular Railway Bill, which at present stood committed for Thursday: namely, the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway Bill, with respect to which the question might fairly be raised whether it ought not to be considered as a competing Railway with another line; and he should take the opportunity of proposing that the Committee on that Bill be deferred for a reasonable time unless the promoters of the Bill would take that step themselves in the event of the House adopting the Resolutions of the Committee. The Resolutions which he was about to propose, in conformity with the instructions of the Committee of which he had the honour to be the Chairman, had been in the hands of hon. Members two or three days; and as they were not very long, he trusted hon. Members were fully aware of their nature. He did not know, that there was anything on the face of the Resolutions requiring any statement from him; but as there was some departure from the usual practice of the House with respect to the appointment of Committees on Private Bills, he wished to make a few observations. The Committee, on proceeding to examine that part of the subject which was referred to them, relating to the Standing Orders of the House, of course, had to take into their view that some of the questions requiring their investigation had been already raised in a special form by some of the Bills now before the House. The question, for instance, of competing Railways, was one which, although not raised on a very large scale by the Bills of the present Session, was raised in a very considerable number of instances, generally speaking, on short Railways of secondary importance. The Committee, he believed, were unanimously of opinion that there were some considerations applicable to Railways which rendered it desirable to try whether some experiment should not be made, at all events, for the purpose of dealing with those Railway Bills. These considerations summed themselves up in this main position—that Railway Bills, although they are in respect to interference with private rights, and in respect to the accommodation they afford to particular districts and localities, of the nature of Private Bills—yet they do enter so directly and so closely into communication with other great lines that constitute the main arteries of the traffic of the kingdom, that they do partake virtually, and as to their end and policy to a considerable extent, of the nature of public Bills, that there are many reasons why public interests should be largely represented in the Committees that have to deal with those Bills. At the same time, the House having adopted it as a principle, that its Committees on Private Bills should be composed in part of a very limited number of selected Members, and of Members more or less connected with local interests, he was very far from calling upon the House, in its present state of information, to depart from that principle; but he did, as the organ of the Committee on Railways, invite the House so far to depart from that principle as to constitute its Private Railway Bill Committees for the present Session on different principles from those which had hitherto obtained. Now, there were some considerations which presented themselves to the Committee, on which he thought he might say the Committee were unanimous. It was quite obvious, and it was acknowledged by every Member of the Committee, that it would not do to allow all the Railway Bills in the present Session, whether competing Bills or not, to go forth in the usual course prescribed by the rules of this House. It was felt that it would be quite absurd in cases where it was proposed to make two railways from nearly the same terminus and for the accommodation of the same district and the same traffic—it was felt that it would be quite preposterous to allow these Bills to go before two different Railway Committees of the House. The first step was, that Bills competing with one another should be referred to the same Committee. And then came the question of the constitution of the Committee; and there was a case which he would now mention to the House—a case of two railways proposed to be made from the town of Ashton-under-Lyne to Staleybridge, both having for their object the accommodation of that town and its connection with the great manufacturing district of Manchester. One of those Railways proposed to join the Manchester and Sheffield Railway, and the other the Manchester and Leeds Railway. The two Railways were intended to go through different counties, and although they started from the same town their termini in that town were in different counties. It so happened that the town was situated in two counties. Now, there was no rule of the House to determine to what list a Bill of that nature should be referred. In former years he believed the experiment had more than once been tried of constituting the Committees, where more than one county was concerned, of Members for different counties. He believed, that it was the opinion of the House that the experiment worked in a most unsatisfactory manner, and ought not to be continued. That, at all events, was the unanimous feeling of the Committee on Railways, because it created a Committee so large and so cumbrous, and so vague, and raised a contest of local interests so disproportioned to the share of public interest, that it was difficult to know how any Private Bill could be dealt with satisfactorily in that manner, much less a Railway Bill, which was to a certain extent a public Measure. The Committee were almost unanimously of opinion, that it was necessary that the representation of local interests in cases of competing Railway Bills should at all events be very materially restricted. It was their opinion, that if the House were to be called upon to depart from its usual course of practice, that the wisest plan would be to ask the House to try an experiment which would be likely to put fairly to the test the principles upon which it was founded, so that when that experiment should have been tried the House would be more advanced in its knowledge, and, whether it failed or whether it succeeded, they would at all events have the advantage of something to refer to as a guide for their future proceeding. The Committee, therefore, thought that in deviating from the usual course of a somewhat large and promiscuous Committee, it would be necessary in reducing the number of the Committees, to appoint them so that there might be a strong sense of individual responsibility; that there might be a disposition on the part of Members of the Committee to take a close and immediate interest in its proceedings, and as nearly as possible to attend throughout the whole of those proceedings. He had described the proceedings of the Committee on Railways as nearly unanimous up to this point. He did not mean to say that the resolutions which had been laid upon the table, and which he now proposed for adoption, were carried without any difference of opinion. Considering the nature of the subject, and the details which it involved, it would be a bad compliment to the Committee if those resolutions had been carried without any difference of opinion, because it would have led to the idea that they had been hastily adopted. Certainly there was considerable difference of opinion; but there was a general and almost unanimous concurrence in the opinion, that the usual course must be departed from—that the number of Members of Committee on that class of Bills must be reduced—that local influence must be a subordinate element in their composition, and that public interests and public motives must be more prominent. But it would be seen that the resolutions went further than the description which he had up to that moment given of them. The resolutions recommended, by way of experiment, the exclusion of local influences altogether. He thought the Members of the Committee would bear him out when he stated that there was a very strong disposition on the part of many Members to arrange, from time to time, something like a limited representation of local interest—to retain the local interest as subordinate, but denying it the predominant power which it now possessed in private bill Committees. The practical difficulties attending the working out of that proposition induced the Committee to abandon it. They thought it their duty to communicate with the highest authorities of the House, and with that Committee which had been appointed by the House for the purpose of superintending the composition of its Private Bill Committees—he meant the Committee of Selection—a body which he believed had discharged its duties in a manner that had tended to win for it, in no ordinary degree, the confidence of the House; and they found, after consulting with such authorities, that to attempt a considerable limitation of local interest would deprive them of the advantages which they sought without conferring others. It was found that the difficulty of selecting a limited number of persons to represent local interests would, in the opinion of the best qualified persons, be almost insuperable. It was apprehended that the jealousies of parties would be excited, and that apprehensions would be raised to a still greater degree if a very narrow and partial representation of local interests were given, than if they had no representation whatever of local interests. Therefore, after mature consideration, the Committee on Railways came to the conclusion which he (Mr Gladstone) unhesitatingly recommended to the adoption of the House, that, upon the whole, looking to the limited sphere on which they proposed to try the experiment with regard to a particular class of Railway Bills, and for the present Session, the best chance of its success would be found in recommending the constitution of Committees for this special purpose on public grounds, and on public grounds alone. The Committee, therefore, recommended in the first instance, that a select Committee should be appointed who would have a very short and simple duty to perform, namely, to go over the list of Railway Bills standing for consideration during the present Session, and to determine which of those Bills should be considered as standing in the category of competing bills. They then proposed that that Committee having so determined the Bills belonging to such class, the Committee of Selection should proceed to provide for the consideration of those Bills in their respective Committees, by the choice of five gentlemen unconnected by personal interests, unconnected by the local interests of constituents with the Bill to be brought under their consideration. Of course he was not able to say precisely in what number of cases this measure would come into operation, but he thought the number of competing Bills would be eight or ten. The form of proceeding upon these Bills—the degree of expense that might be occasioned to the parties, as compared with the expense under the present system—the time that might be occupied in the investigation—the satisfaction which the decisions would meet with in different quarters,—all these were most important elements for the consideration of the House; and he trusted when the experiment had been tried that the House would be in a much better position for considering in what way it would be better to deal with Railway Bills in general, than it was at present. He did not think there was anything further in the resolutions to which it was necessary to advert. They were framed for the purpose of giving effect to the general views which he had stated. He believed he was correct in stating that they conveyed the impression of the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving that the Resolutions of the Committee be read.

Resolutions read. First resolution read a second time; Motion made and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said resolution."

Mr. Labouchere said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Committee on Railways had so clearly stated the views with which the Committee recommended these resolutions that it was quite unnecessary for him to go over the same ground. The most important point involved in these resolutions was much beyond the convenience of dealing with these particular Bills,—it was a question whether the House would try the experiment of conducting the private business of the country upon principles totally different from those which had hitherto prevailed. The principle which it was now proposed to affirm was one of the utmost possible consequence. It was this: to try an experiment at first for special purposes in particular cases, which, if found successful in those cases, might afterwards be enlarged and more generally adopted. The object was to try whether those tribunals could not be so formed as to invest them with somewhat of a judicial character,—whether they could not be purged of all local and personal interest,—and whether, by diminishing the number of members on such Committee, a greater degree of individual responsibility could not be fixed upon them. He was convinced that the best results would follow the adoption of such a course, and that the public would hail it with the greatest satisfaction. The adoption of such a plan would tend to diminish the length of contests upon Private Bills,—would tend to the diminution of that fearful expense to individual parties which those protracted contests had hitherto caused,—and would ensure for the decision of these Committees a greater weight for their known responsibility than Committees upon Private Bills, as at present constituted, could calculate upon. He was not insensible of the difficulties in the way of the successful conduct of this experiment. He was glad to find that it was to be made upon a limited scale, and applied in special instances. The House would be able to see the manner in which it worked in those instances, and would then be able to judge with what degree of confidence it might extend the principle hereafter, if it should be found to work successfully. But there was one point of such importance to the working of the scheme that he could not help calling the attention of the House to it. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to constitute a certain number of Committees upon this new plan. He stated that there were about ten Committees, and these of course would require the services of about fifty Members. The main difficulty in the way of the working of this system would be the danger of not finding Members who would devote their time to the consideration of Private Bills, in which neither they nor their constituents had any direct interest. The successful working of the experiment must mainly depend upon gentlemen, from a sense of public duty, devoting their time to Private Bills under these circumstances, and consenting to investigate them. If the House was really anxious to see the experiment tried, he hoped that Gentlemen would consent to sit upon Committees for Private Bills, and would give their constant and regular attendance in cases where their own constituents were not concerned. They should recollect that they would by this means become exonerated from attending other Committees of more protracted duration, in which they might otherwise be engaged. He was quite sure that hon. Gentlemen who attended to the private business of the House, would feel greater satisfaction in the discharge of their duty, when it could be done without any possibility of suspicion that his judgment was biassed by local interest. He hoped there would be no difficulty in finding fifty Gentlemen who would undertake to serve upon these Committees. It was upon this point that the whole chance of the successful result of the experiment depended; and he had, therefore taken the liberty of calling the attention of the House to it at this moment. He could only say that he gave his hearty support in the main to those resolutions. In some points he did not agree with them, but they were not points of essential importance; in the main spirit and tenour of these resolutions he entirely concurred. They were a great experiment, and a novelty that he was desirous of seeing fully tried. He hoped they would have a fair trial, and he should not despair of this being the first step towards putting the private business of the House on a sounder and fairer foundation. If the House could effect this they would effect a very salutary change, and do that which would greatly tend to raise the character of the House in the eyes of the public.

Mr. Hodgson Hinde said, when he first read these resolutions he was of opinion they were a mere experiment; and the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman who introduced them, and of the right hon. Gentleman by whom they were supported, confirmed him in that opinion. Those Gentlemen who sat on the Railway Committee might have had sufficient evidence before them to justify them in coming to these Resolutions; but as far as the body of the House was concerned they had no information whatever to enable them to come to a contrary decision to that to which they had come on former occasions. He did not mean to say that evidence might not be given which would change his mind on the subject; but before he was called upon to give a vote with the Members of that Committee, he was entitled to see the evidence which had influenced them in coming to the decision which had been reported to the House. He thought the House ought to have a little more time for consideration. Notice of these Resolutions was only given on Friday last, and between that day and Monday the attention of Members was least likely to be directed to the subject, and he did hope that at all events the right hon. Gentleman would allow a few days for consideration, to enable individual Members who entertained different views to give counter-notice, if they might think them necessary. The right hon. Gentleman said there were certain Bills before the House to which he wished to apply this principle. Now he (Mr. Hinde) had no objection to the passing of the first of the Resolutions without any discussion. He thought that competing lines ought to be referred to one Committee; but before coming to any general decision on that point he would rather adopt the course proposed with regard to these individual isolated cases. This would be better than to bind the House to any general regulation on the subject; and he would just remind the House that the alterations which had been made, with regard to the standing orders on Railway Bills, had not always been the most felicitous. For instance, one regulation with regard to notices, which was carried almost by universal acclamation, was soon afterwards repealed; and another with respect to the 10 per cent. deposit, it was recommended to rescind. If more time was not to be granted, he called upon the Committee for some explanation of their fifth Resolution. Why was it considered necessary to appoint a select Committee to ascertain what should be considered competing lines? It might in some cases be necessary to appoint a Committee to inquire into the circumstances connected with these Bills, so as to enable the House to come to a resolution upon them; but he thought it would be entrusting too large a power to five individuals, to allow them to determine competing lines. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that the northern companies never considered the Lancaster and Carlisle railway as a competing line; and he could not see why hon. Members should seek an occasion to declare a line to be a competing one, when the parties interested in the matter made no such objection. He objected to the fifth Resolution more than to any other. He thought that the House ought not to give away its jurisdiction to a Committee, by allowing a Committee to determine the nature of a competing line. He had not the slightest objection to the Resolution now before the House; but, with regard to the others, he intended to move an Amendment if they should be pressed by the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Ewart heard with the greatest satisfaction the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman, and he believed the House and the country would join with him in that satisfaction. He agreed with the hon. Gentleman who spoke last, in the opinion that when a new principle was introduced, it ought to be worked out; and he entertained not the slightest doubt that the principle of justice contained in these Resolutions would at length be applied to all private business. He felt bound to vote with the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, and his predecessor, and he was only sorry they did not give him their cordial support when he brought forward a proposition on this subject two years ago. On that occasion he had the misfortune to be opposed by the First Lord of the Treasury and the whole power of the Government. He did not blame them for that, nor did he blame the right hon. Gentleman for thus introducing gradually, and perhaps discreetly, a principle which ought to be introduced in all Railway, and all Private Bill Committees. The right hon. Gentleman had alluded to the principle of removing locally and personally interested parties from these Committees, and he thought such a proposition reflected great credit on the Government. He also thought that it was very desirable to diminish the number of the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman did not state that this very principle had been introduced into the House of Lords, and most successfully. He believed that every Member of their Lordships' House would acknowledge that, when they reduced their Committees to five, and ejected every person locally or personally interested, they greatly improved their tribunal. The Parliamentary agents were satisfied that it had worked in a very satisfactory manner, and were of opinion that a similar principle ought to be applied to all Bills before the House of Commons. Such a principle ought not to be confined to competing lines, but ought to be extended to Bills relating to rating and other matters, where not only local but political interests were introduced into the decision on Private Bills; and from this all Committees ought to be purged. If he wanted a high authority on this point, he might refer to that of the right hon. Gentleman the Speaker, who, to his honour, in conjunction with Mr. Greene, was the first person to call the attention of the House to the subject. The principle of diminishing the number of Members in a Committee, of increasing their responsibility, and of removing them from all local or personal interest, was some years ago advocated by the right hon. Gentleman who now filled the Chair in that House; and so highly did he (Mr. Ewart) approve of that principle, that he felt quite certain the Resolutions proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade would be sanctioned, not only by the House, but by the country. He hoped to see the principle extended to the whole of the private business of the House.

Colonel Sibthorp thought that the proposed Resolutions required more deliberation than had been bestowed on them. He would not say that it was the intention of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade to take the House by surprise, but he thought that he ought, in justice to the country, to accede to the proposal which he (Colonel Sibthorp) meant to make to the House. It was very well known to the House and to the country, that he had great objections—great suspicions—with regard to these railroads, especially with regard to the manner in which they encroached on private property. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to limit the number of the Committee to five Members, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Taunton said, that he highly approved of such a limitation. He (Colonel Sibthorp) did not mean to impugn the character of any one, but he thought it was hardly fair that the great Local interests of the country should be left to the decision of five

hon. Members of the House. He should not be surprised if, after what had taken place, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Taunton were to propose to limit the number of a jury, and to reduce it from twelve to five. He called on the right hon. President of the Board of Trade to grant them a delay of eight days before agreeing to this Report. To attain that object, he would at once move that the "Debate be now Adjourned" with a view to a consideration of the Report that day week.

Mr. Wallace thought there could be no doubt that the principle involved in the Resolutions was a good one, and would, if carried out, be the means of ensuring a better Committee than at present. With respect to competing lines, it appeared to him, that they were about to have that principle limited, which was the only safeguard to the country. If competing lines were to be in any way restricted, he should object to the whole of the resolutions. He was, however, decidedly of opinion, that they ought to postpone the consideration of the Report in order that they might have time for further inquiry. Being of that opinion, he would support the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Lincoln.

Sir J. Hanmer begged to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman, the President of the Board of Trade, to a subject connected with Railroads. He had that morning received a communication from (as we understood) some of his constituents, stating that considerable alarm and discontent were felt among persons interested in Steam Navigation, in consequence of some attempts which were said to have been made by certain Railroad Companies, to obtain a Power from Parliament to apply a portion of their capital to the establishing of Steam-Packet Companies in connection with particular lines of Railroads. They represented that such a power would interfere very materially with the interests with which they were connected.

Mr. Estcourt considered the adoption of the resolutions a total abandonment of the principles upon which they had heretofore acted with regard to a certain class of Bills, but was not averse to the experiment being tried. He thought there would be no difficulty in obtaining Members to act on the proposed Committee, nor would their duty be at all different from that which was performed by the selected Members of former Committees.

Mr. Stuart Wortley said, that the fact of the Committee having expressed a decided opinion in favour of these resolutions, had great weight with him, and he was quite ready to agree to the experiment being tried, but at the same time he wished it to be understood, that he would vote on the ground stated by the right hon. Gentleman, the President of the Board of Trade, in his opening speech, and not on those assumed by certain hon. Members. He was prepared to vote for those Resolutions, in order that an experiment might be tried, but he was not prepared to affirm, that the mode of proceeding proposed was the best which could be adopted. It was rather too much to say, that in questions of this description, all local knowledge and experience should be excluded from the Committee; but, recollecting that in consequence of the strong sense entertained of the evils of the previous system, the House had proceeded to regulate the mode of dealing with the Railroad Bills, he had no objection to giving the new method a fair trial.

Viscount Sandon believed, that there were one or two points upon which the Committee were not unanimous. He was perfectly prepared to allow a larger infusion of what might be considered as independent judgment into the Committee, but he was not prepared to go the length of saying, that no local influence or knowledge should be allowed in that Committee. The duty of hon. Members was no doubt to look to the general interests of the people, but they were also the representatives of their respective constituents, whose interests they were bound to attend to, either in the House or in the Committee. If they were excluded from being represented in Committee, they had no other alternative than an appeal to the House. He thought that great injustice would be done to the smaller constituencies if they should lay it down as a right principle that all local influence or local knowledge should be excluded. He did not wish to object to the resolutions of the Committee, but he wished to protest against their being considered as bound by them on every occasion. He doubted whether they would be able to find a sufficient number of impartial Members to attend regularly on the proposed Committee. For these reasons he gave a reluctant consent to the scheme then under their consideration. He did not wish to raise any opposition to a plan of which a majority of the House and of the Committee on Railways had approved.

Mr. Greene said, that the present system was open to great objection. Under that system they had agents, and witnesses, and counsel, and they had, in addition, the interested parties acting as judges. It was absolutely necessary that they should have tribunals of a more impartial character. They should render those Committees as nearly judicial as possible, and they would by that means render an essential service to the public. That was the principle for which he had for years urgently contended. The hon. Member for Greenock seemed to think, that by the plan then proposed, an end would be put to competition. But if two competing lines were referred to the same Committee, it would not follow that the Committee might not decide that both should be adopted.

Dr. Bowring said, the present system had the effect of often placing hon. Members in a very disagreeable position by exposing them to the solicitations of persons representing contending interests. He did not approve of the principle of allowing interested parties to sit on Committees. He was sure that the opinion of the hon. Member for Lancaster (Mr. Greene) was the right one; and that the more they excluded private interests from Committees the more elevated and the less embarrassing would their condition become. It was desirable to give those tribunals as much as possible a judicial character, and a judicial responsibility.

Mr. Strutt said, that the noble Lord, the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon) had stated that the adoption of the resolutions then under their consideration would increase the number of appeals from Committees to the House. But he was of a different opinion. He believed that many of the appeals from the decision of Committees were made from a conviction that injustice had been done by those Committees, in consequence of the preponderance of powerful local interests. They had often heard parties saying, that although a majority of the Committee was against them, they had a majority of disinterested Members in their favour; and he believed that such statements had more weight with the House than any other arguments advanced on those occasions. It was because the resolutions before the House would do away with the possibility of such representations, and because they would make the Committees impartial tribunals, that he believed that appeals, so far from being increased, would be considerably diminished by the adoption of those resolutions. Several hon. Gentlemen had spoken of the difficulty there would be in obtaining Members to serve on these Committees. It had been said that five Members would not be found to serve throughout on Committees of the kind. But as he had been for several years a Member of the Committee of Selection, and as he had some experience on the subject, he could confirm the statement of his hon. Friend, the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Estcourt); and he could say, to the credit of the House, that they had hitherto found no difficulty in obtaining the services of Members for Committees. He believed that no difficulty would be felt on that head in carrying out the resolutions. He believed, too, that by the adoption of these resolutions the call for the services of Members on private Committees, so far from being increased, would be considerably diminished. He had further to observe, that although some hon. Members had objected to these resolutions, no one had proposed any plan which could be adopted as a substitute for them. He was fully persuaded of the propriety of the resolutions, and he should give them his most cordial support.

Mr. E. B. Denison said, that the Committee which had recommended the adoption of the resolutions before the House had not passed over the consideration of the propriety or the impropriety of excluding local influence. In fact, the question had formed one of their difficulties. They had, however, come to the conclusion, that it would be better to exclude local interest from the Committees. He felt persuaded that the public would be better satisfied with the perfect independence of those Committees.

The House divided on the question that the Debate be adjourned. — Ayes 3; Noes 200 :—Majority 197.

Resolution agreed to. Subsequent resolutions agreed to.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHARITIES.] Mr. O'Connell would put one or two questions to the right hon. Baronet at the head of Her Majesty's Government, to which he should be glad to receive an answer. The first was, whether it was in the contemplation of the Government to bring in any Bill in the course of the present Session to alter or amend the law respecting the management of Roman Catholic Charities in Ireland, and of property devised for the purposes of Roman Catholic worship in that country?

Sir R. Peel entertained a confident and sanguine hope, that Government would be enabled to bring forward, in sufficient time to allow of its passing during the present Session, a Bill respecting the management of Roman Catholic Charities and property devised for Roman Catholic religious purposes in Ireland, with the view of carrying into effect the objects stated by Ministers in the recent debates.

POOR LAW (IRELAND).] Sir D. Norreys asked whether, in the Select Committee which, it was understood, would be appointed to inquire into the operation of the Poor Law in Ireland, the general subject of valuation for the purposes of local taxation, as connected with the Poor Law, would be considered? Or, whether the Government would themselves undertake to examine the existing system of valuation in Ireland, with the view of introducing some general measure sufficient for all the purposes of local taxation?

Sir J. Graham replied, that the hon. Baronet rightly apprehended what had fallen from him on a former occasion in regard to the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the operation of the existing Poor Law in Ireland, the Government, considering the recent date of the law, and the extensive change which had taken place in it last year, were not of opinion that they should originate such an inquiry as that to which the hon. Member had adverted. Still, it had been understood, when the Act passed last year that if it should be the general wish of the Irish Members in that House, and of the Irish Peers in the other, that an inquiry into the operation of the law should take place during the present Session, the Government would not oppose it. To that statement he adhered; and should it appear that a majority of the Representatives of Ireland, of both Houses, desire the appointment of such an inquiry, he, on the part of the Government, would not refuse it. Still, upon the whole, considering the large number of Irish Members now absent at the Assizes in Ireland, it was a question for their discussion, whether it would not be expedient, and conducive to the general benefit, to postpone the investigation until after Easter. With regard to the valuation question, that was an important part of the operation of the Poor Law in Ireland. He had before expressed it as his opinion that it would be advantageous, if it could be effected, that there should be one uniform system of valuation in Ireland, based on the principle of a fair annual rent. But the subject was, as the hon. Baronet well knew, one of great importance and great difficulty, and he had already stated that Government had been in communication with Mr. Griffiths in regard to it; and there was no one more conversant with the subject, or more competent to give sound advice upon it than that Gentleman, and between the present time and Easter, the Government would feel it their duty to enter into further communication with Mr. Griffiths, with the view of arriving, if possible, at the object he had stated—that of providing one uniform system of valuation throughout the whole of Ireland, and that a tenement valuation, based on fair annual value.

PRESBYTERIAN MARRIAGES.] Sir R. Ferguson wished to put a question to the right hon. the Home Secretary in regard to a subject which had given rise to considerable discussion and anxiety in the north of Ireland—he alluded to the question of the legality of Presbyterian marriages. The House would be aware that that question had been adjudicated upon in the House of Lords, on an appeal from the decision of the courts of law in Ireland, but they might not possibly be aware that great difference of opinion existed among those who pronounced judgment on the appeal—the Judges and three law Lords having given an opinion against the validity of such marriages, whilst two other law Lords had decided that they were valid. The question he had to put was, whether there was any objection on the part of the Government to lay the judgments which had been given by the House of Lords, for the present and last Sessions of Parliament, on the Table; and, secondly, whether Government had made up their minds to proceed to legislate, and, if so, in what manner, on this important subject?

Sir James Graham replied, that the hon. Baronet had rightly stated the opinions of the English Judges, and of the law Lords, relative to the subject of Irish Presbyterian Marriages. He was quite ready to acknowledge that it would be very desirable that the judgments in question should be laid upon the Table of the House, therefore, if the hon. Gentleman moved for them there would be no difficulty in the way of their presentation. As to the second question, he agreed with the hon. Baronet that it was impossible to overrate the importance of the subject. No final judgment had been yet pronounced upon the subject, but upon consideration of all the circumstances, his belief was that the judgment of the Irish Courts would be confirmed. In that case, it was certainly the opinion of Government that legislation would be indispensable. He knew that it was the intention of his colleagues in the other House of Parliament to propose the re-appointment of the Committee of that House which sat upon the subject last Session. It would ill become him to state what would probably be the course of proceeding adopted by that Committee, but he would state that the fullest consideration would be given to the facts of the case, and to any legislative measure which might be proposed.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.] On the Motion that the Order of the Day for a Committee of Supply be now read,

Mr. W. Williams rose to bring forward the Motion which he had announced at an earlier part of the evening. No one objected more than he did to bringing forward Motions without giving proper notice; but the time since the Estimates had been submitted to the House was so short, that he was not able to give the ordinary notice of his intention. If, however, any objection should be taken, in point of form, to his amendment, he would not press it. Looking, then, at the Estimates before him, he must say that he was much astonished at the amount proposed. He had examined the Army Estimates since the time of the battle of Waterloo down to the present day, and he found that the number of men proposed for the service of this year was larger than had been provided for in any one year since 1818. He must confess that when he saw the tranquillity of the country, and the vast amount of the forces proposed to be maintained, he was much astonished. The number proposed for the Army this year was 129,677 men, to which might be added 10,000 embodied pensioners, for whom provision was to be made. Artillery and engineers 8,811 men; Marines on shore 6,000 men; Irish Police 9,000 men; thus making altogether an effective military force capable of being called into action at any moment of 163,488 men, and this, after twenty-eight years peace, and when we were on friendly terms with every nation of the earth. He would maintain that the Irish Police was really a military force, and he had the evidence of Major Browne, the military inspector of that force, in support of the fact. This Gentleman stated that the Police was "one of the most noble forces that ever was seen. I am satisfied that they will do anything that could be expected from the bravest men. I wish I was out of Dublin at the head of such a force, for I believe that there is not a man among them that would not arrest the Pope or the Archbishop of Canterbury, if necessary." Now, the Lord Lieutenant had the power of augmenting this Police force to any number he thought proper, without reference to any Vote of this House. Hon. Gentlemen opposite might not be aware of this—but the power was conferred by the 6th of William IV., chap. 12, sec. 13. He would now pass to the non-effective force. There were first the Yeomanry, amounting to 14,263 men; the Militia on half-pay and those on service numbering 6,000 men; general and other officers on half-pay, 4,574. The non-effective privates of the regular Army amounted to 51,777 men, deducting the 10,000 pensioners; the retired Artillery on pensions to 8,586 men. Then there were the Marines, amounting to 6,000 men, the Metropolitan Police, and the Borough and County Police. The Police might be armed, and some of them had, in fact, been sent armed to South Wales. He made the non-effective force amount to about 102,690 men, which, when added to the regular army, made altogether the number of men amount to 266,078. He would ask, if the maintenance of such a force as that was at all to be justified? Looking at the state of the country, and the extreme suffering of the great mass of the people, upon whom the weight of taxation must necessarily fall to support this enormous force—looking at the increase of taxation which had taken place within the last ten years, which amounted in the whole to not less than 8,000,000*l.* sterling—looking at all those things, he asserted, that if they were determined to maintain such a force, it was impossible that they could give up the Property Tax next year, according to the promise given by the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government. They were expending the 8,000,000*l.* of increased taxation in supporting this large and unnecessary force, and other extravagant expenditures. In 1822 and 1823 the average amount of the Military force was 92,000 men, independent of the Artillery, Engineers, and Marines. In the present year the regular Army amounted to 129,677 men; and taking the embodied pensioners to the amount of 10,000 men, the increase of 2,500 men the Royal Marines, and the 9,000 Irish Police, he found that there were about 59,000 effective men this year more than the average of 1822 and 1823. What, he again asked, was there in the condition of the country to justify this increase? The average of the army in 1836 and 1837 was 101,000 men, in the present year the increase of the effective force over that average was about 41,000 men. For the last twenty-four years, from 1820 to 1843 inclusive, the average of the Army was 108,735 men, and comparing that amount with the present effective force, including the additional Marines and Pensioners, &c., the excess of the present year was upwards of 33,000 men. He thought it the duty of the Government to show to the House the grounds on which this increase was proposed. He had expected this year that there would have been a considerable reduction on the numbers voted last year; and the right hon. Baronet opposite on that occasion stated that there was a difficulty in reducing the number, as a large amount of force had been required for the war with China; but that in the course of the year a reduction would be made. At present there was no war with any country excepting it was with Ireland; but even that circumstance was not sufficient to account for the increase in the present year. At first, on looking at the Army Estimates of the present year, he thought there had been a diminution in the Expenditure. The cost of the Army last year amounted to 6,225,000*l.*; and it appeared this year to amount to 6,984,000*l.* There appeared then to be a reduction of about 241,000*l.* But on inspecting these Estimates more closely, he found that there was a sum of 202,000*l.* transferred from the Army Estimates last year to the Commissariat department. [Sir H. Hardinge: "It is so stated in the last page."] Yes; but he naturally looked at the first page, and so on, in examining those Estimates. He certainly could not withhold from the hon. and gallant Gentleman the credit which he felt was due to him for the manner in which his accounts were set forth. He could not find any complaint with these accounts, as they appeared perfectly plain and intelligible. He was, however, convinced, that no case could be made out for this increased demand now to be made upon the country. They ought to appoint a Committee to examine closely into those details, as it was impossible that the House could arrive at any satisfactory conclusion upon the matter. In a Committee the facts could be ascertained. Another point of great importance which a Committee could inquire into was that regarding the cost of the Life Guards, which appeared to him to be astounding. Admitting that the Life Guards were necessary for attending upon Her Majesty, there could be no justification for their costing 130*l.* each man per annum. There was no ground for the vast increase in the cost of the Foot Guards over the Regiments of the Line. There were three Regiments of the Foot Guards, and the number of men was 5,253. The cost in the various charges attendant upon them amounted to no less a sum than 58,400*l.*, more than the amount necessary for the same number of Regiments of the Line. The amount of pay given to these Foot Guards beyond the Regiments of the Line created much discontent and dissatisfaction among the latter. One of the Lieutenant Colonels of the Guards received 1,200*l.* a year, and two of them received 1,000*l.* a year each; but in the Regiments of the Line forty-eight Colonels received but 600*l.* a year, and fifty-four only 500*l.* a year. This he thought was a most unfair disparity, when it was considered how much severer the duty was of the commanding officer in the Regiments of the Line to what it was in the Foot Guards. Generally speaking the latter did not perform any colonial service; they were not sent to India for a period of fourteen or fifteen years, nor were they exposed to the same dangers and vicissitudes of climate as the former. The Majors of the Foot Guards received 1*l.* 3*s.* per day, when those of the Line only received 16*s.* The Captains in the same proportion 15*s.* 6*d.* in the former, and 11*s.* 7*d.* in the latter. The soldiers of the Guards received 1*d.* per day more than the soldiers of the Line. If this difference be made, the soldiers for the Guards should be chosen from other Regiments for their good conduct and general merit. They had 11,000 men receiving extra 2*d.* per day for good conduct and long service. These were the men of whom the Guards should be composed. By the adoption of such a system as this there would be a saving to the country of a very considerable sum. He disapproved, too, of the manner in which the soldiers were clad. He did not consider that they were consulting the comforts of the soldier by permitting the Colonels to have the privilege of supplying the clothing rather than having it done by contract. What was the object of allowing such a practice, but to give the Colonels profits? Those officers, he thought, ought to be remunerated in a more honourable way than to look for profits from such a source. The Artillery were not clothed in the same way; but by the Ordnance Department. The Yeomanry Cavalry, too, he thought should be abolished. They were a body of men who as soldiers, were perfectly ridiculous, and were laughed at by the people. He saw last year at Harrowgate, publicans and shopkeepers belonging to a Yeomanry Corps serving their customers with mustacios on their upper lip. He had been told that when one of these regiments was brought out and exercised, the officer in giving the word of command was particular in cautioning the men "not to cut off their horses' ears." This force seemed never to have been of any use, and he was convinced, that in any time of danger, it would be no protection whatever. As to bringing them in aid of the Civil Force, he was happy to find that Government had had too much good sense and feeling to make use of them for that purpose for many years past. They were out in Staffordshire last year, but kept at a pretty good distance from the rioters, or matters would have been much worse. He could point out a great number of items of expenditure not called for by the wants of the public service, or justified by the state of the country. It was true that the people were in a better state, that there was not so much distress and depression in some branches of trade as there was twelve months or two years ago; but he was very much afraid that the present improved state of the country was not of a lasting character, and therefore he called upon the right hon. Gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, not to allow himself to be misled by the present cheapness of money, as it did not arise from the exchanges being in favour of this country. He saw from the returns lately made that there was a great excess of gold in the Bank of England, but this arose from, and was produced by, the vast quantities of light sovereigns which had been paid in, and not from the balance of trade. A return just made showed that in about a year and a half, up to the 1st of January last, 11,000,000*l.* of light gold had been paid into the Bank of England, and he had no doubt that since the Proclamation which ordered the disfigurement of light gold had been promulgated, the increase had been greater in proportion. He would therefore advise the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer, not to make his estimates from the present condition of the Bank of England, but to look forward to periods of depression, which were as certain as that night followed day, and which he feared were not very distant. The right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government had said, he would give up the Income Tax after next April twelvemonth. [Sir R. Peel: I have never made such a statement.] The right hon. Baronet had distinctly stated he only required the Income Tax for three years. [Sir R. Peel: No, no.] He was very much mistaken if the right hon. Baronet had not held out the expectation that the Income Tax was only required to cure the disordered state of the Finances at that time, and, as he (Mr. W. Williams) had understood the right hon. Baronet, he stated it would require three years to bring the state of the Finances round. At any rate, the right hon. Baronet only asked for the Income Tax for three years. The right hon. Gentleman the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, proposed to make good the deficiency by totally different means; and, if successful, by means infinitely less oppressive than the introduction of an Income Tax. He begged leave to move, that these Estimates be referred to a select Committee of the House before they proceeded to a Vote to-night; but, as he had stated before, if any hon. Gentleman objected to his doing so on the ground of not having given sufficient notice, he would not press his Motion.

Sir H. Hardinge said, that he should be extremely sorry if the hon. Member should conceive that he was inclined to treat any of his remarks with anything like discourtesy. On the contrary, he wished to have an opportunity of answering hon. Gentlemen on some points; and it was well known that the most proper time for doing that was in a Committee of Supply, when various questions could be put and answered in a way which could not be done whilst the Speaker was in the Chair. He was sure the hon. Member would be of opinion that, so far as business was concerned, that was by far the most practicable form of proceeding. As to the Committee inquiring on the subject of the Clothing of the Army, that matter was debated in 1833, when Mr. Hume agreed that the clothing was better performed under the colonels of regiments than by general contract. As to the other points into which the hon. Member had moved for a Committee to inquire, a Committee sat for two years expressly to inquire into the force necessary for the public service. It sat in 1834 and 1835, and the hon. Member would find a vast variety of very good information in the reports of that Committee. The right hon. Gentleman in the Chair was one of the Members of the Committee. It consisted of members distinguished for capacity and intelligence, and they came to certain resolutions, which he (Sir H. Hardinge) had before him, as to the force which ought to be kept up in the colonies. He could assure the hon. Member that there was scarcely one single colony on which that Committee had reported in which there was not, at the present day, a smaller force than there was at that time. The hon. Member had also stated that he wished the Committee to inquire into the Yeomanry Cavalry, but all these subjects could be discussed in a Committee of Supply quite as well as in a Committee above stairs, and if the hon. Member would permit the House to go into a Committee of Supply, he would find that that was by far the most opportune method of discussing the questions.

Mr. Williams would not divide the House.

Motion withdrawn. Order of the Day read.

On the question that the Speaker do now leave the Chair,

Mr. H. Baillie rose to ask whether the right hon. Baronet had any intention of bringing the subject of Military Pensions under the consideration of the House? If the right hon. and gallant Officer should be enabled to give an answer in the affirmative to that question he should most willingly leave the subject in his hands, and should not proceed with the motion of which he had given notice.

Sir H. Hardinge said, that the subject to which the hon. Member had called the attention of the House was certainly one of very great importance, as it concerned the provision to be made to the soldier when no longer able to perform his public service. He was, at the present moment, under the arrangement for paying pensioners, collecting a vast variety of useful information, by which more accurate data would be obtained, and by which Government would have the means of forming a more correct opinion on the subject of military pensions. He had every reason to believe that the course which they were about to take was that which the preceding Government intended to take—viz., to obtain every possible information, and then to ascertain by a scientific calculation on what system pensions ought to be given. They were now in the course of obtaining this information, and all he could answer for was this, that without pledging himself, in any respect, or exciting expectations which might end in disappointment, that as soon as the information was collected it was the intention of the Government to bring the whole subject under the consideration of the House.

Viscount Howick expressed his regret at what had fallen from the right hon. and gallant Officer opposite on the subject of Army pensions. The right hon. and gallant Officer should have been prepared to state to the House, after being two years in office, some decided opinion. It was very well to say that he wished to create no expectations, but we all knew that the answer which he had just now made to the question asked of him, in the manner in which it had been asked, was calculated to raise expectations, which, if not hereafter fulfilled, might be extremely inconvenient and dangerous. He thought that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman should either have been prepared to state that he did mean to maintain generally the payment of pensions as at present regulated; or, on his own responsibility, as one of the Ministers of the Crown, he should have come down to the House and recommended some distinct alteration. One or other of these two courses he (Lord Howick) thought would have been the proper and right course in the situation in which the right hon. and gallant Officer now stood; why he had adopted a different course he was totally unable to conjecture. He could not allow this short conversation to pass without expressing his great regret that, in answer to a question of this nature, now having stood on the books for a considerable time, asked in the manner in which it had been asked, distinctly pointing to some increase of pension, the right hon. and gallant Officer should have given an answer which left this matter undecided and vague. Having had some little experience in office, he could take on himself most distinctly to state that there could be no difficulty of the kind to which the right hon. and gallant Officer had alluded, with respect to information. It was now nearly five years since he (Lord Howick) had left the War Office. Even at that time great part of the information necessary for any change in contemplation would have been obtained in a short time; and that in the period which had since elapsed, there could be any difficulty in obtaining all the data necessary for the most complete and perfect examination of this question, and every part connected with it, was altogether impossible. Therefore, he said again, that the House and the country had reason to complain of the right hon. and gallant Officer, because he found, that when in office, it was difficult, consistent with his duty, to do those things which he had urged in opposition, and wished rather to put the question by altogether. He confessed it did appear to him that the manly and straightforward course would have been that the right hon. Gentleman should have taken one line or the other on this subject, and not have left it in abeyance in the manner he had.

Sir H. Hardinge did not think he was at all subject to the taunts which the noble Lord had thrown out. He had stated his belief to be, that the late Government intended to take some such course as that which he had taken; and his authority for saying that, was a letter of the noble Lord himself, which he had left in the office as a record of his opinion. In that letter he distinctly stated, that he expected to collect statistical information, on which, when received, he recommended that the provision for pensioners should be taken into further consideration. The noble Lord expressly stated, that he wished to obtain information for that professed object. Was it not likely that, coming into office, he should feel all the difficulties of the question as strongly as the noble Lord; at the same time having his own opinion, but perceiving that the last act of the noble Lord, before he went out of office, was to recommend this course? The noble Lord now turned round, and taunted him with not having given a more manly and straightforward answer. The noble Lord must be aware, that whatever might be his (Sir H. Hardinge's) feelings on the subject, he had abstained from bringing forward the question at the request of individuals high in the Government of the day. He had, on all occasions, supported Her Majesty's Government on the Army Estimates, and had declined to bring forward the question as to pensioners. He had strong feelings on the subject. When called upon to give evidence on Committees, he did not conceal his opinions, but he thought it was prudent not to bring the matter before the House. Whatever might be his opinions, as a Member of the Government, it was his duty, more guardedly than ever, to bring the question before the Government for their consideration; and if, therefore, he took the course which the noble Lord had chalked out in the letter which he had left, as the recorded expression of his own wishes, he was not at all amenable to the taunt which the noble Lord had thrown out.

Viscount Howick hoped, as the right hon. and gallant Officer had spoken a second time, that the House would indulge him in a few words in reply. He admitted that the answer would have been perfectly well-founded if it had been made last year, or the year before, instead of this year. There might be a difficulty about statistical details five years ago which could hardly continue to be put forward now. The right hon. and gallant Officer was perfectly aware that his letter was not with reference to a projected general increase of pensions, but was with reference to a scheme to which he attached great value—of facilitating the discharge of men at an early age from the Army and placing them upon the registry for deferred pensions.

Dr. Bowring regretted that the hon. Member for Coventry had withdrawn his Motion, and that estimates of such great importance, involving the application of so large a sum of public money, were not referred to a Select Committee for further examination. Two nights were occupied in the discussion of the Navy Estimates; the attention of the House was not called to the details, and the same thing appeared to be about to happen as to the Army Estimates. Generally speaking, neither these nor the Navy Estimates could receive the attention to which they were entitled. He wished the course to be followed here which was adopted in a neighbouring country, where every matter was referred to Special Committees charged with the investigation of all the details; not a sum was voted as to which evidence was not taken as to its necessity, nor was a single vote introduced to the Chamber till it had undergone a thorough preliminary investigation. One night the House had voted away five millions, and to-night they would vote away six millions. He did not think that they properly discharged the functions of legislation by allowing votes to be adopted in the way in which they were adopted in the House. Some opprobrium attached to both sides of the House. Six millions, or one-eighth of the public revenue, was to be disposed of in the presence of one-eighth of the whole House of Commons. He wished that his Friends whom he saw above, would lend more of their assistance. He had understood that the presence of strangers at the Bar was recognised; he for one always looked upon the publicity of the Debates, as one of the great securities for the good conduct of Members, and he only wished that the Public were better informed as to what passed. He had been very much struck with an observation of Mr. Cobbett, when a Member of the House, that the most important topic of paying taxes was sure not to excite the attention it ought to excite—that if more attention was directed to it, the public money would not be voted as it was. His hon. Friend, the Member for Coventry, might have acted judiciously in withdrawing his Motion, because something of irregularity was attached to his proposal, but he should be glad to find it a general rule that matters of this sort were to be submitted to a Select Committee before they came under the notice of the House.

Mr. S. Crawford desired shortly to call the attention of the House to the unconstitutional nature of the immense standing army kept up for the home service. It appeared that there were 48,809 rank and file in the United Kingdom. He estimated the officers for that force at 6,000, which made the regular army amount to 54,809. Adding thereto the pensioners, 10,000, and the volunteer force, 14,000, make an army of near 79,000. The Irish constabulary, which was to all intents and purposes, a Standing Army, amounted to 9,000, which made the whole of this force combined, 87,809. There were other military and marines of the amount of which he had no knowledge. There was a military force kept within the United Kingdom to the amount of 88,000. He would ask the House and the Government, was it necessary to have a force of that amount within the United Kingdom? If it was necessary, why was it necessary? Were the people of the United Kingdom disloyal to the Sovereign? He was perfectly convinced they were not; he was perfectly convinced there never was a Sovereign on the Throne of these Realms to whom the people of every part of the United Kingdom were more attached. Were they disloyal to the Constitution? They were not so; they were only desirous to obtain the full benefits of the constitution. Then was it necessary for the protection of life and property, that this army should be kept up? If you said, that it was necessary for the protection of life and property, then he asked, how came that necessity to exist. How did it happen that you could not secure life and property in this realm without keeping up such an army as that? The reason was this, that justice was not done to the working classes. He did not now speak of political rights; he spoke of the condition of the working classes. He said, that this Government, and this Legislature, did not do justice to the working classes; they did not consider the wants of the poor, nor did they provide for the wants of the poor as they ought: they legislated for other interests than the poor man's interests, and the consequence was, that the poor man was discontented, and the consequence of that discontent was, that the Government was obliged to keep up that unconstitutional amount of force. In the 15th century, the working classes were deprived of the right they had in the land, which was given to the rich ; but, as a compensation, they obtained a Poor Law, which worked for their benefit. But what had been done since ? They had broken faith with the working classes, they had deprived them of those rights which had been conferred upon them when their right in the land was estranged, and they were now told, that they could not obtain relief in any other manner than one which was revolting to their feelings. Still they maintained the Corn Laws, which greatly enhanced the price of the food they were obliged to eat. That was one of the great crimes which the Legislature had committed against the poor and the labouring classes—it was one of the causes of the insubordination which occasionally manifested itself, and then it was made a pretext for keeping up such a large military force. The taxation, which in former times was paid by the rich, was now imposed upon the poor ; yet, this large force was to be maintained at their charge, and they were not to be allowed even to grumble. What was the reason they were now obliged to keep such an army in Ireland ? They had imposed upon that country a most iniquitous Poor Law—a law which was repugnant to the feelings of all classes—a law which tended to shake that benevolent feeling upon which the poor had formerly subsisted, and drove all applicants for relief into a Poor House, which was abhorrent to their feelings. Surely it was no wonder that discontent should prevail, and that a very large army was rendered necessary for the purpose of levying the rates, from which the people derived no benefit [Question.] He was speaking to the question ; he was showing why it was that they were obliged to keep up such a large Standing Army. They were giving the people education—he valued it much ; but he would tell them that if they educated the people, without, at the same time, affording them the means of improving their condition, they would only add very greatly to the discontent which already existed. The injustice done to the suffering people was the cause of their asking for so large a force. It would be wholly unnecessary if the people were treated fairly and honestly. A large Standing Army was not required in the time of Alfred. The time was when the Sheriff, with the posse comitatus, was able to keep the peace ; but dare they now entrust him with the duty unless they backed him with troops of soldiery ? He would not object to the volunteer system if the corps were raised from the body of the people ; but he protested against the present system, as the Yeomanry Corps were composed entirely of one class, and that a class which was hostile to the working classes. It was the duty of the Representatives of the people to withhold from the Government an excessive military force, and by that means force them to consider and redress the grievances of the people. It was the duty of hon. Members of that House to make a stand against the demands of the Government, but he was afraid that he could not hope at the present time to make an effective one, because he was not supported by Members on his side of the House as he ought to be. If the large minority which voted upon the party question the other night would stand up upon that which was a far more important question to the poor throughout the country, no Government could withstand him. No individual could fight the battle unless he met with support both in that House and out of doors. He had mooted the question of the large and expensive Standing Army out of doors, and he was free to admit that there had not been such an exhibition of feeling on the part of the people as he had expected. Still he considered it to be his duty to move as an amendment,

“ That the large amount of Standing Army, and every description of military force, now kept up for the service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, are contrary to the principles of constitutional liberty, and dangerous to the rights of the people.”

Dr. Bowring had much pleasure in seconding the amendment of his hon. Friend. In his judgment, with a popular Sovereign, a popular Executive, and a popular Legislature, there could be no necessity for a large Standing Army. He had, only a few nights ago, presented a Petition signed by upwards of 1000 of the inhabitants of the town he had the privilege to represent, complaining of the waste of money in keeping up such a military force. They protested, and he protested in their name, against such a waste of the money which was wrung from the poor. Out of doors, he would warn the House, there was a growing discontent against that House and its prodigality. There were millions of discontented people out of doors who were displeased with the conduct pursued by those who were called the Representatives of the people. It was their duty to allay that discontent before it was too late.

Mr. Fielden said, it appeared to him as if the hon. Gentlemen who were so anxious to vote away some millions of money, had totally forgot where the taxes came from. The large amount of force which was demanded by the Government was rendered necessary by the criminal neglect of the condition of the working classes by Government and that House. They were going to amend the Poor Law Bill—it was impossible; they could never make it acceptable to the people. It was brought in and supported on the plea that it would raise the wages of the labouring poor, and render them independent in character. Had it done so? Had wages been raised? Let the conflagrations which were, unfortunately, now so numerous throughout the country, answer. He warned the House that they were on the borders of a volcano; they must retrace their steps; they must put the working classes in an easier state, or Government and order would be at an end. The cry was always more force; the moment they got more force, they raised the cry of more taxes, and when they got more taxes, then they wanted more force again. There must come an end to such a system. He thought the people were right to insist upon their Representatives stopping the Supplies until the grievances of the people were considered and redressed. He would vote for the amendment.

House in Committee.

Sir H. Hardinge, in bringing forward the Army Estimates for the ensuing year, said he should take the usual course of stating the causes of the difference between the present Estimate and that of last year. It was not for the sake of keeping up a Standing Army at home, that the Government asked for a large force, and he would show the hon. Member for Rochdale opposite that the real cause was the necessity of affording relief to our troops abroad. The Vote was for 100,295 rank and file, and non-commissioned officers, exclusive of the force employed in the East Indies, 29,971 men, making 130,266. A corresponding Force must always be kept up at home to relieve troops abroad. In 1842 the Force was 122,516, and it was then the intention of Government to make a reduction; but scarcely had the Estimates passed when the events that took place in Cabul compelled them to send six battalions of 1,000 men to the East; these regiments had only completed four years' service at home. In 1843, a reduction of 2,000 was made. Government had contemplated a reduction of 3,500, and this intention would have been pursued, but such was the state of India, that notwithstanding the increased number of battalions sent out, the Governor General could not send home the regiments that ought in regular course to be relieved. These circumstances, combined with events that made it necessary to take measures for the preservation of public tranquillity at home, prevented Government from following out its intention to make the larger reduction he had stated. He might remind hon. Gentlemen who cavilled about expense, that a part of the expense was borne by the East India Company. The expense of nearly 30,000 men in the East Indies, amounting to nearly 1,000,000*l.*, sterling, was defrayed by the Company. Every Government had sanctioned the principle that ten years abroad and five years at home ought to be the order of service. He would now proceed to prove to the hon. Member opposite that the large Force kept up was not for the sake of maintaining a Standing Army, but to afford relief. In 1842, there were twenty-five regiments at home, and seventy-eight abroad. In this state of things it was impossible to keep up the requisite reliefs. No less than twenty-two regiments were abroad that year which had served more than ten years in the Colonies, exclusive of eight or nine regiments in the same situations in the East Indies. There were, in all, in 1842, thirty-two or thirty-three regiments that had served abroad more than ten years. Government felt it a duty to relieve these regiments. Between 1837 and 1842, an additional force of 21,000 men had been raised by Lord Melbourne's Government in consequence of various events, such as the insurrection in Canada, the hostilities in India and China, &c. Of the twenty-five regiments at home in 1842, scarcely any had been at home more than three years and a half, while more than thirty regiments were, serving upwards of ten years abroad. The course taken was to convert nine dépôts into nine second battalions, and to send them abroad, to relieve troops in the various Colonies. By the assistance of these battalions, and by withdrawing 5,500 men from North America, and one regiment from the West Indies, seventeen battalions were sent abroad, and twenty-two regiments in the Colonies withdrawn. It was satisfactory to be able to state that in consequence of the measure adopted in 1842, there was not at present in the Colonies a single battalion which had been more than ten years abroad. This, unfortunately, was not the case with respect to the troops in India. There were now in India regiments which had served more than eighteen years abroad, and six regiments that had served more than twenty years. There were thus in India fourteen regiments which had served more than fifteen years in that country, and it was, therefore, important both for the health and discipline of the men, that they should be more regularly and periodically relieved. This object could not be accomplished, without keeping up an adequate relieving force at home, and he was, therefore, justified in repeating, that the object of Government was not the maintenance of a Standing Army in this country, but the necessity of proper relief to our soldiers serving beyond the seas. Take the case of some of the regiments in the East Indies, for instance. There was in that country, among other regiments, the 13th Infantry, commanded by Sir R. Sale, which after serving in the Cabool campaign, and defending most heroically the fortress of Jelalabad, was after twenty years service in India now on its march to Scinde, where, in all probability, it would have to perform very heavy duty. It was the same with the 55th, now in Hong Kong. That regiment had been twenty-two years abroad. Was it right or proper that such things should be? Arrangements had been made, however, to relieve these regiments, and he trusted that the latter would be on its return to this country in the course of the next autumn. Without the means of sending regiments from England, it was obvious that this relief could not take place, and, therefore, he (Sir H. Hardinge) claimed the support of the House for the propositions he should submit to them on the subject. There were now thirteen regiments which had returned from abroad, some of them since last November. These regiments generally arrived deficient in strength, from sickness, casualties, and other causes; and it was, therefore, absolutely necessary to recruit them and make them effective. A large proportion of the Estimates about to be laid before the House was for these recruits. With regard to the Army at home, he had to inform the House, that out of thirty-six battalions, not one had been in this country four years. Her Majesty's Government had now at home thirty-six battalions instead of twenty-four, which was the number at home in 1842; and thus they were enabled to relieve the regiments on foreign stations with more regularity. It was for that purpose, and not for the purpose of keeping up a Standing Army, he could assure the House that they were maintained. The hon. Member for Coventry had stated, that the country should return to the condition of the Army in 1822; but the hon. Member had forgotten to state, that it was an admitted fact, on all hands, that the force of that year was insufficient. Lord Castlereagh had come down to the House and said, in reference to it, that although the Government had consented to make the experiment of a large reduction in the Army, at that period it was absolutely necessary to increase the force in the ensuing year. The consequence was, that in 1823 the Army had to be increased by six new regiments, and, in 1825, the addition amounted to 25,000 men; an increase over and above the 21,000 reduced in 1822 of 4,000. Another bad consequence which accrued from that mode of reduction was the entailment of a very heavy expense on the public, by the half-pay and pensions of those officers and soldiers who had been reduced, and the bounties for the latter who had to be newly enlisted. It also deprived the country of the services of some valuable officers, while it nearly ruined others by inducing the necessity of repurchase. Then, with regard to the year 1836. The hon. Member said, that the Government of Lord Melbourne had kept up in that year only 101,000 men, while the force for the present year was 129,000; making a difference of 28,000 of all ranks. But if the hon. Member looked to the distribution of the forces in the colonies this year, as compared with that, he would find abundant reason to justify that increase. In India, there were 8,151 more rank and file than in 1836, in China, which was a new service, there were 3,000, in Australia 2,364, and there were other additions in various places to the amount of 20,000 men in all. There had been, however, a reduction of 5,000 men in the force of this year as compared with last on foreign service—in the Mediterranean, 1,794; in Jamaica, 1,300; in the West Indies, 200; in Ceylon, 716, &c. Taking that from 20,000, the real addition made to the Army abroad was 15,000 men. It had been urged that this augmentation was to create a Standing Army, but what object could be gained by increasing the force in Australia, or at the Cape of Good Hope. In the former, officers were living in a state of wretchedness as compared with their mode of life in this country, or at better stations; at the Cape, unfortunate subalterns were stationed 300 miles up the country, with no one to speak to. Could Her Majesty's Government have any object in exiling these gentlemen, except the public service? In 1824, the force in Australia was 400 men; this year it was 5,000. There were, at this moment, 50,000 convicts in that country, while the whole number of free settlers did not amount to 150,000. In Van Diemen's Land, the convicts outnumbered the free settlers. It was requisite that the lives and properties of the latter should be protected, and thence the necessity of the increased force. Having, as he trusted, shown the House that Her Majesty's Government were entitled to support for bringing about more frequent relief to the troops in the colonies, and on foreign service, he should next advert to the arrangements of the forces of the line at home. Instead of twenty-five battalions, which was the number at home on the present Government coming into office, there were now thirty-six; and twenty-two, which were abroad, had been relieved. In the course of the ensuing year, he trusted that a large proportion of the twenty-three regiments in India would also be duly relieved. With regard to the other questions of the hon. Member for Coventry, as to the charge of the non-effective forces, inclusive of the general officers, he begged to remind the House that most of these gallant men were now old, and some of them very infirm. No less than forty-seven of them had died within the past year, and he was sorry to say that few of the survivors were in a condition to fit them for active service. In 1822, the number of general officers was 396; in 1844, it was 171, making a difference of 225. In 1822, the officers retired and reduced upon full pay, was 771; in 1844, it was 360, making a difference of 411. In 1822, the reduced and retired officers upon half-pay and military allowance numbered 9,744; in 1844, they were 4,035, making a difference of 5,709. In 1844, the officers receiving foreign half-pay were, in number, 466; while in 1822, they were 1,108, being a difference of 642. There were then, in all, officers receiving pensions:—

1844.....	6,032.....	909,000

Reduction of } Officers }	6,987	Reduction of } Pensions }	£742,000
------------------------------	-------	------------------------------	----------

This was a large reduction in that part of the Estimates, in which the patronage of a Government could be most effectually exercised. If to that reduction was added the reduction in the Chelsea Hospital, and ordinary pensions to Negro soldiers and Militia, it would be found that while in 1822 they were in number 98,000, in 1844, they were only 73,101, making a difference of 24,899 in numbers, and in expense of about 320,000*l*. On these two items alone the pensioners, the half-pay officers, and the general officers, called the dead weight of the Army, but which he (Sir H. Hardinge) should rather call the non-effective service, there had been a reduction equal to a million sterling a year—a reduction, too, it should be stated, which was not merely annual, but which would go on increasing in a large ratio each year. Was not that a strong proof of the manner in which the present Government—and he would say, former Governments—had endeavoured to keep down the expense of the Army. Having stated these facts, he should proceed with the ordinary parts of the Estimate. The Estimate for the first Vote which he should propose was, 100,295 men; the Estimate for the second, which depended upon it, was 3,431,000*l*. for their payment and expenses, being 191,859*l*. less than the Estimate of the last year. That diminution, however, he was bound to inform the House was more apparent than real, as it principally rose from the transfer of the provisions, forage, fuel, and light abroad, as well as the passage of officers and men from one foreign station to another, to the Commissariat and Navy Estimates. In 1836 there had been a transfer of the former of these items from the Commissariat to the Army Estimates; but last year an inquiry was instituted, and the result was the re-transfer this year to the Commissariat. In point of principle it was much the better plan to place every ordinary service under the Army head, but the mode of putting provisions, &c., into the Army Estimates was not by any means free from objection in practice. Her Majesty's Government, under these circumstances, were of opinion that the preferable arrangement was for the Commissariat to take the Estimate for the supply of provisions, &c.; and he fully concurred with the Duke of Wellington on the propriety of maintaining that department of the Public Service. There was another item to which he should beg to call the attention of the House, namely, the libraries which had been established for the use of each regiment. This year there was 2,000*l*. proposed for books for them. There were now thirty-eight libraries at home, and forty abroad, in the several regiments; and one had been recently sent out to Hong Kong. In fact, there was no foreign station which would be without a library, or which had not a library at present. He had also to mention the lunatic asylum for officers at Chatham. The spot on which it was placed was not a healthy one, nor fit for the purpose intended, and the Government had accordingly made arrangements to purchase the ground for another in the neighbourhood of Rochester. The third Vote related to the staff. After noting and explaining several items of the Estimates the right hon. Gentleman concluded by saying, he had now gone through the whole, and he would repeat that it was the most anxious wish and desire of Her Majesty's Government to give the House all the information possible upon the subject. The right hon. Baronet moved—that a force (exclusive of the troops employed in the East Indies) of 100,295 men be maintained for the service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland from the 1st of April, 1844, to the 31st of March, 1845.

Captain Layard said, no doubt it would be in the recollection of the House, that for the last ten years, upon the Army Estimates being brought under discussion, he had thought it his duty, a duty he owed to the service to which he had the honour to belong—to state his opinion of the immense advantage it would be that men should be allowed to enlist for limited service, and receive a free discharge in ten years, as by such means a very superior class of men, he had no doubt, would be induced to enter the service, and by such means, a great deal of the crime which was now committed would be avoided. There was no greater or graver offence against military law than desertion, and that would, he felt convinced, be much less frequent when those who had enlisted, without consideration, and found themselves unfitted for the service, were assured that at a certain time, by good and steady conduct, they could claim a discharge. In the French service desertion was not so frequent as in ours, and it entirely arose from their having only to serve for a limited time, for no soldiers in the world, he was happy to state, had more care taken of them every way than ours. He felt convinced that the parents of young men in the middle classes would not then feel that aversion which was felt against allowing their sons to enter the service: for then, if a boy entered at eighteen and received his discharge at twenty-eight, he would be able to apply himself to any other calling, which would not be the case if he left the service at a later period of life. It had been stated as a reason against limited service, and it seemed at first sight an insurmountable one, that great expense would be incurred by sending home any considerable body of men, supposing the regiment to be abroad; but he considered the expense so entailed would be fully and amply provided for by those who had enlisted for limited service receiving no pension; and he believed that most of the men would remain with the regiment and would re-enlist finding themselves much better off abroad than at home, though of course, more exposed to the vicissitudes of climate. His opinion upon this subject was founded not only upon his own observation, but had been since confirmed by the opinion of many able officers, to whom he had spoken upon the subject: and he believed few, if any, would disagree with him, when they remembered that one, whose judgment upon such a subject must be one of the best, and whose anxiety for the well being of the soldier all must appreciate, agreed with him when he stated the same opinion last year. He alluded to the right hon. Baronet the Secretary at War. He, therefore, wished to ask that right hon. and gallant Officer, if there was any chance of its being carried into effect? In the second place, he wished to ask the gallant Officer if it was in contemplation to increase the bounty with regard to the infantry soldier, as he was most thankful to learn had been done in the case of the cavalry, as, from its inefficiency to supply the soldier's necessities, the recruit, finding himself in debt had often deserted, believing that good faith had not been kept with him. The next thing he wished to call the attention of the right hon. Baronet to was, the advantage that would arise from making the band sergeant, the master tailor, and corporal, the pioneers belonging to the staff, and giving ten more sergeants and one corporal to each regiment, as the companies to which those men belonged could receive no advantage from them, on account of their time being otherwise fully employed. He thought it would be a great encouragement, and one that was well deserved, if the lance sergeants and lance corporals were to receive—the first, three pence a-day, and the second, two pence a-day extra. They had an immense amount of duty to perform; and many of them having to attend school and to pay for it, it threw them into debt. He trusted this would meet with the consideration it well deserved. He must now allude to a subject that was a very painful one to all who were interested in the welfare of the Army—he alluded to the pensioners. A man receiving sixpence a-day might, indeed be a saving to the Poor Rate, but could be of little benefit to the man himself. He knew the soldier thought deeply, and felt deeply upon this subject, and he did trust that an alteration should take place. A sailor would get a pension now of a shilling a-day after twenty-one years' service, but it would take a soldier twenty-eight years' service, which few ever could perform. The badges for good conduct brought forward by the noble Lord the Member for Sunderland had proved of great advantage, and both for that boon, and for the greater allowance of fresh provisions to the troops in the West Indies, the Army felt grateful. He begged to thank the right hon. Baronet and those in authority at the Horse Guards for bringing forward the Savings Banks, which he believed would have in time an excellent effect; though he was sorry to say that a feeling had gone forth amongst the men, that the Government had formed Savings Banks to find out what the men could save, with a view to reduce the pay. Nothing could be more ridiculous; and he trusted by this time the men were disabused upon this notion. He thought praise was due to the gallant Officer the Member for Liverpool who had warmly advocated this Measure, as well as his noble Friend the Member for Chichester. He wished likewise to call the attention of the right hon. and gallant Officer, the Secretary at War, to the great hardship felt by married officers in not being allowed to draw coals and candles, when in lodgings; for instance, a non-commissioned officer, upon being given a commission, if married, which he generally was, must go into lodgings, and how could he live on his pay there, his allowances being stopped? He thought it was a great hardship, and hoped it would be soon attended to. No feeling had actuated him upon such an occasion but the one that would, he felt assured, actuate all, both in and out of the House, a sincere and an anxious desire, at all times, taking into consideration the resources of the country to promote the comfort, the happiness, and the well-being, of those who undismayed by the vicissitudes of climate, undaunted by the sword of the enemy, maintained, as they always had done, the glory and independence of the country.

Sir H. Hardinge would endeavour, as briefly as possible, to give an answer to the question which had been put by the gallant Officer opposite. He doubtless was aware that the plan of giving a free discharge after certain periods of service, and affording facilities to obtain discharges, was established in the year 1829. He (Sir H. Hardinge) felt a great interest in that mode, because he always considered it cheap and useful, and one which reconciled private families to their sons entering the Army. It had had that effect, and taking into consideration the number of men who had received free discharges, and also making a fair calculation of the saving of pensions on the single item of the warrant of 1829, there had been a saving of nearly half a million. He believed the actual amount was 497,000*l*. With respect to bounties, he believed that the bounty and equipment for a cavalry soldier were now sufficient to pay all the expenses of a recruit. With regard to staff-surgeons, the expense was rather heavy, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer would scarcely be a party to the arrangement proposed. On the subject of Savings Banks, he felt bound to say that arrangements for them were in progress when he came into office; and whatever credit was due to those who established them belonged to his predecessors. If any soldier deposited his savings in these banks it would not at all affect his pay. His pay would not be altered, and those who imagined so were labouring under a very great error. With respect to coals and candles, he so far agreed with the gallant Officer that every possible arrangement had been made to carry the plan into effect.

Mr. W. Williams was far from being satisfied of the necessity of the large force proposed. The right hon. Gentleman had pointed out the necessity of shortening the period of the soldiers' servitude abroad. The right hon. Gentleman naturally felt for the service, and only looked at one side. He (Mr. Williams), however, looked at the condition of the people who were so heavily taxed to maintain this force. It was true there was at this moment less distress than was seen some time ago, but he was afraid the people would soon be in as bad a state as before. There was nothing to justify the keeping up of so large a number of men, and he therefore proposed as an Amendment, that the number be 80,295 instead of 100,295, being a reduction of 20,000 men.

Viscount Howick did not rise for the purpose of supporting the proposition of the hon. Member for Coventry, because he did not think it would be at all politic to make such a reduction as the one now proposed; but he did not consider the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman to be justified by the necessity of affording relief in our colonial possessions. He certainly admitted, that the pressure on the Infantry was stronger than it ought to be; but still if the demand at home, and especially in Ireland, were not so large, this object might be accomplished without keeping up so large a force; and even with that large force, he was of opinion, that in justice to the soldiers of the British army means ought to be taken still further to diminish the pressure of that service upon them. Several measures might be adopted with that view. In the first place, he retained the opinion, which he long ago expressed, that much might be done by diminishing the proportion of each regiment at home. He was persuaded that more efficient dépôts might be formed by having two companies instead of four. But beyond this he could not help saying, that while the demands upon the Troops of the Line were so heavy, it was very unfortunate that another description of force, upon which the pressure was much less, were not required to take a greater share of duty than they were at present. When he (Viscount Howick) filled the office of Secretary at War, at the time the insurrection broke out in Canada, and when there was an increased demand for troops in the Colonies, he pressed upon Lord Hill the propriety of sending out as a portion of that increased force two battalions of the Guards. That course was adopted. The Guards had now come home, and he was not aware that any other portion of that force had since been sent to our colonial possessions. He was far from saying the Guards ought to take a share of colonial duty like the regiments of the line, but so far as service at such a distance was concerned, and in healthy climates, they might do something. He thought that two battalions of the Guards might be kept abroad, in the Mediterranean, as a regular arrangement. The officers in the Guards had a great advantage over those in the line, inasmuch as they rose to the rank of general officer much more rapidly, and any one in the habit of looking at the brevets could not fail to notice the circumstance, and it was not unreasonable to expect them to take some share of foreign duty. If two battalions were kept abroad, the only effect would be this, that two years out of seven would be passed by them in perfectly healthy colonies. Something might also be done by having a larger proportion of marines, and if a battalion of these were employed in the Mediterranean or at Gibraltar, it would tend to diminish the amount of colonial duty. The hon. and gallant Officer who spoke from that (the Opposition) side of the House adverted to the subject of pensions, saying that it was hard that a soldier retiring after long service, and entirely worn out, should receive only 6*d.* a day. He could not allow it to be said, that that was a fair representation of the case. That was not the amount to which a really worn out soldier was entitled. It was easy to say, that a larger and more liberal pension ought to be granted; but he hoped, before adopting any such plan, the Government would consider the state of things with which they had to deal a few years ago, and the grounds on which the change took place. Formerly the practice was this:—A soldier had no right to retire on a pension, unless he was unfit for further service. If pronounced unfit for service by a medical board, after serving for twenty-one years, he might retire on a pension of 1*s.* a day. That regulation was liable to great inconvenience. A multitude of men only thirty-nine years of age had the right to claim this pension. A man was not allowed to claim it unless disabled; but his pension was within a small amount of his regular pay; and he naturally desired to receive 1*s.* for doing nothing, rather than 1*s.* 2*d.* or 1*s.* 3*d.* for going through the fatigue of service. The moment the men passed that age, and on representation being made, that they were unfit for longer service, they were discharged. The hon. and gallant Member himself, when Secretary at War, under the Duke of Wellington's Administration, felt the evil so strongly that he endeavoured to check it. He adopted a regulation to prevent a man retiring at the age of thirty-nine, unless he were bond fide disabled, and no longer fit for duty. He established the rule, that the certificate of the regimental surgeon should no longer be sufficient; he required that the man should go to Chatham, remain there a certain time and obtain a certificate of his unfitness, and then he required him to appear before the Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital, previous to obtaining his discharge. Even these regulations were found to be inefficient. When the man wanted to go he generally contrived to elude all these precautions. In a letter addressed by a very able medical officer to the right hon. and gallant Member, the Secretary at War, it was stated that men who had never had chronic rheumatism, invariably found themselves attacked by it the moment they reached the age at which they became entitled to a pension, and that numbers had become qualified, on the ground that they suffered from chronic rheumatism. In this manner the Pension List became a growing burthen to the country. According to that system a man who had served his twenty-one years might for thirty years receive a pension nearly equal to his pay as a soldier, and an undoubted proof of the extent to which the abuse was carried was to be found in the fact, that a large number of these pensioners were found to a certain extent to be fit for military duty. [Sir H. Hardinge.—Not for service in the Army.] No; for duty of a different description, for the performance of which the right hon. and gallant Member had organised them to serve for a period of five years. The modified warrant had not come into operation, and great difficulty was found in checking the practice, and it was perfectly notorious, that large numbers of men who had been discharged, on the ground of their being afflicted with fatal complaints, such as consumption, were drawing pensions from the fund. His right hon. Friend had endeavoured to guard against this abuse, by providing that the pension of 6*d.* a day only should be granted when the soldier was unfit for active duty in the Army, and could largely contribute towards his own maintenance. If not capable of doing anything to maintain himself, it appeared, that his pension could be increased to the same amount as it was under the former warrant, and that he would be entitled to 1s. a day. It was a delusion, therefore, to say that his right hon. Friend had provided that a man should be discharged from the Army, after he was entirely worn out, with a pension inadequate for his support. Another evil under the former system was one with which the noble Lord, the Member for London, was much struck when he was Paymaster of the Forces, and, as such, was a member of the Board of Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital. Men repeatedly came before the Board whose characters, according to the report of their officers, were bad; yet these men, however notoriously bad their characters might be, were entitled to their discharge and pension after the regular period of service; and although their disability might have been the effect of drunkenness, still, if they had never fallen under the sentence of a court-martial, the Commissioners had no power to refuse them the same pension as that enjoyed by the best and most deserving soldier. To check that abuse, and, at the same time, to increase the pension to the good soldier, he, when Secretary at War, suggested, with the full concurrence of the late Lord Hill and the military authorities of the Horse Guards, that what was called good-conduct pay should be given to the soldier. The soldier whose conduct had been such as to entitle him to it—whose name did not appear in the defaulter's book, obtained on his discharge the good-conduct pay in addition to his pension, and became entitled to receive 1s. 2d., and sometimes 1s. 4d. a day. These facts ought to be considered before they condemned the measure formerly adopted. In his opinion, the country ought to be very jealous of any measure which went to increase the expense of the dead weight of the Army. Much might be done to better the condition of the soldier. They might improve the terribly inefficient barracks in many of our distant Colonies; they might still improve the provisions which they receive in those climates, and they might carry further measures for facilitating an easier discharge of men from the Army; this last improvement would encourage parents to send their sons into the Army, for at present if a young man entered the Army he was seldom able to return from abroad to visit his family. Though he was aware there were strong prejudices against such an alteration, he yet hoped the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would turn his attention to it. In doing so, however, he entreated him not to adhere to the warrant of 1829. One part of that warrant was very objectionable, that part which enabled a man, after certain periods of service, to obtain his discharge, and a gratuity on his discharge. He had proposed, that instead of a gratuity, the soldier should have the right to have his name registered at Chelsea with a view to afterwards being entitled to his pension. There was another point to which he wished to call the attention of the House, namely, the change made in the Estimates of this year as to the mode of charging the expense of provisions for the troops serving abroad. The manner in which this change had taken place was rather extraordinary. He thought the right hon. Gentleman ought to have laid on the Table of the House the Treasury Minute, and any other documents which could show the propriety of the change. In the absence of any such documents, he disapproved of the change, not merely because the whole charge did not now appear in the Estimates, but because he thought the charge was not a proper one under the head of the Commissariat Department. He must say that the administration of the Commissariat Department had always been, in his opinion, both under Gentlemen on his side of the House, as well as under Gentlemen opposite, in the highest degree unsatisfactory. It had fallen into the hands of a certain number of the clerks of the Treasury who performed the duties without any proper supervision, and without knowing much about the business, and the consequence was that the health and comfort of the troops were materially neglected. He would state to the House some startling facts on this point. From statistical accounts of the Army laid on the Table of the House, when he held the office of Secretary at War, it appeared that during the twenty years following the peace, that was up to 1835, the annual mortality of our troops in the West Indian command was, on an average, 93 out of every 1,000 men; the annual mortality of the Forces at home being only 15 out of every 1,000,

No doubt this great mortality in the Windward and Leeward Islands was the inevitable consequence of the climate. But when they found that the total number of deaths in the troops employed in the West Indies for the twenty years following the peace amounted to no less a number than 6,800, not one of whom was killed in active service, but all perished from disease, a danger requiring more real courage to face than actual war—when they found that such a number had perished from the effects of the climate he thought they would agree with him when he said that every prevention which human prudence could dictate ought to be taken to reduce that mortality to its lowest amount. What would the House think when he told them that during the last twenty years it had been the routine practice of the Commissariat to issue salt provisions to the troops in those Colonies five days in the week? Now, without being a medical man, but knowing the tendency which salt provisions had to create thirst and to increase the disposition to drunkenness, he must say he thought that to give our troops in the West Indies salted provisions five days in the week was a system the most injurious to their health. It was common sense to suppose that it was injurious, and he knew, from a careful examination of the reports of every medical officer in the West Indies, that they confirmed his view of the subject. He had, however, a stronger case. Would the House believe that during the six years in which we kept up a large garrison in St. Helena, when Napoleon Bonaparte was a prisoner, no fresh provisions whatever were issued to the troops, their uniform food consisting entirely of salted provisions. What was the consequence? Diseases of the stomach and dysentery, which medical men agreed in attributing to their habitual use of salted food, prevailed among the troops, and the annual mortality among them during the six years was no less than 34 in every 1,000, being rather more than double the rate of the mortality among the troops who were kept in this country. It appeared, too, that that great mortality must have been owing to the treatment which the troops received; for during the same six years only one officer out of sixty-three had died of disease. It was further remarkable that whenever the troops were employed on any special service, during which they had an opportunity of eating fresh meat, they enjoyed good health; so that there they had the most undoubted evidence that it was to the manner in which the troops had been provisioned that that fearful mortality should be traced. It was, no doubt, true that in the Island of St. Helena fresh provisions were very dear. But he would ask the House whether they would begrudge any little additional expense that might be necessary to preserve the lives of British soldiers? He was sure that there was not one Member of the House who would regret any expenditure that might be necessary for such a purpose. It was a remarkable fact that that system of giving the troops salt provisions had been adopted in cases in which, so far from being an economy, it was the very reverse. He found, that to troops in the Mauritius salt provisions had been issued on alternate days, although fresh meat could have been had at the time actually cheaper. The same system had also been in operation in Gibraltar, although there also, fresh provisions would have been the cheaper of the two. He could show the House, that not only as regarded the comfort and the health of the troops, but also as regarded expenditure, the administration of the Commissariat Department, when unchecked by the Treasury, had been exceedingly injurious. That was no party question; and the statements he had made, concerned equally the government of Lord Liverpool, the government of the Duke of Wellington, and the Reform Government of the year 1830. It was not individuals whom he blamed, but the system, a system which placed the important duty of managing the supplies of provisions in the hands of persons who had no other military business to discharge. The correspondence with the medical officers and with the officers commanding the troops did not pass through their hands; there was a division of authority and of responsibility; and that had led to the melancholy results he had detailed. The effect of the change made in the year 1836—but which change had since been unmade by the right hon. and gallant officer—the effect of that change was to apply a partial remedy at least to the system of which he complained. By the plan of the year 1836 all the accounts with respect to the provisions of the troops, came to the War Office; they were there closely scrutinized; and the result of that scrutiny in the very first year in which these accounts had been sent to the War Office, was, that it was found that an unnecessary expence had been incurred by the faulty arrangements for provisioning the troops. With these facts before them, seeing that for a long series of years, under Governments of the most opposite politics, the management of that business exclusively by the Treasury, had been satisfactory to the degree he had described—seeing that the change which had been made in the year 1836, although not so complete as he could have desired, had supplied a partial remedy, and had enabled the War Office, to impose a considerable check on the prevalence of abuses, he doubted the policy of reverting to the old system. Under the now existing arrangement, the War Office could know nothing of the price of the bread issued at the different stations, and would therefore have no means of checking the expenditure in that respect; and yet, it was only by a knowledge of such details that any improvement in the general management of the Commissariat Department could be effected. He should not, however, trouble the House by any further allusion to those subjects; and he had only, in conclusion, to express his determination to support the original proposition of the right hon. and gallant Officer.

Mr. P. Howard said, that he should on that occasion vote with Her Majesty's Government. He entirely approved of the suggestion of the noble Lord who had preceded him, that battalions of the Guards should be stationed in Gibraltar and in Canada. He believed that such an arrangement would be attended with beneficial effects among the people of Canada, inasmuch as it would be a mark of their connection with the British Empire.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer did not mean to enter into a discussion of the military topics introduced by the noble Lord, the Member for Sunderland. But as the noble Lord had made some rather severe observations upon the Commissariat Department, and upon the arrangement for managing the business of that department, which had of late been introduced, the House would, he hoped, allow him to state the principles upon which that arrangement had been founded. He should, of course, be ready to lay before the House, the Treasury Minutes respecting the arrangement in question; and when the Commissariat Estimates came before the House, he should be prepared to discuss the propriety of the mode of proceeding. The Commissariat Department was strictly a Department of Accounts, and in that respect, it came directly under the control of those who had the management of the financial concerns of the country. He was perfectly confident that the establishment of the Commissariat Department on the footing on which it now stood, had, without impairing the comforts of the troops, contributed to the saving of an enormous amount of public money. That saving was owing, he believed, to the establishment of the connection between the Commissariat Department and the Treasury. The noble Lord objected to the change. But the change was one which appeared to him not to be in any degree improper. It was perfectly true, that, previously to the year 1836, the rating and the pecuniary allowances in lieu of them, had been provided for in the Vote taken for the army extraordinary, which Vote had been administered through the Commissariat Board. In the year 1836, it had been thought proper to abolish altogether the Vote for the Army Extraordinaries, and then it had been deemed advisable to regulate the expenditure of the several departments on two distinct principles—the one was, that the War Office, the Ordnance and the Commissariat, should each take the whole expenditure for its own Department; and the other principle was, that every Department should be held responsible for the performance of the duties that devolved upon it. But that arrangement had not been fully carried out until the present time, when the transfer of the rations from the Army to the Commissariat Department had been carried into effect. There had been at first three distinct Votes taken for rations in the Estimates for the Army Extraordinaries, for the Ordnance, and for the Commissariat; and those three Votes had all been under the control of the Commissariat Board, which had to divide the sums allowed among each of these three Departments. But that arrangement had led to great inconvenience, as it had been found very difficult, if not impossible, to determine the expenses, and to apportion out the allowances to those different departments. It had been found impossible, for instance, accurately to decide upon the amount of the expenses of transport in each case. The present Government had therefore determined on leaving the accounts relative to the expenses for rations to one general department. The consequence was that they had now an uniform system; and that appeared to him to be a far better plan than to separate the Estimates. One consequence of separating them was, that it was impossible to arrive at any accurate calculation as to the amount of those Estimates. There were no other means of coming to any conclusion on that subject than by taking the expenditure of the preceding year. But that was a very fallacious test; whereas, under the present system, much more accurate information was obtained by means of the accounts furnished by the officers of the Commissariat Department, who were acquainted with the prices of provisions in any particular year in each country. He had further to add, that those officers had, as far as he had any means of judging, discharged their duty in a most satisfactory manner. He believed that the system now in operation had contributed both to the purposes of public economy, and to the great end of securing, as far as possible, the comfort of the troops.

Mr. F. T. Baring said, that he should leave it to military authorities to decide whether the present system of managing the business of the Commissariat Department was or was not satisfactory. He was bound, however, to say that he had never met with officers more intelligent and zealous than those of the Commissariat Department. When the charges referred to were made under the head of "Army Extraordinaries," those Estimates contained many things that did not legitimately belong to them. During the war these Extraordinaries were necessary; but, during a time of peace, there were many of the Estimates under that head which would have much better come in other services. One of the first things he did when he came into the Treasury was to remove the item of "Payment for the Church in Canada" from the Army Extraordinaries. He would press upon the Government to give to the Secretary at War the same power of checking which had formerly existed, and then it would not much matter under which head of Estimates any particular Vote might come. The accounts of the Commissariat would be kept all the more correctly for the check. He should like to be informed, if the improved system which had been recommended by a Commission some time ago had been extended to the Ordnance, as it had previously been to the Army and Navy accounts.

Sir J. Hobhouse trusted the gallant Officer opposite would hesitate long before he made any change in the arrangements of 1832. The scale of pensions fixed at that time was settled after the fullest deliberation, with the full consent of Earl Grey's Cabinet. He trusted that no false impression would be allowed to go abroad with respect to the sixpenny pension. When that pension was granted there was still labour left in the soldier sufficient to assist him in gaining his livelihood. Of course, if the gallant Officer found that the former calculations had been made on insufficient data, he would be perfectly justified in making an alteration, but he implored him to hesitate before taking such a step. He had always held that a certain confidence should, in regard to these matters, be reposed in the Ministers of the Crown, and thought that discussions on such subjects should not be encouraged.

Sir H. Hardinge had stated only that it was his intention, in the performance of his duty, to lay before the Government, as soon as he should have collected it, certain information respecting the longevity of pensioners, and various other circumstances having reference to their condition, which by means of officers stationed in various districts, he had been enabled to accomplish in a satisfactory manner. He had carefully abstained from pronouncing any opinion as to whether the warrants ought to be altered or not. Ninety-nine soldiers out of a hundred were discharged because they were no longer able to march with 60lbs on their shoulders. They had no option. He could prove that some of the best soldiers in the Army, who had three marks, would only receive a shilling a day after twenty-seven years service. Out of 27,000 men in the Army in England there were only two men at the present day who had served twenty-eight years.

Dr. Bowring objected to so large a Vote for the Army after a peace which had endured a quarter of a century. He entertained a strong feeling on the subject, and wished to minimise the Army. He would therefore support the amendment of his hon. Friend in favour of reduction.

The Committee divided on Mr. Williams's amendment. Ayes 12; Noes 114: Majority 102.

TENURE OF LAND (IRELAND) COMMISSION.] The Marquess of Clanricarde rose to put some questions to his noble Friend (the Earl of Devon) on the subject of what was generally known as the Landlord and Tenant Commission in Ireland, at the head of which his noble Friend was placed. He did not think that it would be necessary for him to make any Motion on the subject. He was anxious to know to what point the labours of the Commissioners were really directed. On the first occasion when his noble Friend addressed the House on the subject, he understood that the object of the Commission was to obtain information into all the existing relations between Landlord and Tenant. But he did not hear how far it was intended to institute any inquiry into the law as it affected the Tenure of Land. Since that time, a circular letter had appeared in the papers from the Secretary of the Commission in which it was stated, that although the Commissioners had no power to adjudicate upon questions between landlord and tenants, still, that with respect to any matter of contract between landlord and tenant, the Commissioners were ready to hear any particular cases, so far as they might tend to illustrate the practical effects produced under the operation of the existing law as regarded the whole subject. It was with reference to that point that he meant to submit a particular question. Since the time to which he alluded another question had been asked, in answer to which, his noble Friend was represented to have said that he was directing his attention, even while necessarily detained in this country, to an examination of the information which was already before both Houses of Parliament as to the Laws affecting the connection of Landlord and Tenant in Ireland. His noble Friend was further represented to have said, for he (the Marquess of Clanricarde) was not present at the time, that it was proper to adopt that course, because it was necessary that the Commissioners should make themselves thoroughly acquainted with all the circumstances connected with the subject, and with the nature of the existing law, with reference to an alteration of which the responsibility of making suggestions might devolve on them. Now, their Lordships would see that the two answers were different; that they related to two different points;—not unconnected with each other indeed—both points of great importance, and involving matters demanding extensive consideration, and questions of considerable difficulty; but still the one differing from the other. He was much surprised that his noble Friend should have made such a statement; for he hardly knew how his noble Friend could hope to proceed satisfactorily through so extensive and varied a field of inquiry all at once. He must say—and he said it with all respect for the ability of the noble Earl and his Colleagues—that he should regret if they proceeded to a digest of the laws, or to recommend alteration of the laws on the subject of Real Property in Ireland, because it was a subject of great importance, and required the greatest legal knowledge. He might be told that nothing seriously affecting property would be attempted by the Commission. In that case, the Commission was, on the other hand, a delusion on the people; for there had been created in the public mind the most extraordinary and pernicious notions of what the Commission was to do and undo. A great cry had been raised in England as well as in Ireland respecting Fixity of Tenure, and he thought the appointment of this Commission had tended to keep up this cry. It was supposed, that they would proceed in such a manner as must necessarily lead to the reduction of rents. Why, every thinking man, every man of sense, must know, that if the landlord were to give up all claim to rent, and the tenants in possession were to have the land in fee, there would be no diminution of the general misery, and certainly no increase of the national wealth. The Commission had no power to alter the Law of Real Property; and when hopes were held out that by their intervention, the most extraordinary and the most beneficial effects must be produced, it was nothing but a mockery and a delusion. He conceived that the appointment of the Commission was worse than useless; and he thought so, because it kept alive in Ireland the erroneous notion that its labours would have the effect of immediately lowering rents, and that the most beneficial effects must speedily follow. He could imagine nothing more perfectly false or illusory. The appointment of the Commission had also propagated and kept up the idea that exorbitant rents, exacted by the landlords, rendered such a proceeding necessary. To those who were well acquainted with the subject, it was unnecessary to say, that a grosser error could scarcely be imagined. The consequence was, that the newspapers were filled with paragraphs of a most mischievous tendency. In illustration of this he might mention, that early last winter a paragraph originated in a local Irish paper, and went the round of all the other papers, to the effect, that a noble Lord, a Friend of his, had lowered his rents 10*l.* per cent., and the cry was, "Dear me, this arises from the Commission; see what good it has done!" A fortnight after another paragraph appeared, in which the writer expressed his deep regret at finding that the former report was wholly unfounded; and all parties combined in lamenting the circumstance. Why, one would have thought that to be consistent they ought to have rejoiced at it—they ought to have pointed at it as a proof that there was no necessity to lower the rents. Those who knew the noble Lord to whom he alluded—and he had that honour—knew that a better man or a more excellent landlord did not exist, or one that was further from endeavouring to exact exorbitant rents. But, unquestionably this Commission had had the effect of keeping up the notion in Ireland, that many of the ills of that country were to be traced to the grasping conduct of the landlords—that their labours would lower the rents, which was a delusion—and that, if the rents were lowered, the whole mass of the people would become prosperous. But the greatest objection

perhaps, which he had to this Commission was, that it was pleaded in bar of all other measures for the improvement of Ireland. There never was a better opportunity than the present for the Imperial Parliament to turn its attention to Ireland, with the view of affording employment to the great mass of the population. Never was there a moment at which the Government could raise money for that purpose with more advantage than at the present time; and therefore he regretted exceedingly, that instead of adopting really beneficial measures, Ministers had contented themselves with the appointment of a Commission which was more calculated to do mischief than to effect good. One question he wished to ask his noble Friend was, whether the Commissioners contemplated any alteration of the laws which would affect leases or covenants between landlords and tenants entered into previous to the Commission? Another question was, whether the Commissioners intended to make a report upon the proportion which rent bears to the value of land in different parts of Ireland? It was exceedingly difficult to pronounce an opinion upon the question of rent; at the same time, as an Irish landlord, he should be glad if something were said upon that subject, because an opinion prevailed too generally that Irish landlords received exorbitant and disproportioned rents. Such an opinion had arisen from misapprehension with respect to various surveys and valuations which had been made in Ireland for particular purposes, and which, therefore, ought not to be taken as any authority for forming an opinion upon the question of rents, or the rate at which farms should be let. Another question which he should ask his noble Friend was, whether the Commissioners intended to report the whole of the evidence which might be offered? It was, of course, very easy to get up a case when one side only was heard. He was quite sure, however, that his noble Friend and his brother Commissioners would closely examine every case which might be brought before them; not with any view of determining upon the conduct of individuals, but entirely with the view of seeing how the present law permitted or enabled oppression to be practised, or how grievances might be best redressed. But still that was a matter which, in a country like Ireland, ought to be dealt with with extreme delicacy; for, if landlords made statements against tenants and tenants against landlords, and those statements were to be published, the Commission might go on to an interminable length of time without being able to come to any generally satisfactory conclusion. The greatest objection which he had to the Commission was, that it was pleaded in bar to every practical measure for improvement in Ireland, everything must wait until it was seen what the Commission said, but there never could be a better opportunity than the present for introducing these improvements. In that country there was a great population steeped in poverty and idleness—a state of things disgraceful, not to the landlords, but to the Imperial Government. There never was a better opportunity for the Imperial Government—and here he disclaimed all party allusions, he meant not to speak particularly of the present Government,—there never was a moment more advantageous for the Imperial Government to turn its attention to Ireland with a view of finding employment for a great mass of its population—employment or emigration. Of the deplorable condition of the vast mass of population there was ample evidence before their Lordships already, and they needed no more. At the present moment British capitalists did not know what to do with their money; but if Government would encourage them they would readily make advances for the purpose of improving Ireland, and there never was a time at which money could be obtained so easily for that purpose. At this time the greatest efforts ought to be made for the improvement of Ireland. Therefore it was that he regarded this Commission as a barrier to improvement. Besides that, it had given rise to exaggerated notions, which he wished to see dispelled. In some places in Ireland people thought the Commission would settle the question of rents; in others it was supposed that disputes about property would be settled. The questions he had to put were—firstly, whether the Commission contemplated an alteration of the law so as to effect leases and covenants entered into previous to the issuing of the Commission? Secondly, whether they contemplated a report as to the proportion of rent to the value of land? and, thirdly, whether they proposed to report the whole evidence taken before the Commission?

The Earl of Devon said, he felt quite assured that their Lordships would not expect him to answer the first two questions which had been put by the noble

Marquess, who, upon reconsideration, would himself see that it would be unbecoming to do so in the present stage of a Commission which had been issued just about three months. The Commissioners were still busily engaged in pursuing their inquiry, and their Lordships must see that it would not be proper for him, standing alone in that House, to state what the intentions of the Commissioners were with respect to any particular part of the subject upon which they would hereafter have to report. He was ready, however, to give all possible information as to what they were doing in carrying out the instructions given to them, which he was enabled to do by means of certain documents which he held in his hand, and which had been in general circulation in Ireland for some time, so that, in fact, there could be little or no difficulty in ascertaining what course the Commissioners were pursuing. His noble Friend had spoken of the difficulty of the Commission in such a way as to make it appear to be a matter of greater difficulty than it really was. His noble Friend seemed to apprehend that it would become in some way, or that he had stated so, the duty of the Commission to investigate and revise the whole Law of Real Property in Ireland; and his noble Friend thought that he (the Earl of Devon) and his Colleagues were not the most competent persons to deal with such a subject. Why, the Commissioners had nothing to do with the general Law of Real Property; nor did they intend to take it in hand. The Commission entrusted to them was, to inquire "into the state of the Law and Practice in respect to the Occupation of Land in Ireland, and in respect also to the burthens of County Cess and other charges which fall respectively on the landlord and occupying tenant and for reporting as to the amendment, if any; of the existing laws, which, having due regard to the just rights of property, may be calculated to encourage the cultivation of the soil, to extend a better system of agriculture, and to improve the relation between landlord and tenant in that part of our United Kingdom. And further to report to us in writing, under your hands and seals, your observations as to what you shall find touching or concerning the premises upon the said inquiry; and also your opinions as to the amendment, if any, of the existing laws, which, having due regard to the just rights of property, may be calculated to encourage the cultivation of the soil, to extend a better system of agriculture, and to improve the relation between landlord and tenant in Ireland." That was certainly a field wide enough; but it was narrow compared with the investigation of the whole Law of Real Property in Ireland. His noble Friend thought also that the Commission was to inquire into the state of the labouring and peasant part of Ireland, as he called it. It was really the business of the Commission to inquire into the manner of holding lands, a subject particularly affecting tenant farmers, and therefore necessarily involving the classes immediately below them; but that was not the primary object of the Commission. According to the terms of the Commission, the Commissioners were directed to inquire into the laws affecting the temporary occupation of land, and also into the nature of the burthens on land, and the manner in which they were respectively borne by landlords and tenants. He might have been understood by the noble Marquess, perhaps, to convey the notion that the latter was the only object of the Commission; but what he meant was, that it was one part of the duty, and certainly not the whole. The following course the Commissioners had taken was in order to obtain the best information possible:—In the first place, immediately on their arrival in Dublin, he, as Chairman of the Board had caused the following circular letter to be sent to all the Boards of Guardians throughout Ireland, who were mostly landlords or occupying tenants, to each of the Protestant bishops, and to every Roman Catholic bishop,

"Land Commission-office, Castle, Dublin, , 184 .

"I trouble you with this letter on the part of the Commissioners acting under the Queen's Commission of which a copy is herewith sent.

"It is very much our wish to obtain the best evidence upon all parts of the subject into which we are directed to inquire.

"We are desirous, therefore, of obtaining the co-operation of in this respect, and we request that you will do us the favour to point out such individuals as you may think it most desirable for us to examine, and will also point out to us any other sources from which you think that evidence of an authentic nature may be derived.

"If you can give your attention to this matter, and will comply with the request which we now make, you may render material assistance towards attaining the object of our Commission, viz:—a full and fair investigation of all circumstances connected with the tenure and occupation of land in Ireland.

"I have the honour to be, &c.

"Any communication may be addressed to the secretary at this office."

These circulars were answered in the very best spirit from all quarters, some pointing out many, and others but a few, persons competent to become witnesses. A great many representations were made to the Commissioners of cases of individual hardship; and those persons who took great interest in the grievances of the people had communicated with the Commissioners, and in a very good spirit, undertaking to furnish information. A great mass of papers was therefore collected together, and the Commissioners found that the number of witnesses suggested was so large that a selection must be made; and they therefore issued another circular letter to their former correspondents soliciting them to point out the persons who ought to be selected, being those who could be examined with the greatest convenience to themselves and advantage to the objects of the Commission. To the persons who had referred cases of hardship or dispute to the Commissioners a letter was sent reminding them that the Commission had no authority to settle differences between individuals.

"Land Commission Office, Dublin Castle,

"I am directed by the Commissioners to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of

"I am further instructed to remind you that they are not invested with any authority to settle differences which have arisen between individuals.

"Their duty is to make inquiry into the state of the law and the practice in Ireland, with respect to the occupation of land, and with respect to the burthens that affect the owners and occupiers of land respectively; and to consider whether some amendments may not be properly made in the existing laws which may tend to encourage the cultivation of the soil, to extend a better system of agriculture, and to improve the relation between landlord and tenant.

"So far as the investigation of particular cases may tend to assist them towards forming just conclusions upon the matters pointed out by the Commission for inquiry, it will be their duty to enter upon such investigation, although they have no power to make any adjudication as to the rights or claims of individuals.

"Your case will be fully considered, and if it shall appear to the Commissioners that their duty under the Commission requires a further inquiry into it, I shall be instructed to communicate again with you, and to point out the time and place at which an examination of witnesses upon oath may take place.

"I remain, your obedient servant,

"—, Secretary."

That had become necessary to counteract an impression that the Commissioners were sitting to settle grievances; at the same time, they felt they should not do their duty, but would be shutting the door too close if they told persons who imagined they had grievances to state that they were not to be heard. Their duty was to obtain all the information they could, in order to enable them to come to just conclusions upon the matters upon which they were expected to report. There was no more likely way to get an accurate view of the extent to which any of those complaints might be considered to be founded in justice, than by hearing the statements of parties on both sides; and experience had already shown that the number of real cases of grievance had fallen far short of the number which had been so busily bruited about in various ways. The Commission had also issued another circular letter in which the real objects of the Commission were pointed out, in order to disabuse the minds of those who fancied that it had other objects in view with which it could not interfere.

"Land Commission Office, Dublin Castle.

"I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the _____ in answer to the communication addressed to you on the part of the Commissioners on the _____ which will have informed you of the nature of their inquiries, and the assistance they expect from

"The Commissioners desire particularly to point out to you that their duty is to make inquiry into the state of the law, and the practice in Ireland with respect to the occupation of land, and with respect to the burthens that affect the owners and occupiers of land respectively; and to consider whether some amendments may not be properly made in the existing laws, which may tend to encourage the cultivation of the soil, to extend a better system of agriculture, and to improve the relation between landlord and tenant.

"So far as the investigation of particular cases may tend to assist them towards just conclusions upon matters pointed out by the Commission for inquiry, it will be their duty to enter upon such investigation, although they have no power to make any adjudication as to the rights or claims of individuals, or to settle any differences which may have arisen between them.

"As the number of witnesses named to the Commissioners from different parts of Ireland is so great, as to render it impossible for them to examine all, within any reasonable limit as to time; and, as it is the intention of the Commissioners to append to their report to Her Majesty, as is usual in such cases, the whole of the evidence taken on oath before them; they must therefore request your further assistance towards the selection of those whose evidence can be given with most convenience to the parties themselves, and with the greatest advantage to the several objects of the inquiry.

"I shall have the honour to apprise you as soon as possible of the particular day on which the Commissioners hope to visit your neighbourhood.

"I have the honour to be
Your obedient Servant,
"—, Secretary."

No doubt the task of the Commissioners was a difficult one; but they were anxious to perform it properly, to obtain substantial information, and to avoid stirring up angry feelings between disputants. They made their inquiries with as much forbearance towards individuals as they could; but if they were to offer their opinion at any time with respect to particular grievances, they must be permitted to investigate individual cases. He believed that his four Colleagues were as anxious to perform their duty, and would perform it as ably and as honestly, as any four men that could be found; and he had great confidence in the result of their labours. His noble Friend had said that this Commission stood in the way of other measures of improvement for Ireland. How could that Commission prevent any Member of that House or of the other House of Parliament from proposing any measure of relief for the population of Ireland? There was nothing in the tendency of the Commission to interrupt such a proceeding. He thought the Commissioners would be able to point out beneficial alterations in the law affecting Landlord and Tenant, so as to remove present grounds of complaint and dispute. He had every reason to believe, that with the assistance of the four Gentlemen with whom he was associated, such a report would be produced as would be found most useful in the work of legislation. They would give the whole subject their full attention, and in doing so they would not fail to point out wherein the present law was oppressive or ruinous in its practice; nor would they hesitate to state their honest convictions with regard to individual cases of hardship and real grievance. Upon the question of rents, also, they would be equally explicit and sincere, but at present, of course, he could not be expected to offer any opinion whatever. He knew there had been a great deal of exaggeration abroad on this subject, but the best possible way to remove all misapprehension was to collect authentic information from witnesses upon oath, and then lay the evidence before Parliament and the public, in order that the real state of the case might be made known. He thought that the information which the Commission would be able to elicit would be very useful, and could not fail to lead to the most beneficial results.

The Marquess of Clanricarde wished to know whether the reports of the cases which might come under the cognisance of the Commission would be made upon oath? [The Earl of Devon answered in the affirmative.] He knew that when the Commission was first appointed a cry was raised, that though it was instituted for the purpose of inquiring into the relation between Landlord and Tenant, it consisted of five landlords. He (the Marquess of Clanricarde) knew that cry to be without foundation in effect, yet if it were desired that the proceedings of the Commission should have weight out of doors, it might have been advantageous to have had both landlords and tenants upon it. When the term "peasant" was applied in Ireland, it properly comprised the occupiers of land; so that, he took it, an inquiry into the condition of the land, and into the relations between Landlord and Tenant, as far as the land was concerned, meant an inquiry into the condition of the peasantry of the country. He regretted his noble Friend had not thought it consistent with his duty to answer the first question which he (the Marquess of Clanricarde) had put to him.

Subject dropped. House adjourned.

PARLIAMENTARY AGENTS — STANDING ORDERS.] Sir William Heathcote had a petition to present relating to private business, on which it was desirable to have the opinions of Members, and also the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair. It related to the Committee on Petitions, of which he had the honour to be chairman, and complained that the Petitioner had not been heard by his Agent. The Parliamentary Agent did appear before the Committee but he not being acquainted with the case, the petitioner desired to be heard through his solicitor. He, however, was of opinion, and the Committee agreed with him, that a solicitor not being entered as a Parliamentary agent, as every solicitor had power to be if he pleased, was not a person contemplated by the Standing Order, and the Committee refused to hear him. The petitioner was of opinion that he was injured thereby. He had promised the petitioner to obtain a consideration of his case, and said he was sure, that if he had done wrong the House would overturn his decision. He could not, however, as at present advised, say that he was wrong. The Standing Order provided, that parties should be heard by themselves or their Agents and Witnesses. It had been held that a Counsel could not be heard, not being a Parliamentary Agent, and on the same ground the Committee decided that a solicitor could not be heard, unless he complied with the form of the Speaker's order, and enrolled himself as a Parliamentary Agent. The hon. Baronet brought up the petition, which was from Sir Robert Harland, stating that his solicitors were not allowed to be heard in support of his Petition before the Select Committee on Petitions for Private Bills, on the ground that they were not Parliamentary Agents, and praying that his Petition may be referred back to the Committee, and his Solicitor permitted to be heard.

Sir G. Grey observed, that this was a new point. His first impression was, that the refusal to hear a person not being a Parliamentary Agent was right, but he was not sufficiently conversant with the construction of the Standing Orders to call upon the House to acquiesce in that view, unless some gentleman of more experience would state what the practice was, with a view to some general rule being laid down.

Lord G. Somerset said he came to a different conclusion from the hon. Baronet, but thought it quite right that the question should be considered. His impression was, that if the Standing Orders intended to prevent any person from appearing as an agent, except a Parliamentary Agent, the word "Parliamentary" would have been added. He did not see the desirableness of forcing every person who appeared before a Committee to employ a Parliamentary Agent. In a number of cases the parties might, without incurring the expense of a Parliamentary Agent, employ a solicitor; and he was of opinion, that an "Agent" was any person duly authorised, and representing the party, and that the only person excluded would be a retained Counsel.

Mr. Aglionby was sure the House would be happy to have the advantage of the Speaker's opinion, and if the right hon. Gentleman had not formed any decided opinion, he would suggest that it might be well to adjourn the question, in order that inquiry might be made as to the practice; but so far as his experience as a Chairman of Committees on Private Bills extended, he was not aware of a single instance in which the term "Agent" had not been construed "Parliamentary Agent." No doubt, solicitors from the country often attended before Committees, and if they offered a suggestion it would be attended to; but they would not be allowed to advocate the case if any objections were made, or appearing as agent for the party. The noble Lord was mistaken in supposing that either hardship or expense would arise from the necessity of employing Parliamentary Agents; they were better acquainted with the forms of proceeding than a country solicitor could be; and he was persuaded that both time and money would be saved by the employment of Parliamentary Agents.

Mr. Strutt said, he had referred to the petition, and found that his authority as Chairman of a Committee had been quoted as having allowed some solicitor to appear before the Committee on the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway Bill. He could only say, that there had been no decision to that effect, either by him or the Committee; and that if any solicitor had appeared, it was without any knowledge on their part, that he was not a Parliamentary Agent.

The Speaker said, if the House was desirous of hearing his opinion, he was quite ready to state it. In his construction of the Standing Order, he agreed with the hon. Member for Derby. During the time that he had the honour of being Chairman of the Committee on Petitions, an "Agent" had always been considered to be a "Parliamentary Agent;" and he was aware of a case in which a person had applied to be heard as an Agent other than a Parliamentary Agent and had been refused. If the House thought it desirable to adjourn the question, in order to ascertain what was the practice, perhaps it would be well to take that course; but if his opinion was asked, he said decidedly, that "Agent" meant "Parliamentary Agent."

Mr. Estcourt thought the object of the Standing Order was to limit the attendance of Parliamentary Agents. If there were a new edition of the Standing Order, it might be as well to insert the word "Parliamentary;" but he saw no necessity, after the opinion which had been expressed from the Chair, to adjourn the question.

Lord G. Somers maintained, that as a Parliamentary Agent might not understand a particular case, and a country solicitor would, the party was under the necessity of employing both, and was thus put to additional expense.

The Speaker said, it ought to be understood that the Parliamentary Agent was responsible to the House for the Fees, and therefore the House recognised the necessity of employing him. Under these circumstances, he apprehended that no person ought to appear before the House by an Agent except by a Parliamentary Agent.

Subject at an end.

Petition laid on the Table.

[LATE SITTINGS.] Mr W. Williams rose to bring forward the Motion of which he had given notice—namely, that no Motion, if opposed, shall be brought on and discussed in the House after midnight. In bringing forward such a Motion, he disclaimed all intention of interfering with those party discussions which were often prolonged to very unreasonable hours. He wished to confine his Motion to the practical business of the House, feeling convinced that every hon. Member who was in the habit of attending to the business of the House would admit, that the practice of bringing forward important business at a very late hour of the night, was not only most inconvenient to the House, but highly detrimental to the interests of the public. The system pursued in transacting the business of the House was in many respects most objectionable, and great alterations would have to be made before the business could be conducted in a manner beneficial to the interests of the country; but perhaps there was no part of the system which required amendment more than that which related to the late hours at which important business was often proceeded with. Referring to the proceedings of the last Session of Parliament, he found that the House sat 119 nights, and that its sittings after midnight amounted altogether to 105½ hours, being nearly one hour of sitting after midnight for each sitting of the House. He had often seen the necessity for some regulation to guide their proceedings with regard to business of importance brought on after midnight. He had often seen Bills of the utmost importance forced on the consideration of the House at one and two o'clock, and sometimes later, in defiance of every remonstrance against them; and he had also seen millions of the public money voted away at the same unreasonable hour, without any consideration for the interests of the country. At the unreasonable hours of one and two o'clock in the morning, he had seen Gentlemen come down to the House to vote on questions affecting the liberty, the property, and the lives of the people. They came from their balls, from the theatres, the opera, and from their parties, and voted on questions upon which they had no knowledge whatever. Such a state of things ought to be corrected, and he knew of no other means of effecting that correction except by limiting the time of business to something like reasonable hours. He had no objection to the discussions affecting the two great parties in the House being continued after midnight, or even to their being carried on till daylight peeped in at the windows, but he had decided objections to really important business being proceeded with at those unreasonable hours. Nature intended that men, instead of wasting their health and strength at these untimely hours, should refresh themselves in the night with sleep. He readily bore testimony to the constant attendance of both the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Graham) and the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government; they were found in their places at the earliest, as well as the latest hours, and they had given proofs of a physical strength which very much astonished him. He thought they ought to pay a little more attention to their comfort and to their health. They might be able at present to attend to their duties in this House at these unseasonable hours; but if they persevered in doing so, the time must come when their strength would fail them. If by their late sittings they in any way advanced the interests of the country, then it would, no doubt, be highly creditable and commendable for them to devote those late hours to the transaction of public business; but the very reverse was the case. Laws of the greatest public importance were passed whilst most Members on both sides of the House were fast asleep, and while others were so bewildered with drowsiness as hardly to be conscious of what was going on. The noble Lord the Member for London once said, that one effect of the Reform Bill would be, that Members, instead of coming down to the House at midnight to vote upon questions of which they knew nothing, would come down at proper hours and in a state of perfect sobriety and vote on questions which they did understand. The Reform Bill, however, had not fulfilled the prophecy of the noble Lord in this respect. What were the consequences of legislating at these unseasonable hours? How many defects did they not every now and then discover in the Acts passed by the House? Year after year a large portion of the time of the House was consumed in passing Bills, sometimes to amend Acts of a former Session, and sometimes to amend Acts even of the same Session. If Members had only consented to take those Bills into consideration at proper hours, such blunders would not have taken place; but, as it was, they passed Bills which were not intelligible to themselves, and which even the Judges could not understand. Not another country in Europe legislated in a similar manner. In France, Belgium, Holland—in all the states of Germany which possessed a legislative assembly—in the United States of America, and in all the civilised countries of the world which had a popular legislature, a different course was adopted from that pursued by this House of Commons; and not one of them passed their laws at the unseasonable hours at which the British Legislature did. In former and better days a different course was pursued, and business was proceeded with at proper hours. So late as 1702 the House used to meet about mid-day; and in 1714 there was a Standing Order of the House against proceeding with any order of the day after mid-day. He did not mean to say that they could conveniently meet at the present time at that early hour; but he thought that if they commenced business only one hour earlier than they now did, they would do away with the necessity of continuing their sittings to so late an hour as they now did. Towards the close of the last Session the House met at twelve o'clock of the day, and continued to sit till one or two o'clock in the morning; and he had seen business proceeded with at these hours when the whole Members of the Government who were present, and when every Member except the hon. Member for Salford and the Speaker, and the Gentlemen who had Bills to manage were fast asleep. It was at these hours that jobs and bad laws were smuggled through the House. Having seen the evil effects of the system, he begged leave to suggest what he thought would remedy them. He would suggest that they should assimilate the laws of the United Kingdom by making the laws for England, Scotland, and Ireland the same. Every reflecting Statesman would admit, that for our Legislature to pass different laws for the three divisions of the Kingdom was an unwise and injudicious mode of legislating. If the laws of Scotland had been assimilated to those of England at the time of the Union, and if the laws of Ireland had also been assimilated to those of England at the period of the Union, he felt convinced that they would have been enabled to govern the United Kingdom under one law. The hon. Member for Cork, the Representative of all Ireland, had often stated that the great grievance of Ireland was, that the same laws were not given to that country which were given to England. In his opinion, nothing could be more judicious than to make the law for England and for Ireland precisely the same. He had no hesitation in saying that at least one-fourth of the time of the present Session would be consumed in the discussion of two questions—the grievances of Ireland and the Corn Laws. It was evident that the grievances of Ireland must be set at rest, otherwise that country would prove a curse instead of a benefit to England. The present Corn Law could not stand; it must fall; and why should not Ministers meet those two important points at once and settle them? The public wished to see these questions settled, and as they would be forced on the attention of Government, he thought they ought to take them up and settle them at once. By doing so they would save at least a fourth of the time of the Session. He would also recommend Government to bring in such Bills as they intended should pass at an earlier period of the Session, and to discontinue the practice of bringing in a great number of Bills which were never intended to be passed into laws. A great deal of the time of the House had hitherto been expended in the discussion of such Bills, which he thought might easily be saved. There was another point to which he begged to call the attention of Government. Since he had the honour of sitting in that House, he had invariably found that from four to five months were wasted by all manner of idle debates, and on questions in which the people felt no interest. Take, for instance, the Session of 1840, when hon. Gentlemen on the other side consumed pretty nearly the whole of the Session, so far as regarded the public interests, in the discussion of the most worthless motions, yet not altogether worthless to them, for their object was to get hold of place, power, and pelf, and they succeeded. A change of Ministry took place, and though hon. Gentlemen opposite had no doubt derived considerable advantage from the change, the country had gained no advantage whatever. He would just point out the amount of business done at various periods during the last Session. The Session commenced on the 3rd February. In the months of February, March, April, and May, only twenty-six Bills passed that House. In June, ten Bills passed; in July, twenty Bills; but in August, during the first three weeks of that month, forty-four Bills were passed, and sent to the other House of Parliament. It would thus appear that nearly half of the whole number of the Bills passed during the Session were passed in the last three weeks of it. No man could defend such a system. The House of Lords, while the present party were in power, made no scruple of passing the Bills sent up to them at the end of the Session; but every one might recollect that when the late Government pursued a similar course, a certain legal Lord in the other House used to take a review of those Bills, and toss them under the Table in bundles, on the ground that sufficient time had not been afforded for the consideration of them. He hoped that he had stated enough to show that great advantages would result from legislating for the people at proper hours, and he would therefore beg to move "That no motion, if opposed, shall be brought on and discussed in this House after midnight."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer could hardly believe, that the hon. Gentleman was serious; at all events the hon. Gentleman had stated no grounds to justify the House in assenting to it. The hon. Member deprecated the late sittings of the House, because the health of Her Majesty's Government might be seriously affected by their protracted attendance on the debates. On behalf of the Government he begged to tender his best thanks to the hon. Gentleman for the friendly anxiety he had shown upon this subject; but he must take leave to observe, that if there was one circumstance which, from long Parliamentary experience he could say, was more prejudicial than another to that health which the hon. Member was desirous to preserve, it was not so much the sitting to discuss matters at a late hour of the night, as being compelled to hear long speeches whether at a late or an early hour, which had no material reference to the business in hand. When an hon. Gentleman got up to discuss the question, whether new and opposed motions should be brought on after midnight, and treated them with dissertations on the Corn Laws, Irish affairs, and a variety of other irrelevant topics, he must fairly admit, although at that early hour—before the ordinary hour of refreshment—it did produce a state of weariness and fatigue greater than a more serious attention to the future real business of the day. If the House did do business at late hours of the night, it was owing to the very circumstance that the earlier parts of the evening were not so profitably occupied as they might be; and if they were to cut themselves off from the only resource which remained of doing business in cases of necessity, even at late hours, there would be no opportunity left of transacting public business at all. The hon. Gentleman had adopted rather an extraordinary mode of proving their inattention to business in that House, when he said, that in the course of the first three months of last Session only twenty-six bills had been passed, while towards the end of the Session, they passed a considerably greater number. The object was, that Bills should be well digested considered, and discussed: and if they were disposed of hastily at the beginning of the Session, there would be no opportunity of learning the sentiments of their constituents and the public in regard to them. It was, therefore, in this view alone a matter of some importance that it was competent to hon. Members to discuss matters brought forward more satisfactorily, by postponing the ultimate passing of Bills till a late period of the Session. If the hon. Member would take the trouble of looking through the Votes of the House he would find, that the subjects which occupied the House in debate after twelve o'clock where those commenced before that hour, and continued in order that a decision might be come to without the necessity of an adjourned debate. Speaking generally, he would find that after twelve o'clock all business not previously discussed, and which Members were desirous of discussing, was put off to meet the general convenience. There might undoubtedly be occasions when great public interests required that measures should be introduced at any hour, however late, and he did not think that the House, acting on the principle of doing what was most for the benefit of the community, would consent by a specific resolution, to debar themselves from entering upon their consideration. Upon the whole, therefore, he must say, as long as they had the good fortune of having among them the hon. Member for Salford, who exercised his functions with an amenity of manner and an intelligent consideration for the business of the country which entitled him to the highest praise, the hon. Member for Coventry might be quite satisfied to leave the matter to his discretion and good sense.

Mr. Brotherton supposed his hon. Friend, seeing that little success had attended his Motion when introduced by him on former occasions, had now come forward with his powerful aid, in the hope of having a larger majority, and he hoped such would be the case. He certainly supported the Motion with considerable pleasure, because he felt, if it were adopted, it would be exceedingly useful. If they were to adjourn at an earlier period it would facilitate the business of the House, and conduce to the health and comfort of Members, while in no way could it operate prejudicially to the public interests. He was reminded on this occasion of a Message sent down to that House by Queen Elisabeth, recommending the Members of that House not to consume so much time in making long speeches and Motions; and if a similar message should come down from our beloved Queen he should be very happy to join in voting an Address of Thanks to Her Majesty. He was sure that the speeches of hon. Gentlemen might be very much curtailed. He was not favourable to bringing forward any useless motions, he wished as much as possible to get on with the business, and he conceived that the efforts he had made with reference to the adjournment of the House had had the effect, not of retarding, but facilitating the public business. They often praised the wisdom of their ancestors, and certainly they had the wisdom to legislate in the day-time. Why should not we follow their example? There was one mode of accomplishing the end in view which he had no objection to append to the Motion of his hon. Friend. It was well known that the House could not adjourn till four o'clock in the afternoon. Their ancestors assembling at seven or eight o'clock in the morning were determined the House should not continue to sit after four o'clock P.M., unless forty Members were present, and a rule was made, that unless that number were present at that hour the House should stand adjourned. In order to keep within the clear rule, he would suggest that after midnight the House should not continue to sit unless 80 Members were present, and that would be a good security. At the same time he honestly confessed, that he thought it perfectly hopeless to expect to pass a resolution like that of his hon. Friend in that House; but he did feel gratified at the general concurrence which prevailed that they should as nearly as possible adjourn at twelve o'clock. Although he had not succeeded to the extent of his wishes, yet he rejoiced in the general opinion which had now gained so much ground, that, unless engaged in business of very particular importance, no obstruction would be made to adjournment at that hour. He certainly wished to see this Motion carried; but if it was not, while he had the honour of a seat in that House, he should always endeavour to press upon it the importance of adjourning at or before midnight.

The House divided:—Ayes 16; Noes 146: Majority 130.

THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.] Mr. Tufnell, having presented a Petition very numerously signed, from the parish of Marylebone, complaining of the heavy burthen to which that parish is subjected for the maintenance of the New Police, and praying for inquiry, proceeded to bring forward the Motion of which he had given notice, for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the cost of the Metropolitan Police Force, and the manner in which the sums levied as Police Rate, are assessed on the different parishes within the Metropolitan Police District. The hon. Member proceeded to state that the additional burthen 'to which many of the metropolitan parishes had been subjected under the New Police Act was contrary to the understanding upon which that Act had been passed, and was unaccompanied by any corresponding advantage. It was proper that he should state in the outset, that in bringing forward this Motion it was not his intention to make any charge against the efficiency or the conduct of the New Police Force. It could not, however, be denied that an impression had gone abroad, that in many instances great negligence, and, in some cases, unfairness, had been evinced by Magistrates in dealing with those cases in which policemen were charged with violating their duty. It was generally considered that when a person who was paid to preserve the peace violated it, the crime was greater in him than in another person, and that his punishment should be more severe; but it was felt that great negligence had been exhibited by Magistrates when instances of infringement of duty, accompanied by gross insult, had been brought before them. Those, however, were matters into which he had no desire to enter, neither was it his intention to complain of the central system by which the Police Force was conducted; but he objected, and the petitioners objected, that the understanding upon which the New Police Act was passed had not been carried out. It could not be denied, that the system of watch and police that existed previous to 1829, in many of the metropolitan parishes, was most inefficient; and, to remedy the evil, the Committee of 1828 recommended the adoption of the central system, but on the understanding that the change should not entail any additional expense on the parishes; and they further stated in their report that as the protection afforded by the Police was local, the charge ought to be local also, and so far as the system contributed to local protection, he agreed it ought to be maintained by a local charge; but, instead of that, a uniform rate of assessment on all the metropolitan parishes had been imposed, without reference to their wants; and the consequence was, that a greatly increased expense had been entailed on many parishes, without any compensating benefit. The right hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel) in introducing the Bill of 1829, founded on the Report to which he had referred, had distinctly stated, "that with regard to the tax to be imposed under that Bill, it would be less than the old watch rate." But so far from that being the case, it would be found that in many of the parishes most favourable to the operation of the law, the rate, as compared with the old watch-rate, had been doubled, while the number of Police had been decreased, and no additional security given to person or property. In the parish of Marylebone the sum levied under the old watch-rate had been on the average of ten years 9,500*l.*, and the number of men employed had been 256. The rate levied in the same parish for the New Police was 20,000*l.*, and the number of men employed 211. In this parish nothing like a corresponding advantage had been given; for the Police in Marylebone, under the old system, was justly considered a model as regarded its efficiency for the protection of life and property, and there was no proof of any abuse in its management. Mr. Moreton Dyer and Sir R. Birnie, in their evidence before the Committee of 1828, had borne valuable testimony in favour of that efficiency; and he was borne out in the assertion that in that particular parish, and in dealing with a subject of this kind, it was more satisfactory to adduce instances than to deal in general remarks. Though the expense to the parishioners had been doubled, no additional security to life or property had been afforded by the substitution of the New Police for the old Parochial system. He held that the New Police Tax should be regulated fairly, according to the requirements of the several parishes. They were bound, in altering any system of local government, to respect local rights, and to take care that no additional burthens were imposed, without the consent of the several parishes which would be affected by the change. That course had been adopted in reference to the New Poor Law, for under that Act every parish bore only its fair proportion of the general expense, and gave its consent to the imposition of the rate by its representatives; but under the New Police Act, the expense had been increased year after year, till in some parishes it had been doubled, without any reference to the wants or feelings of the parishioners. Another objection was, that the great burthen of the police-rate fell upon those who were least able to bear it. It was true, that since the introduction of the system two Committees had been appointed to inquire into and report upon its operation, and he admitted that the decisions of both those Committees had been favourable to the system. But he contended that that important feature of the case—the unequal pressure of the tax—had not been brought forward. The City had refused, and he thought very wisely, to come within the central system in regard to the Police, and had established an improved system of their own. He understood that under the system as conducted by Mr. Harvey, the City Commissioner, the total cost for each man employed, from superintendent to private constable, was 76*l.* per head. While in the parish of Marylebone the cost per head for each man employed, superintendent to private constable, was 112*l.* per head. Another point he had to complain of, and which he proposed should be investigated by the Committee, was the unequal rate of assessment in various parishes. If the Act which made the nett annual value the rateable value had been in general operation, the mischief in this respect would have been avoided; but that system had been in a great measure inoperative, in consequence of the want of power to enforce it. He repeated, that he had no fault to find with the conduct of the Police Commissioners, or to allege that property and person were not protected under the new system. All he required was, that the condition under which the act had been originally brought in, and the system introduced should be conformed to. He would submit the Motion in the terms he had stated.

Mr. M. Sutton should not feel it his duty to trouble the House in stating his reasons for opposing the Motion. But before going further he must express the satisfaction he felt, that the hon. Member, in bringing forward his Motion, had disclaimed all intention of casting any imputation on the conduct of the Commissioners or the Police, at the same time he might be allowed to say, that it would have been as well if the hon. Member had abstained from making charges against the Police Magistrates, which they were not there to answer. With regard to the first branch of the proposed inquiry—the cost of the Police Force—the hon. Member must be aware that an annual return was laid before the House, containing the whole of the information upon that point which any Committee of Inquiry could hope to obtain. The hon. Member could not, therefore, found his Motion on the ignorance of this House—neither had he supported it by any charge or accusation against the force itself. If the hon. Member had taken that course, he (Mr. M. Sutton) should have been prepared to show that those charges and accusations were not founded in fact. With regard to the question of cost, the hon. Gentleman might have referred to the report of the Committee of 1834, which, after a most lengthened investigation, had come to the most satisfactory conclusions on that point. He apprehended that the petition which had been presented by the hon. Member from the parishioners of Marylebone (who, on that occasion, appeared to have preferred entrusting the hon. Member with the duty, rather than either of their own Members), was substantially the same as one of which he (Mr. M. Sutton) held a copy in his hand. And he found it therein stated, that before the passing of the Act of 1829, the parish of Marylebone had a local act of their own, which was sufficient to secure property and person; and that since the introduction of the New Police system, the cost of watching the parish had been doubled, while the number of persons appointed to watch had been decreased. But the whole principle of the New Police Act went on the supposition (which was a correct one) that the efficiency of a Police Force was not in its providing a sufficient watch within the limits of any particular parish or borough alone, but in its power of providing for the security of person and property equally in the neighbouring localities. And he held that the security of person and property in Marylebone was maintained, not by the number of men employed there to preserve the peace alone, but more so by the means adopted to prevent outrages against person and property in the other metropolitan boroughs. But, in regard to the cost, if the hon. Gentleman took the cost of the Police Force in Marylebone, and divided the gross sum by the number of Police officers commonly on duty, no doubt his calculation of 112*l.* per head was correct. But the hon. Member should recollect that the number of policemen might, and would be, if necessary, increased at any moment. If the authorities of Marylebone parish applied for an increase, it would be granted; and, without any application from the parish itself, if the Superintendent of the Force were to report that more policemen were required, they would be at once sent: and this was a fair point of consideration in calculating the amount of the expense as the hon. Gentleman had done. It was true the hon. Gentleman had referred to the speech of the right hon. Baronet, and had stated, as had also the petitioners, that the expense of the New Police had increased in Marylebone, and was gradually increasing. But was the hon. Gentleman aware, that since the establishment of the Force, there had been an increase of 48,785 new houses in the borough, forming 785 new streets, roads, and squares; and an increase of 110 additional miles in distance, to be watched? Surely the hon. Member could not suppose that that increase of property could be watched at the same cost as the old watch, which had so much less to take care of. The hon. Gentleman had referred to the Committee of 1828, and had grounded his Motion on the Report of that Committee; but he had not referred to the subsequent Committee of 1834, which had been appointed to investigate the subject. That Committee had been first appointed in 1832, but the inquiry was so stringently gone into, that it was thought necessary to re-appoint it in 1834, and no man could have read the Report of that Committee without seeing that no single ground of complaint had escaped them; and he was quite sure that no Member of that Committee would concur in the present Motion. He did not deny the assertion that the Marylebone police, as it existed previous to 1829, was efficient, and that it was superior to any other Police of the time in the metropolis. He did not deny, that so far as the parish of Marylebone was concerned, that Police was sufficient for all the purposes of watching, and for securing person and property; but though that was the case at a period when all the other parts of the metropolis were most inefficiently watched, it was by no means certain that a similar system of Police would be equally efficient now. Thousands of thieves, driven out of Marylebone, could formerly find a refuge in other parts of London, but now he apprehended the superior efficiency of the metropolitan system of Police in other districts, would make Marylebone rather an uncomfortable locality to reside in if the old watch still existed there. The hon. Member was not correct in saying that the question of assessment had not been considered by the Committee. If the hon. Member would refer to the Report of the Committee of 1834, he would find the subject had been considered and reported upon. The only ground which the hon. Member could have for moving for a Committee, was the alleged inequality between the assessment of Marylebone and that of other parishes. Now, he submitted that that could be in reality no ground for the institution of a Committee of this House, for the only thing required, if such was the case, was an application by the parish of Marylebone to the Magistrates, who had the power of remedying the grievance.

Mr. Brotherton could give no opinion as to the inequality of the assessment, but he could as to its injustice. He objected to the country at large paying one-fourth share of the expenses of the Metropolitan Police force; and he hoped that a Committee would be appointed, and an opportunity given for a recommendation to the effect, that the country should be relieved of all the expense of the Metropolitan Police Force.

Mr. Tufnell would not press his Motion, but he hoped that some measure would be taken to remove the objections of which he had complained. With respect to the observation of the hon. Member for Salford, he would remind him that the country at large owed much to the Metropolitan Police Force.

DIVISION OF PARISHES (SCOTLAND).]
The Lord Advocate moved for leave to bring in a Bill "to Facilitate the Disjoining or Dividing of Extensive or Populous Parishes, and the Erecting of New Parishes, in Scotland." The general object he had in view in proposing to introduce the Bill was to remove certain defects in the existing law relating to the Division of Parishes in Scotland. As the law stood at present, extensive parishes might be divided by the authority of the Court, but not unless a large majority of the heritors consented. The consent of a majority of three-fourths of the heritors was required. This appeared to him to be rather unreasonable, as it was in the power of one-fourth of the heritors of a Parish to prevent its division. He proposed, therefore, to allow the proceedings for the division of a Parish to go on upon the assent of a clear majority of heritors. There was another defect in the law as at present existing, inasmuch as no power was given for the division of a Parish, unless it was too large in territorial extent. He proposed to make the extent of population also a ground for dismemberment. By the existing law, also, there was no power given to the Court of erecting separate parishes, even when the expense of building the Church and endowing the clergyman was provided for by private individuals, unless by the consent of the heritors. Now as it did not appear that there was in cases of this kind any interference with the civil rights of the heritors, in having parishes subdivided and established merely with a view to religious purposes, and when the funds were provided by private persons, he proposed to give to the Court the power of constituting parishes, quoad spiritualia in the cases in which the endowments had been made by private individuals. The Court, would, however, always hear reasonable objections to propositions of the kind. These were the leading features of the Measure, which he would at once move for leave to bring in.

Leave given.

House adjourned at a quarter before seven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, Wednesday, March 6, 1844.

of Relations between the Church and Seminaries of Learning.—From St. Margaret's, and St. John the Evangelist, Westminster, against Poor Law Amendment Bill.

COUNTY CORONERS BILL.] House in Committee on the County Coroners Bill.

Upon Clause 20, "The Coroner to receive in addition to 9d. per mile,"

Mr. Craven Berkeley opposed it. The Clause allowed 1s. a mile for travelling, which he thought excessive.

Mr. Pakington defended the Clause, on the ground that the sum of 9d. per mile now paid was insufficient to cover travelling expenses.

Mr. Maclean also supported it, and contended that Coroners were considerable losers by their travelling, the expenses of which the present allowances did not cover.

The Committee divided on the question that the blank be filled up with "three pence":—Ayes 93; Noes 34:—Majority 59.

ATHLONE ELECTION.] Mr. Pakington said, that he was desired by the Select Committee upon the Athlone Election to report that Mr. Collett had been found by it to be duly elected. He would move that the minutes of the proceedings before the Committee on the Athlone Election should be laid upon the Table of the House on the 20th inst.; and that the order for the attendance of Mark Spring before the Committee be ready to be discharged.

LAWS FOR SCOTLAND.] Mr. Wallace wished to put a question to the Lord Advocate for Scotland. It was generally understood, that the learned Lord intended, in the course of the present Session, to introduce three different propositions to the notice of the House; the first relating to the transference of heritable property in Scotland; the second as to workmen's wages; and the third as to the truck system in that country. To prevent the uncertainty which must be felt by the public on the subject, he begged to ask the learned Lord if he was prepared to bring in bills upon each or any of those propositions?

The Lord Advocate said, that as to the first subject, that of heritable rights, he hoped soon to have a measure brought before the Legislature with regard to it. As to workmen's wages and the truck system in Scotland, he was not aware how it could have been ascertained that he was preparing any measures with regard to them. His attention had been directed to one of those subjects, viz., that of wages, but he had found great difficulty with regard to it, and although he had not altogether abandoned the idea, yet he could not undertake to say that any measure would be brought forward by him with regard to it. The truck system he had not considered, except as it was connected with other subjects. It was also a question of great difficulty, like that of workmen's wages.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH'S PROCLAMATION — NEWSPAPER DESPATCH.] Mr. Macaulay wished to ask a question of the right hon. Baronet at the head of Her Majesty's Government as to a Proclamation which he had that day read in The Times newspaper, stated to have been put forth by the Governor General of India, as to the conquest of Gwalior; which recited what had passed as having occurred upon a treaty annulled so long ago as the year 1805. He wished to ask the right hon. Baronet if the Proclamation was genuine?

Sir R. Peel said, that for what he knew on the subject, he was indebted to the courtesy of the editor of The Times. The Times newspaper had the means of anticipating Government in the receipt of the overland despatches. He had no other information on the subject than what he derived through that newspaper, but after the Government despatches had arrived he would give all the explanation necessary.

COMMERCE WITH FRANCE.] Mr. Labouchere begged to put a question to the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government. He had observed a report of a speech of M. Guizot, the French Minister for Foreign Affairs, from which it would appear, unless the speech was incorrectly reported, that M. Guizot considered the commercial negotiations between France and this country completely at an end. In order to satisfy the French Chambers, M. Guizot was represented to have stated that instead of relaxing the duties upon foreign produce imported into France, he had gone on increasing them. It was therefore clear, if M. Guizot was not misrepresented, that the French Ministry considered the negotiations with this country completely at an end. If that were the case, he was sure, from the language he had heard from the right hon. Gentleman as to the evil consequences of the public mind being left in uncertainty on such subjects, that he would take some means of imparting the same intelligence to the public of this country as had been communicated to the French people. The question which he wished to put was, as what had come to his knowledge might be mere rumour, whether the right hon. Baronet was prepared to confirm the accounts as the language of M. Guizot, and that the negotiations between this country and France with respect to their commercial relations were at an end?

Sir R. Peel said, he had referred to that which he considered the most authentic statement, namely, that contained in The Moniteur, of the speech of M. Guizot. As the right hon. Gentleman was aware there must be two voluntary contracting parties to a treaty of commerce, whatever impediments had occurred in the way of the conclusion of the treaty, he could assure the right hon. Gentleman they had not been occasioned by the Government of this country. Of course the signature of a treaty was entirely at the discretion of either party, which in this case was the French Government. He did not know exactly to what report the right hon. Gentleman referred, but on looking to the most authentic source, The Moniteur, he (Sir Robert Peel) had no doubt, that in the opinion of the French Government there was no prospect of the negotiations being brought to a successful conclusion. He was now speaking of a formal convention; he said nothing on other subjects, but looking at what had passed, and at the speech of M. Guizot, he could have no doubt whatever, that in the opinion of the French Government, there was no probability of a reciprocal reduction of duties by means of actual treaty.

QUARTER SESSIONS.] Mr. Pakington rose to bring forward the Motion on the periods for holding Quarter Sessions in cities and boroughs, of which he had given notice. There were two clauses in the Municipal Reform Act to which he was desirous of calling the attention of the House. The 105th and the 106th sections of that Act gave to the Recorders of boroughs and others power to cause the Sessions to be adjourned without restriction. The circumstance to which he wished to call the attention of the House was the power of adjournment exercised by Recorders. He felt it his duty to rest his Motion on the manner in which that power had been exercised by the Gentleman who held the situation of Recorder for the city of Worcester. He felt satisfaction in the knowledge that the Recorder for Worcester had placed his case in the hands of the hon. Gentleman opposite. He would state to that hon. Gentleman that he had no wish to make a charge against the Recorder for Worcester, but he was bound to state what was necessary for the support of his case. That learned Gentleman had exercised the power he possessed of adjourning the Quarter Sessions without consideration or reflection. He said so, though he had understood in other respects that that Gentleman had discharged his duties as Recorder with ability and discretion. The first case of adjournment to which he would allude occurred at the Easter Sessions of 1838. That Sessions had been fixed for the 2nd of April; the usual notices were given, and these were not in any manner reversed. That continued till the last day, and on that day, when the Jury were assembled and prepared to proceed to business, the Mayor announced that it was not the Recorder's intention to hold the Sessions on that day. There were two prisoners in gaol on the 2nd of April whose trial was thus postponed till the 14th of May, and they were then acquitted. If they had been tried on the 2nd of April, their punishment would not have exceeded six weeks. He acquitted the Recorder of any bad intention, but he could not conceive greater injustice. The next case to which he would refer was with regard to the Sessions of Midsummer, 1842. The 27th of May was the day appointed for holding the Sessions, but on that day the Court was informed that the Recorder could not attend until the 27th of June. There were then eight prisoners in gaol, of whom two were subsequently acquitted, and three condemned to something like a month's imprisonment. The third case occurred last Michaelmas, when the Sessions were fixed for the 16th of October; and, when all the parties who had anything to do at them were prepared, it was found that the Recorder could not attend, and the Sessions were adjourned to the 31st of that month. This was an inconvenience to which the suitors in that Court ought not to be subjected. He knew it was said, that the learned Recorder had other public duties to attend to at the Sudbury Commission, but he would contend that his duties as a Judge administering the law were paramount to all others, and should have precedence. The hon. Member mentioned two other cases in which adjournments took place, but they were not distinctly heard in the gallery; but such cases of adjournments to suit the convenience of Recorders were not, he said, confined to Worcoaster. There were many other towns and boroughs in which they were not of unfrequent occurrences, and it was on that ground that he considered some general Measure necessary on the subject, for he thought some restriction should be placed on this arbitrary and irresponsible power. It was of serious consequence that poor persons who had business at these Sessions should not be subjected to unnecessary, and therefore arbitrary delays, and this applied with still greater force to persons brought before them for trial. The hon. Member concluded by moving for "leave to bring in a Bill to regulate the periods for holding Quarter Sessions in cities and boroughs."

Mr. Hawes should feel it his duty to oppose the Bill, as it was intended as a general measure applying to all cities and boroughs. With respect to the charges brought against his learned Friend, the Recorder of Worcester, he would say, that in the course of seven years, up to 1844, there had been only three adjournments. The first was occasioned by the fact, that the appointment of the learned Gentleman had not been completed on the day fixed for holding the Sessions, so that it was impossible he could hold them on that day. On the second occasion there was only one prisoner to try, and he was out on bail, so that he felt justified in adjourning the Court. On the third occasion he was delayed by the fact that the Sudbury Commission, on which he was engaged, had occupied a longer time than was expected. If the hon. Member (Mr. Pakington) would bind down Recorders to hold their Sessions on fixed days, he must be content to have one of two alternatives—he must either have legal advice at those Sessions of inferior character, or he must pay high salaries to men of superior abilities, to make it worth their while to attend on any fixed days. Under such circumstances, he thought it would be much the better course to leave the appointment of the time for Sessions in towns to the Recorders. He did not think the case stated by the hon. Member sufficient to justify his Motion for so sweeping a Measure as that with which he had concluded.

Sir J. Graham admitted, that under the Municipal Act the power of adjourning Sessions was quite unlimited, and that the power of appointing Sessions was also left unrestricted, and it was desirable to limit those powers to a considerable extent. He was most anxious that the administration of criminal justice should be prompt and at stated periods; still it was of primary importance that this jurisprudence should be exercised by competent Judges before an independent Bar. Reserving himself on questions of detail, he was quite prepared to assent to the introduction of the Bill.—Leave given.

RELATIONS WITH THE BRAZILS.] Mr. Labouchere had undertaken to invite the consideration of the House to the present state and the future prospects of the Commercial Relations with the Brazils. Although he was deeply sensible how little able he was to do justice to such a subject, yet he was sure that there was no Member of that House who was either aware of the magnitude of the interests that were involved, or of the immense anxiety of the manufacturing and mercantile classes that was directed towards it, who would say that this was an improper subject for the consideration and deliberation of that House. Into many questions connected with this subject he was relieved from the necessity of entering at any length, because he did not conceive that there was any difference of opinion respecting them among any considerable number of the Members of that House. It was not necessary for him to prove at any length, how great was the importance of the commercial relations of this country with the Empire of the Brazils. If there were a country in the world that seemed formed by nature to cultivate with this country advantageous and extensive commercial relations, that country was the Brazils. Its great extent, inferior to no empire on the globe—its almost unrivalled fertility—its admirable climate—the mighty rivers by which it was watered—its population, which amounted to upwards of 7,000,000—together with the condition and habits of the population, producing an abundance of articles which could not be produced in this country—possessing no manufactures and hardly any shipping—all these circumstances showed that England and Brazil were two countries formed by nature to have extensive and advantageous commercial relations with each other. He would begin by stating to the House what was the present state of our trade with the Brazils. Our trade with the Brazils was at present regulated by a commercial treaty, concluded between the two countries in 1827. That treaty was one eminently favourable to this country.

Brazil engaged to take our manufactures and produce under this treaty at a maximum duty of 15 per cent. ad valorem, and we were free, on the other hand, to impose any duties we pleased on the produce of the Brazils. He would state to the House what were the duties we imposed on the great staple articles of Brazilian commerce, in return for the very favourable terms on which that empire agreed to receive our manufactures. So far as he could collect from the best statistical accounts he had been able to obtain, and on which he could place most reliance, the exports from Brazil amounted annually in value to about 7,200,000*l.* They might be divided into three classes. Coffee, which was the article of the greatest importance, exported annually from Brazil, represented the value of about 3,000,000*l.*; the article of sugar, the next in importance, about 1,200,000*l.* per annum; the remaining 3,000,000*l.* being made up of cotton-wool, tobacco, hides, gold, and a variety of other articles. The three most important articles of Brazilian produce were coffee, sugar, and cotton-wool. With regard to sugar, we placed on it a duty which, in point of fact, was prohibitory, and it was intended to be prohibitory. With reference to this important product of a country which placed a maximum duty of only 15 per cent. ad valorem on articles of British commerce, we imposed a duty of 300 per cent. ad valorem on the price of sugar when landed on our shores. On coffee we placed a duty not quite prohibitory, but still a very heavy and onerous duty—not less than 200 per cent. ad valorem. In truth, the only important article of Brazilian produce that we allowed to come into our markets on reasonable terms was cotton wool. We admitted cotton wool at a moderate duty, but this was the only article we treated in that manner. This state of things had produced a result which could not be astonishing to any one who had done him the honour of listening to the statement he had made. The result was, that while we exported directly to Brazil a very great amount of British produce and manufactures, we imported directly and introduced into consumption a very small amount in value of the produce of Brazil in return. The value of our export trade to Brazil might be said in common years to average about 2,500,000*l.* It had varied a little during the last few years, last year it rallied a little; but he was sorry to say it was, on the whole, rather a struggling and declining, than a prosperous trade, for reasons to which he would presently advert; but still it was a very important trade. It attained its maximum in 1836, when we exported to Brazil no less than 3,000,000*l.* in value of British manufactures. Since that it had averaged rather above than under 2,500,000*l.*; in 1842 it dropped to 1,766,000*l.*, but rallied a little last year, when it was about 2,140,000*l.* This was the extent of our exports to Brazil. The quantity of Brazilian produce imported directly into this country for consumption amounted to a very small sum in comparison with what we exported. Our annual imports that we introduced into the consumption of this country could not be reckoned in value at much more than between 400,000*l.* and 500,000*l.* This was a very anomalous and unnatural state of things, and must obviously expose our merchants and manufacturers to very great inconvenience and disadvantage when compared with their rivals in the Brazilian markets, because the British merchants were not able in return for their goods to procure Brazilian freights for introduction into this country. The consequence was, that we were driven to an indirect course of trade. A British ship carrying out from Liverpool or London a cargo of British manufactures to a port in the Brazils could not find a cargo to be brought back to be consumed in England, and was obliged therefore to take its cargo, sugar or coffee, to some third country, and had to compete on the voyage to that country with ships returning home direct, and able to navigate cheaper than the British ship could do. But the evil did not stop here. The British ship being obliged to return from that foreign country in ballast, lost not only all the extra time, but the wages of the seamen, and thus the shipping interest incurred, both directly and indirectly, the most serious injury. The effects of this state of things were so obvious that he did not think it necessary to prove them by documentary evidence at any length. There were, however, one or two statements which he was desirous of reading to the House. The first occurred in the evidence of Mr. Moore, a respectable Brazilian merchant, before the Import Duties Committee,

“ Can you state what number of vessels go direct from this country to Brazil with manufactures in the course of the year?—I can state the number of vessels and tonnage from Liverpool to the three principal ports of Rio, Pernambuco, and Bahia. In 1839, to Rio Janeiro fifty-two vessels, tonnage 13,965; to Bahia twenty-eight vessels, tonnage 7,203; to Pernambuco thirty vessels, 7,023 tons. Of those vessels, going there with British manufactures, how many returned to this country?—In 1838, out of forty-eight vessels to Rio Janeiro, not one returned to Liverpool. In loading from Brazil to the Continent of Europe, are your ships in competition with foreign ships to any extent, as to the rate of freight?—Yes; the foreign vessels which navigate at less expense, are going home, and, consequently, they can carry at a lower freight than British vessels can. A British vessel going to the Channel for orders, and then proceeding to the Continent, has to return home in ballast before she can reload to go back to Brazil. The foreign vessels go to their own ports, and navigate at much less expense."

It was stated that, in 1838, not one vessel returned to this country from Brazil which was not in ballast. He would also take the liberty of reading an extract from a petition lately presented to the House from the shipowners and merchants of Liverpool, which put the point in a very striking and forcible light. They said:

"That, in proof of their allegation, that the interest of the British shipowner is very prejudicially affected by the prohibitory duty on foreign sugar, your petitioners further state, that from a return of the export trade of Rio de Janeiro, it appears that, out of 114 British vessels cleared from that port in 1842, laden with sugar and coffee, only twenty-one were enabled to return to the United Kingdom direct, the remaining ninety-three vessels being destined for Hamburg, Trieste, Antwerp, and elsewhere, in direct competition with the ships of all nations, and at considerable disadvantage, having in most cases to return home from the continental ports in ballast, or otherwise unprofitably employed."

That petition was signed by some of the noble Lord's (Viscount Sandon) most influential supporters. He hoped that those hon. Gentlemen who were in the habit of defending the shipping interest of the country would take these facts into their serious consideration. Of this he was, however, perfectly satisfied, that no interest in the country would be more benefited by a liberal system of commercial policy than the shipping interest. He was satisfied, too, that that interest, although they had heretofore opposed a liberal commercial intercourse with other nations, were now becoming alive to this truth, that there was no safety for them except in the adoption of such a course of policy as he had endeavoured to describe. He might also advert to the effect which the present system had upon the rate of exchange between the Brazils and this country. He would not do so at any length, for it was a dry subject, but any person connected with the trade must see that taking out cargoes on one side, and returning empty on the other, must have a most prejudicial and injurious effect on the rate of exchange between the two countries, and upon our merchants standing in the relation of debtor and creditor with parties in Brazil, who suffered a great loss from a want of direct returns to this country. But, notwithstanding the disadvantages under which this country laboured, from the cheapness of our goods, and the intelligence of our merchants and manufacturers—from a circumstance also which he really believed gave this country a greater advantage than any other in conducting trade, especially with an empire circumstanced like Brazil,—he meant the high character of our great commercial firms and the respect which the British name and character carried with them throughout the world,—from these circumstances our Brazilian trade had gallantly struggled with all these difficulties. It was still very large and important. But we were closely pressed upon by our foreign rivals. We had to encounter the rivalry of the United States of America, of France, of Switzerland, and Germany. He was unwilling to trouble the House with long statistical details, but he had no doubt of the fact, that foreign countries were gradually gaining ground upon us in the Brazilian markets. With respect to all those countries he had not accurate statistical returns; but with regard to France he had access to documents published by the French Government, which did prove that while our commerce had not been increasing with Brazil, French commerce with that empire had within the last few years been growing in a very extended ratio. In 1837 the exports from France to Brazil were 12,504,000 francs; in 1840 the trade had grown to 16,098,000 francs; and in 1841, the last year for which he could obtain any returns, it had reached 20,308,000 francs. Let them compare this with the diminished, or stationary state of our commerce with Brazil during the same period. He had already stated how limited were our imports from Brazil. He had a return of the imports from Brazil into France, which he would read to the House. In 1837, the value in round numbers was 6,381,000 francs; in 1840 it had fallen a little and was 5,900,000 francs; but in 1841 it had grown to 7,993,000 francs. If they wished to support our merchants and manufacturers who were engaged in an honourable competition with other nations in a trade so important as this, they must take care what they were about, and see that they did nothing to subject them to greater disadvantages than those their rivals had to encounter. There was one point connected with this part of the subject on which he would venture to say a word. Having already stated to the House the very onerous duties we placed on Brazilian produce when imported into this country for consumption, he would contrast with these the duties imposed on the same produce by other countries. He held in his hand returns which he believed to be correct, having taken the greatest pains to ascertain their accuracy, (for part of which he must acknowledge the courtesy of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, and he was also indebted to the Economist, which contained some valuable statistical information on this subject). Those papers showed the terms on which other nations, our rivals in the Brazilian trade, received Brazilian produce into their markets. On muscovado sugar England put a duty of 63s. per cwt.; France, on the same cwt. of sugar, put a duty of 26s. 6d.; Austria a duty of 13s. 8d.; the Zollverein (our great competitor, with which Brazil was now in treaty), a duty of 15s. 4d. The United States laid a duty of 2½ cents on Muscovado sugar, and of 4 cents per pound upon the others. [Mr. Gladstone intimated his dissent.] He could not be answerable for the perfect accuracy of these figures, but the fact could not be disputed that no country dealing with the Brazils had received the produce of that country upon more disadvantageous terms than England, and if that were the case that was all he desired to establish. He had now endeavoured to lay before the House the present state of our commercial relations with Brazil. We had still a great trade with that country, not indeed, he regretted to say, an increasing and a thriving trade, but yet an important one, and, with the exception of the United States, it was our best market for our cottons, taking, as it did, upon an average, a million and a half of British manufactures; and there could be no difference of opinion upon the point that we were bound by every consideration of interest to protect our merchants engaged in the honourable and useful traffic with the Brazils, and to promote their interests by every possible and just means. Every hon. Member of that House must agree with him that the Brazilian trade was of the highest importance, and that it ought by no means to be placed in jeopardy. But he now came to a still more important branch of the subject. What were the prospects of the Brazilian trade? A great crisis had come. The treaty of 1827 under which we enjoy such advantages was about to expire—in November it ceased—and it would be for the Brazilians to renew it or not as they might choose, or to impose, if they thought fit, discriminating duties upon our manufactures, adverse to us and favourable to foreign nations who took their produce on more reasonable terms than we thought proper to impose. That would be the power of the Brazilian Government. Such being the existing state of things, it was not surprising that great anxiety should be expressed by the great manufacturing interest of this country, the cotton, the linen, and the woollen manufacturers, and by the merchants engaged in the Brazilian trade, to know what course would be pursued by Her Majesty's Government; and he therefore hoped that they would receive some information upon the subject. This state of our relations with the Brazils must be his apology for bringing the question before the House. Last year he had been unwilling, knowing that a treaty was in process of negotiation with Brazil, to interfere, although he had heard principles propounded in that House by the Ministers which made him fear the result. But in what state did the question now rest? Mr. Ellis had been sent out to Brazil to renew our commercial treaty, but without success. Since then, Signor Ribeiro, the Brazilian Minister, had come to this country, but it was notorious that he had failed, and it was reported that he had left this country not with a commercial treaty in his pocket, but with a draft of one which he had gone to Paris to offer to the French Government, with better prospects of success. ["No, no."] Whether that, however, were so or not, he hoped at least that the result of his Motion would be the receipt of some information from the Government which might have the effect of allaying the apprehensions which existed upon this subject. He would not undertake to predict the course the Brazilian Government might take. He believed that in that country there was a struggle between parties, and a diversity of opinion upon the point. Anybody who had become at all acquainted with the discussions in that country knew that there were not wanting there enlightened statesmen not disposed, even if this country adhered to a course hostile to the commerce of Brazil, to punish herself by retaliatory measures and discriminating duties disadvantageous to British interests. He hoped that the Brazilian Legislature would not attend to the doctrines he heard from the other side as to free trade being only a good thing when there was "reciprocity." He hoped that they would not adopt the opinion of Colonel Torrens (which, to his astonishment, he had heard quoted with approbation by the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government), that if a nation could not induce another to take its goods on reasonable terms, the best course was to shut its ports against that of other country's commodities. But he did not feel quite sure that the Brazilians would adopt a more enlightened course. There were passions, and prejudices, and sinister interests in that country, as in this; and it was not impossible that Brazil might be induced, by the persuasion of foreign countries and other motives, to legislate adversely to this country. Whether that were so or not, it was to be hoped we should set that nation a wise and liberal example. He desired to see no endeavours to induce Brazil to make what was called a "Tariff Treaty." There were two sorts of Commercial Treaties, by confounding which some erroneous ideas were created. One sort was that of which Mr. Huskisson had been a great promoter, stipulating for the equal treatment of the shipping of the two countries (an arrangement, no doubt, which it was very desirable to see established between this and every other country, and containing what was termed the "most favoured nation clause;" which he was always glad to see introduced (especially with countries like Brazil), stipulating, as it did, that neither state should treat the goods of the other more disadvantageously than those of any other country. He had little fear that there would be much endeavour to effect the other—the Tariff Treaty, with Brazil. Such treaties were now at a discount. He had no right to blame those who had attempted to form them. When he was last at the Board of Trade he had found them commenced with France, with Naples, and with Portugal, and other countries; and he had done his best to advance them, but he could not say he had reason to congratulate himself on his success. He supposed the right hon. Gentleman when he took office fancied that his predecessors had been too belligerent, and that a Minister more peaceful, and whose language was more courteous and captivating, would succeed better. The result had shown, that if such expectations had ever been entertained, they were doomed to be disappointed. Of that Treaty, especially, which had been negotiated with France, and which had been going on for these ten years, he was happy to hear from the right hon. Baronet that they would hear no more. Certainly he wondered not that the right hon. Baronet should have been very loth to abandon that Treaty. It had been a most delusive, tantalizing thing. Continually had they been within, as it appeared, the merest point of completing it; yet after all it had never been accomplished; reminding one of those lines which mathematicians mentioned, which were always approaching but which never came in contact. The fact was, that manufacturing interests were far too strong in France to allow of any Ministers completing such a Treaty. He was glad, therefore, to hear that at last there was an end of it. And there was as little expectation of such a Treaty being proposed in Brazil; an important disclaimer, indeed, had just arrived in this country of any intention to pursue such a policy—a report of some Committee which had been appointed to inquire into the subject, and of which, as he possessed a translation (from the Portuguese), accurate, if not elegant, he would read an extract, conveying a great deal of sound good sense upon the subject:—

"A country which has important productions to export, and which draws its principle revenues from duties on imports, gains greatly by giving to the latter the greatest possible extension. For this purpose we should give stability to our commercial relations with foreign nations, to render Commercial Treaties with them the more conducive to the end; not by making Treaties regulating Customs' Tariffs, but by guaranteeing the safety of the persons and the property of the subjects of foreign nations, securing equality and freedom towards all powers, and requiring from them the same guarantees. Commerce needs these guarantees alone to disinvolve herself."

These opinions were truly admirable for their sense. But there was another part of the subject to which he attached greater importance. There was one point upon which he was anxious not to be misunderstood. He felt satisfied that the only means by which the commercial relations between the two countries could be put upon a satisfactory footing, was by reducing the duties upon the great articles of Brazilian commerce; so that the produce of that country could be admitted here upon fair and reasonable terms. He had no hesitation in saying, if this were done, even if there were no Commercial Treaty, that our trade with Brazil would extend and flourish. Above all, the present opportunity ought to be taken. It was a late opportunity, it was true; but this was the time that should be embraced to put an end to the Sugar monopoly. When he used the term "monopoly," he begged to remind the House that he did not use it in the vague sense he had sometimes heard it applied, but in the strictest manner. He had heard of the Corn monopoly and other monopolies, but the Sugar was a real monopoly—a system by which the ports of this country were closed against foreign Sugar altogether. It was a principle that had been equally denounced by both sides of the House, and he did not believe that a single Member of the House would defend it upon principle. The opinions he was expressing in regard to the Sugar Duties was no new opinion on his part, or on the part of those with whom he had acted. The late Government thought that, after the great experiment regarding the negro population in the West Indies, as breathing time should be allowed before any further alteration was made, in order to give the colonies time to settle. But the late Government had never contended, that the present system should go on for ever: and in confirmation of that he would take the liberty of reading a declaration made by a leading Member of that Government, which exhibited the views of himself and his Colleagues upon the point. In 1838, the late lamented Lord Sydenham, while opposing the reduction of the Sugar Duties, declared distinctly that opinion:—

"He admitted that it was a matter of very great importance, and one which would be forced upon the attention of Parliament and the country within a very short period. In the first place this was a matter which would force itself upon the attention of the Government as connected with the Treaty with the Brazils. The present Treaty was only of a temporary character, and would expire in 1842, and if we entered into fresh relations with that important State this subject must necessarily be considered. The exports to that country were upwards of 4,000,000*l.* a-year of British manufactures. This was the most important trade that we carried on with the exception of the United States of North America. The produce of the Brazils was almost entirely confined to sugar and coffee, and when we come to the period when the Treaty was about to expire, this subject must force itself upon the attention of the House. The other branch of the subject was also become a matter of deep importance and ought to receive great consideration; namely, the short supply of colonial sugar."

He concluded by saying:—

"He was satisfied that it must be forced on the attention of the Government and the Legislature, if not by the wants of the people of this country, at any rate by the Treaty with the Brazils, and he trusted it would be met fairly, and the difficulty dealt with in the way that a matter of such importance deserved, when it was ripe for consideration."

He had thought it right to read that extract to show what were really the views upon this important subject of the late Government, of which he (Mr. Labouchere) was a Member. It was incumbent upon the Government at once to put the Sugar Duties upon a proper footing. He believed that in the state of our commercial relations with Brazil, it would have been better if this had been done some time previous to the expiration of the Treaty. That was one of the reasons which had induced the Government of 1841 to bring forward their proposal with respect to sugar. Now, the last moment was come, and what he asked the House to affirm was, that they would not allow the Brazilian Treaty to expire, at the same time permitting that country to enter upon new commercial relations with other nations, without, at least, taking some steps to allow Brazilian produce to be brought into this country. To the other branches of this most important subject he should refer but briefly, for there would be an opportunity shortly, if the Government should take the course it was supposed they would, of fully discussing them; still he felt it necessary now to call the attention of the House to one question. The Motion of his right hon. Friend, the Member for Portsmouth, in 1841, was resisted by hon. Gentlemen opposite; and they were not contented with simply opposing, but they put upon record their reasons, of which the first was the encouragement that would be given to slavery and the slave-trade; and the second, the prospects held out of an adequate supply from our own Colonies. The Amendment to the Motion of his right hon. Friend was placed in most worthy hands—in those of a noble Lord whose opinions would have much weight—his noble Friend the Member for Liverpool (Lord Sandon). His noble Friend had not only made a general statement, but had come down to the House with an estimate of the supply of sugar which might be expected from our Colonies. And an estimate of that nature, coming from such a quarter, excited much attention at the time. He thought it advisable now to call the attention of the House to that estimate for the purpose of testing how far it had been borne out, and how far the promises then held out had been fulfilled. The estimate of his noble Friend was this, and the figures containing the actual supply received would show the error. The right hon. Gentleman read the following statements:—

	Lord Sandon's Estimate in 1841.	Supply in 1842.	Supply in 1843.
	cwts.	cwts.	cwts.
West India Sugar	2,300,000	2,508,910	2,503,577
Mauritius . . .	600,000	689,335	477,124
East Indies . .	1,400,000	940,462	1,101,751
	4,300,000	4,138,697	4,082,452
	Deficiency, 417,000 cwts.

He was bound, in fairness to his noble Friend, to say that in one instance—the West Indies—the supply had exceeded the estimate of his noble Friend; but the deficiency of the supply last year under the estimate of his noble Friend (Lord Sandon) had been no less than 417,000 cwts., and that without taking into account the increase in population during those three years. And was he not, then, right in saying that the population of this country was suffering from a stinted supply of sugar, and that the expectations held out by Her Majesty's Ministers and their supporters, upon the faith of which the House had been induced to refuse its acquiescence in the proposal of the late Government to reduce the Sugar Duties in 1841, were fallacious? It might be urged by hon. Gentlemen opposite that the price of sugar had not been excessive, but the price of sugar was a relative term, and it would be found that the difference between British plantation sugar and foreign sugar in bond was greater now than it was in 1841. He need scarcely say that in referring to the estimates which had been made by his noble Friend, nothing was further from his thoughts than any intention of casting upon him the imputation of wishing to mislead the House. He was confident that his noble Friend believed in the correctness of those estimates when he stated them to the House, and that he had consulted persons of high authority and experience in Liverpool upon the subject; and he also was aware that the great merchants and East-India speculators, who assisted in preparing those Estimates, were themselves convinced that they were not fallacious. They had been disappointed in this way—they had calculated on being able to invest their capital in sugar plantations in the East Indies and the Mauritius, and they thought they could embark in the cultivation of sugar with advantage. But what had been the case?—what had been the language of the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government on each occasion since then on which the question of the Sugar Duties had been discussed? Had he ever held out any encouragement to those parties to make such investments? Not at all. The right hon. Baronet had said to them, "I will not alter the Sugar Duties this year," and the natural impression produced in men's minds by such a statement was—for aught we know the Minister will make an alteration next year. People, therefore, refused to invest their capital in raising sugar in the East Indies under such circumstances—when it was a matter of doubt whether the law would be altered or not. This was, he knew, the opinion of many persons who would otherwise have invested their capital in this way. And his belief was, that if the Members of the Government, and those who supported them, had, conscious of a majority, made up their minds to maintain the Sugar Monopoly, they had better say so at once. The right hon. Baronet had better do the same, with regard to the Sugar Duties, as he had done in reference to the Corn Laws, and by giving a stout sugar pledge at once, give confidence to the East-India and Mauritius sugar speculators. The capabilities of our own possessions would then be fairly tried, and we should see whether they could produce sufficient sugar to supply this country. But to put off the question from year to year, as the Government had done, was the very worst course they could take—whether they considered the great interests concerned or the British consumer. And with the knowledge which the Government now had of the fallacy of the opinions and expectations in which they had indulged, he could not understand how they could reconcile it with their duty to go on another year in the same miserable course they had hitherto pursued. While upon this part of the subject he wished to draw attention to another point. He had already stated that the consumption of sugar from the years 1841 to 1843 (the last year of which they had any account) had decreased. And he would now state what the amount of colonial sugar taken out of bond into actual consumption in this country had been in 1841 and last year. For 1841, 4,101,350 cwts.; for 1843, 4,082,452 cwts.; diminution, 18,906 cwts. Now, to show how completely this falling-off was occasioned by stinted supply, and not the want of capability in this country to consume sugar, he would ask the House to permit him to advert to the consumption of other articles which were consumed generally in conjunction with sugar. He would take the supply of tea and coffee for the same years, 1841 and 1843:—

Tea ..	36,684,797	40,302,981
Coffee	28,428,466	30,031,606

And yet, notwithstanding this increase in tea and coffee, the House would perceive, that so far from there having been a corresponding increase in the consumption of sugar, there had been a considerable decrease. He might, while on the subject of the import of sugar, remark, that the only branch of the sugar trade in which any increase had taken place was that which consisted in bringing foreign slave-grown sugar into this country for the purpose of refining, and re-exporting to all the nations of the world, and to our own West-Indian colonies for their consumption, and this branch of the trade was swelling to an enormous magnitude. Of foreign slave-grown sugar we imported for refining and re-exportation—in 1842, 617,314 cwts.; in 1843, 939,896 cwts., or almost 1,000,000 cwts. [Mr. Gladstone: What were the returns from which the right hon. Gentleman was quoting?] From the trade and navigation returns, which had been recently laid on the Table of the House. [Mr. Gladstone: The whole of the amount of sugar has not been re-exported.] But it has been imported into this country for the purpose of being refined in bond for re-exportation, and, as he had said, it had increased in one year from 600,000 to upwards of 900,000 cwts. But he now came to what was, after all, the only real point on which the difference of opinion between the two sides of the House in reference to this question rested. He did not believe that hon. Gentlemen opposite would deny the importance at this juncture of treating fairly and of placing upon a sound footing the commerce of this great Empire. He did not believe they would deny the great advantage of admitting foreign sugar for home consumption, if it could be admitted fairly, and under proper regulations; or that in dealing with the sugar trade especially, to follow a just and true principle of political economy was indispensable. To the finances of the country a satisfactory settlement of this question would be most beneficial; and with the exception of placing the Corn Laws on a proper and sound footing, there was perhaps no other question, the settlement of which would be so advantageous to the people in reference to their comforts and habits. But he believed they would find but one point of difference between the two sides of the House. The great objection on the other side was, that by admitting foreign sugar into the consumption of this country we should give encouragement to slavery in the Brazils and other foreign slave-owning countries. He hoped he was not disposed to treat with disregard any really conscientious scruples which might be held by any portion of the people of this Empire, but the more they examined this case, the greater must be their astonishment that any man at all acquainted with the subject could make his stand on that objection. They had been told by the right hon. Gentleman opposite that he was not willing to renew the negotiations with the Brazils, unless the Brazilian government would stipulate for certain conditions with regard to slaves—not stipulations to check the Slave Trade, but affecting the domestic and municipal institutions of the Brazils. He could not suppose the right hon. Baronet could have meant stipulations for the Suppression of the Slave Trade, for, so far as treaties and stipulations upon paper went there was hardly anything for us to require. We had already a most stringent Slave Trade Treaty—the Right of Search both above and below the Line—a mixed Commission to adjudicate—all we could expect, all we could demand, for checking the traffic in slaves had already been given. He had a right, then, to assume, that the meaning of the right hon. Baronet was, that Government recommended to Parliament and the country not to renew the negotiations with the Brasil—above all, not to reduce the duty on Brasilian produce, and to deal with the question in that way in which alone they could hope to place the commercial relations between the two countries on a firm and satisfactory footing—unless the Brasilian government would undertake to make certain laws for the regulation of slavery within their own dominions. Now, he would ask the House to consider, on that the last opportunity, perhaps, they would have of considering before a heavy blow would be struck at our commerce and navigation, whether they could he would not say, as wise and prudent men, but as consistent and conscientious men, take up that ground? He knew how strong was the detestation of slavery in this country, and he trusted England would at all times hold high language to foreign nations in regard to slavery: but to enable her to do so effectually we must take care that foreign nations shall not have the opportunity of saying to us in return, “it is impossible for us to believe that you are sincere in your denunciations of slavery; it is manifest that your argument is pretext and not reason, for we see that you can get over your scruples when it suits your own interests, or when you wish to give support to certain powerful interests in your own country, which you are either unable or unwilling to grapple with. It is easy to make us the victims of your pretended scruples, and to tell us that it is a question of humanity that prevents your dealing fairly with us, when we see that the question with you really is one of protection to class interests.” He appealed to the House and the country to consider how the question stood. Sugar was the only article of slave-grown produce upon which we had any scruples at all. Cotton, coffee, and other articles produced by slave-labour were admitted. Under the Tariff of 1842 the Government had given facilities for the introduction of foreign coffee, cultivated by slave-labour, into the consumption of this country to the extent of three millions of pounds. With regard to the Slave Trade question, the bringing the slaves across the Atlantic, it mattered not whether it were for the purpose of cultivating sugar or coffee, except so far as sugar was produced by a more laborious and painful system of cultivation and was more cruel to the slaves engaged in it, and that, therefore, we ought not to encourage it by admitting slave-grown sugar into this country. This, he imagined, must have been the language of Mr. Ellis to the Brasilian government, and this must have been the language which the Members of the Government opposite addressed to the Chevalier Ribeiro, the Brasilian minister in this country. But was this country in the condition to hold such language to the Brasil? Was it in our power to do so? It was well known that if there was one mode of employing slave-labour more cruel and disgusting than another, it was in mining operations. This had been admitted in all countries and at all times. The Roman slave “Damnatus ad metalla” was considered to be in the worst position of servile existence. But what had been done by the right hon. Gentlemen opposite in their Tariff of 1842 in regard to this matter? He would say nothing about gold, which was admitted freely. He was aware they could not shut out gold—

“—perrumpere amat saxa, potentius Ictu fulmineo.”

Any attempt to shut out gold was absurd because it must be ineffectual. But he would come to the article of copper ore, and he was curious to hear the answer which the right hon. Gentleman opposite would make upon this point. Down to the year 1842 the question of copper ore stood thus:—Foreign copper ore stood, previous to the Tariff, precisely in the same position as foreign Sugar stood in now; it was admitted into this country for the purpose of being smelted in bond, as foreign Sugar now was of being refined in bond for re-exportation to other countries, but the right hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel) had made a very important and a very proper alteration in reference to English interests in regard to the import of foreign copper ore, by which it was allowed to come in and be consumed here, subject to a light duty. That was a change which he (Mr. Labouchere) had hailed with pleasure, and what had been the result? These were the returns of the effects of that alteration.

Foreign Copper Ore Imported—the quantity on which duty was paid—and the amount of Revenue received thereon in each year, 1837 to 1843:—

	Imported.	Entered for Consumption and Duty paid.	Amount of Revenue.
	cwt s.	cwt s.	£
1837	349,331	67	40
1838	641,266	16	6
1839	603,302	13	9
1840	838,904	112	21
1841	971,933	1,020	56
1842*	997,120	314,180	16,689
1843	1,111,960	1,083,420	64,343

*After the Alteration

He did not mean to say that, to the whole of this extent, or anything like it, the alteration in the law had stimulated the import of copper ore into this country, for at the same time the right hon. Baronet had abolished the smelting of copper ore in bond. But the analogy of the case was apparent. Yet they had departed, in the case of foreign copper ore produced by slave-labour, from the system which they still adhered to in regard to foreign sugar, for no other reason than that slave-labour was employed in its cultivation. The question was a large and important one, if considered in reference to our trade with the Brazils alone; but there was good reason for supposing that it was not the Brazilian trade alone that was in jeopardy. There was reason to suppose that our trade with the Spanish West-Indies, Cuba, and Porto Rico, was equally in danger, and that those islands would follow the example of the Brazils, if we did not make arrangements for admitting their produce; and in deciding the question, it was important to look to the interests of those branches of trade which were connected with the Spanish West India Islands, to which we now exported British produce to the extent of one million. These considerations had led him to the conclusion, that the subject was far too serious to be shuffled off to the end of the Session. If they waited till then, they would see the Sugar Duties Bill passed in the usual course, and the Session close without the expression of any opinion by that House; they would find in November that our treaty with the Brazils had expired, and the Brazilian Government had taken hostile measures, and with fatal effect, against our commerce. If the House of Commons sat by and allowed this, they would be amenable to just complaints from those upon whose interest this fatal blow would have been inflicted. He would appeal, therefore, to those hon. Members who represented the mercantile and manufacturing interests of the country, to join him in urging upon the Government to take the only course which could save those interests from the ruin with which they were threatened—he especially alluded to the representatives of the manufacturing and mercantile interests, but he did not appeal to them only—his conscientious conviction was, that to those hon. Members who represented the agricultural interest, the question was one of equal importance. He had frequently heard those hon. Gentlemen declare, that agriculture, trade and manufactures, must wax and wane together, and he trusted that they would now act upon that feeling, and not support the Government in a course which, if pursued, must inflict a fatal blow on some of the most important branches of the trade and commerce of the country. He confessed, however, that he had heard the right hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel) ask, what interest could the Government have in supporting the British West-India interest against the general interest; and if he did not know that there was some freemasonry carried on amongst certain interests for their own purposes, as opposed to the general interests, he should be disposed to agree with the right hon. Baronet, that they had none. But he found there was, on the part of a large party, who supported the right hon. Baronet's Government, very great jealousy of any advance towards a liberal system of commercial policy. They had heard denunciations proceeding from powerful quarters recently against such a policy, and the determination of that party not to allow any inroad on the good old system of protection and monopoly had been announced. He feared that these denunciations applied to questions of this kind, as well as to the Corn Laws, and that many persons who felt that the present Corn Laws was not defensible in argument were not sorry to see other interests enjoying a similar protection. The Sugar Duties were looked upon as the buttress and bulwark of the Corn Laws, it was felt that the landed interest and the West-India interest were exactly alike in regard to protection, and must support each other. He should listen with considerable anxiety to what might fall from the Government in the course of the Debate—if they should be able to give satisfactory assurance to the House and the country on the subject—if they could allay the apprehensions which existed so widely and extensively amongst the mercantile and manufacturing classes; and should tell him that his Motion would interfere with the prosecution of such a course, it would not be his duty as it could not be his wish, or that of his hon. Friend, to throw any impediment in the way of the consummation of that which they so much desired. But if they did not receive any such satisfactory assurance from the Government upon a subject which had been already too long postponed, and which could not remain longer in its present state without injury and injustice to the country, he should, in that case, call upon the House to come to the rescue, and he thought they would not discharge the duty they owed to the important interests involved, if they did not, by affirming the resolution he was about to place in the hands of the Chair, convey to the Government and the people their confident belief that the time had arrived when those great interests could no longer be trifled with, and when they must place the great commercial interests of the country on a more satisfactory footing, by renewing the commercial relations upon fair and equal terms, if they could now do so, with the Brazils, and, above all, by altering our customs duties on the chief articles of Brazilian produce, more especially on the great article of sugar, in such a manner as to prove to the Brazils our desire to extend and continue those commercial relations which now existed between the two countries, and which were so essential to the prosperity of both. He would now move,

"That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty, representing to Her Majesty the great importance to this country of the trade with the Empire of the Brazils, and humbly praying Her Majesty to adopt such measures as may appear best calculated to maintain and improve the commercial relations between the United Kingdom and the Brazils."

Mr. Ewart seconded the Motion. The country had a right to complain that no satisfactory result had been obtained from the recent negotiations between this country and the Brazils on the subject of the Commercial Treaty. The Government made no progress in their attempts to put down slavery in the Brazils by negotiation, while they had placed our commercial relations with that country in the greatest danger. This question of the Sugar Duties was important to every consumer in this country. The great burthen of those duties fell upon the poorer classes, who were compelled to consume an adulterated article. The onus probandi was with the Members of the Government opposite, to inform the House what result, if any, had attended their negotiations—what their intentions were with regard to West-India interests, and what they proposed to do in regard to the interests of the consumer in this country. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would give effect to those sound principles of free-trade which he had already enunciated in a certain periodical publication. As for the right hon. Baronet near him, he knew that he was restrained from acting as his own sense of what was right would prompt him to do by the powerful combination behind him. There were the West and East India interests united, forming a vast "duopoly," which prevented the right hon. Baronet from carrying into effect his own sounder principles.

Mr. Gladstone: Mr. Speaker, I trust that nothing will fall from me in the course of the remarks which I am about to make in reply to the observations which have fallen from the right hon. Gentleman who has brought forward this Motion, and the hon. Gentleman who has immediately preceded me, which can justly give rise to the inference that Her Majesty's Government is in any manner indifferent to the importance of the trade which exists between this country and the Brazils. Neither do I desire it to be inferred, from anything I may think it necessary to say, that Her Majesty's Government are perfectly satisfied with the present state of the Customs' law with respect to sugar, if it be simply viewed as a commercial or a mercantile subject of consideration. Sir, I am bound to add that I trust nothing will fall from me which could have the effect of conveying to the hon. Gentlemen opposite, or to the people out of doors, the slightest intimation of the course which Her Majesty's Government may think proper to pursue during this Session of Parliament with respect to any one item of the Import Duties. It is with some regret I state this, because both the hon. Gentlemen who have preceded me have signified it as their intention to draw from the Government some intimation as to their intentions in reference to the law affecting sugar, coffee, and copper. Sir, I am convinced that the good sense of hon. Members will convince them that no person holding office in the Government of this country, who had learned so much as the A B C of his duties, can allow himself, by a discussion which has been promoted at the instance of a single individual, to be led into a declaration of the financial intentions of Her Majesty's Government at an earlier period of the Session than was necessary. If hon. Gentlemen opposite draw any such conclusion from what I may think it necessary to say, I can only tell them that they will draw them upon their own responsibility, and I should wish them to recollect that the chances are decidedly in favour of their being in the wrong. Sir, in adverting to the terms of this address, I must solicit the House to negative the Motion of the right hon. Gentlemen opposite. The language of it raises, and is intended to raise the argument that measures might have been properly taken by Her Majesty's Government for the extension of our commercial relations with Brasil which have not been taken; and likewise on another ground do I ask the House to negative the Motion, namely, the language of the address appears to me to lay down the principle that we are to adopt such measures as may give extension to our commercial relations with the Brazils, absolutely and irrespectively of other considerations, and without reference to the effects which must naturally be produced by such a course. Sir, we have also contended that this subject could not be properly considered on a commercial ground solely, but as one which materially affects the happiness of the whole human race. It is impossible, therefore, for us to assent to the adoption of an address, which—by implication at all events—asserts the very contrary. With regard to the position in which Government have stood in respect to our commercial interests with Brasil, what has already occurred is, I think, enough to show that we are by no means indifferent to the most important interests of the public. The right hon. Gentleman opposite has taunted us to-night because indeed, in the Customs law of 1842, we proposed a change in the law affecting the importation of Coffee from the Brazils, the tendency of which law was to facilitate considerably the introduction of coffee into this country. Sir, it is true that at the time of such alteration in the law relating to coffee, it was announced that another change in that law might possibly furnish matter for consideration at another time. It is true that so far as that change went, it tended to bring Brazilian coffee into this country, but I do not think that a sufficient change was made in that law, to form the foundation of a taunt from the right hon. Gentlemen that we had been thus guilty of encouraging an article of slave-produce. If it, however, offers such a ground for comment from the right hon. Gentleman, it also affords a ground for showing, that the Government is not indifferent to the interests of commerce. Sir, there were many other articles of Brazilian production not unimportant in which changes were made in the year of 1842, and it was but just and fair that such alterations should be made. Considering the facilities which we have enjoyed in our trade with Brasil; considering the heavy duties we have maintained on some of the principal articles of Brazilian production, it was thought both just and fair that a reduction should be made in the duties of certain of those articles. The duties on hides, rosewood, and cocoa, with a variety of other articles, secondary articles no doubt, but still not unimportant, were much reduced in 1842. It was also intimated in this House at that period, and it has since been intimated, that the great article of coffee, which constitutes the two-fifths or the one-half of the whole exports of the Brazils, is an article with which the Government was prepared to deal, without making the changes in the law affecting it essentially dependent upon the law affecting slavery or the Slave Trade. I am now only arguing the commercial part of the question. With respect to cotton, it is notorious that the duty upon it is very moderate, when we consider it without any reference to the country from which it is imported. Our manufacturers make their claim to relief from the duty upon this article on the ground of diminished ability to compete with their rivals abroad. I do not mean to say one word here, either for or against this duty. So far, however, as the duty being moderate, and other circumstances attending it being considered, this article of cotton from the Brazils stands in the same situation as cotton from the United States. It has been treated avowedly as a simple question of revenue, and thus it will continue. As to coffee, a slight change has taken place in Brazilian coffee. In the year 1842, a readiness was expressed, with the intention of making it part of our commercial arrangements, to introduce further and very considerable changes in favour of Brazilian coffee. With respect to cotton, the present state of the law is favourable to its introduction; and therefore, although I grant that what I am now urging is no ground for refusing to give further extension to our commercial relations with Brasil if it can be legitimately given, yet it is material to observe that as to a large proportion of the products of that country, no less than four-fifths of the whole exportable products, Her Majesty's Government have given advantages to the produce of the Brazils, and have expressed their readiness to give further advantages. In point of fact, the great difficulty which attaches to this question, is, as is well known, connected with the question of Sugar; but it is not equally well known that the Sugar exported from Brazil at the present period constitutes only one-fifth part of the whole exports of that country. The right hon. Gentleman very fairly and candidly apologised for the defects of his statistics; I should wish to make a similar apology, because the statistics of Brazil are as defective as can well be conceived; but I have taken pains to obtain the reports of the French Consul, which afford the best evidence to be had on that important subject. This paper is a statement of the produce of Brazil, and it appears that on an average of five years, from 1837 to 1841, the total annual exports of Brazil amounted in value to 5,500,000*l.* sterling. Of that 5,500,000*l.*, 2,000,000*l.* was in coffee, 1,540,000*l.* was in cotton, 1,100,000*l.* was in Sugar, and the remaining 1,500,000*l.* in other articles. So that, in point of fact, the article with regard to which we have so much protection is the article of Sugar, constituting one-fifth of the exportable produce of the country. At the present moment, I believe, it is even less than that proportion; but, at the same time, I argue that if a change in our law were to be made, favourable to the introduction of Brazilian Sugar, it would appear, in the table of Brazilian exports, in a larger proportion than it appears at present. As respects the arguments which Her Majesty's Government have always produced with regard to Sugar, it is not necessary, perhaps that I should go at any length into the grounds of those arguments. They were stated very much in detail in the year 1841; and in that year we could not claim altogether the merit of originality as to those arguments, because we took them, in some degree, from the right hon. Gentleman the late President of the Board of Trade, who had used those arguments with his usual force in 1840, although he did not use them so strongly as others had done. We took them also from a high authority of the late Government, Lord Monteagle, who, in 1839, used very strong expressions on the subject; and when my hon. Friend the Seconder of the present Motion proposed a reduction of the Sugar Duties in that year, Lord Monteagle emphatically said that, in the first place, there was the claim of the colonies of this country to a preference, on which he did not think it necessary to give any opinion; and, in the second place, he withheld his assent from the proposal from the peculiar state of Brazil with respect to the Slave Trade, because, when it was known that the

Brasils furnished a great market for slaves, and gave encouragement to the Slave Trade, it behoved the House to pause before they gave encouragement to the trade, by creating an additional market. I must confess—although the right hon. Gentleman expressed his astonishment that any man can look into this question, and after looking into it, resist it on grounds connected with the Slave Trade—that I never was made acquainted with a chain of reasoning which appears more clear and insuperable, than that which goes to prove that the effect of the propositions which have been made for the admission of Brazilian Sugar into this country, if worth anything, if not utter trash, will be to enhance the value of Brazilian Sugar, to encourage and extend the production of Brazilian sugar, to give to the planter of the Brasils the inducement to seek the augmentation of the means of cultivation; and we all know that there is but one quarter in which, for the purpose of raising sugar, he can seek the means of extended cultivation, viz., the unhappy land of Africa. The right hon. Gentleman did not attempt to grapple with that proposition; no man has attempted to grapple with it. He taunted this party, or this House, or the country, with its inconsistency; what has that to do with the matter? Does it prove, because you cannot give complete freedom, you are to disregard practical effects? Does it prove, because you may not do some things, you are to refrain from doing others? Does it prove that it is ridiculous, as the right hon. Gentleman seems to suppose, to entertain objections to the admission of Brazilian sugar, on the ground that the admission, however desirable on every commercial ground, must, and would necessarily, at the same time, have a most powerful effect in stimulating the Slave-trade between Africa and the Brasils? The right hon. Gentleman described the opposition, if intentionally I know not, but he described the opposition given to this proposition from considerations connected with slavery, in terms far, very far indeed, from accurate. He stated that it was opposed on the ground that it was not desirable to give encouragement to slavery. I contend, on the contrary, that slavery is but a secondary element in the matter. If slavery stood alone, it would be a very different question from what it now is, considering the course which has been taken. It is not simply a question of

He did not mean to say that, to the whole of this extent, or anything like it, the alteration in the law had stimulated the import of copper ore into this country, for at the same time the right hon. Baronet had abolished the smelting of copper ore in bond. But the analogy of the case was apparent. Yet they had departed, in the case of foreign copper ore produced by slave-labour, from the system which they still adhered to in regard to foreign sugar, for no other reason than that slave-labour was employed in its cultivation. The question was a large and important one, if considered in reference to our trade with the Brazils alone; but there was good reason for supposing that it was not the Brazilian trade alone that was in jeopardy. There was reason to suppose that our trade with the Spanish West-Indies, Cuba, and Porto Rico, was equally in danger, and that those islands would follow the example of the Brazils, if we did not make arrangements for admitting their produce; and in deciding the question, it was important to look to the interests of those branches of trade which were connected with the Spanish West India Islands, to which we now exported British produce to the extent of one million. These considerations had led him to the conclusion, that the subject was far too serious to be shuffled off to the end of the Session. If they waited till then, they would see the Sugar Duties Bill passed in the usual course, and the Session close without the expression of any opinion by that House; they would find in November that our treaty with the Brazils had expired, and the Brazilian Government had taken hostile measures, and with fatal effect, against our commerce. If the House of Commons sat by and allowed this, they would be amenable to just complaints from those upon whose interest this fatal blow would have been inflicted. He would appeal, therefore, to those hon. Members who represented the mercantile and manufacturing interests of the country, to join him in urging upon the Government to take the only course which could save those interests from the ruin with which they were threatened—he especially alluded to the representatives of the manufacturing and mercantile interests, but he did not appeal to them only—his conscientious conviction was, that to those hon. Members who represented the agricultural interest, the question was one of equal importance. He had frequently heard those hon. Gentlemen

declare, that agriculture, trade and manufactures, must wax and wane together, and he trusted that they would now act upon that feeling, and not support the Government in a course which, if pursued, must inflict a fatal blow on some of the most important branches of the trade and commerce of the country. He confessed, however, that he had heard the right hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel) ask, what interest could the Government have in supporting the British West-India interest against the general interest; and if he did not know that there was some freemasonry carried on amongst certain interests for their own purposes, as opposed to the general interests, he should be disposed to agree with the right hon. Baronet, that they had none. But he found there was, on the part of a large party, who supported the right hon. Baronet's Government, very great jealousy of any advance towards a liberal system of commercial policy. They had heard denunciations proceeding from powerful quarters recently against such a policy, and the determination of that party not to allow any inroad on the good old system of protection and monopoly had been announced. He feared that these denunciations applied to questions of this kind, as well as to the Corn Laws, and that many persons who felt that the present Corn Laws was not defensible in argument were not sorry to see other interests enjoying a similar protection. The Sugar Duties were looked upon as the buttress and bulwark of the Corn Laws, it was felt that the landed interest and the West-India interest were exactly alike in regard to protection, and must support each other. He should listen with considerable anxiety to what might fall from the Government in the course of the Debate—if they should be able to give satisfactory assurance to the House and the country on the subject—if they could allay the apprehensions which existed so widely and extensively amongst the mercantile and manufacturing classes; and should tell him that his Motion would interfere with the prosecution of such a course, it would not be his duty as it could not be his wish, or that of his hon. Friend, to throw any impediment in the way of the consummation of that which they so much desired. But if they did not receive any such satisfactory assurance from the Government upon a subject which had been already too long postponed, and which could not remain longer in its present state without injury and injustice to the country, he should, in that case, call upon the House to come to the rescue, and he thought they would not discharge the duty they owed to the important interests involved, if they did not, by affirming the resolution he was about to place in the hands of the Chair, convey to the Government and the people their confident belief that the time had arrived when those great interests could no longer be trifled with, and when they must place the great commercial interests of the country on a more satisfactory footing, by renewing the commercial relations upon fair and equal terms, if they could now do so, with the Brazils, and, above all, by altering our customs duties on the chief articles of Brazilian produce, more especially on the great article of sugar, in such a manner as to prove to the Brazils our desire to extend and continue those commercial relations which now existed between the two countries, and which were so essential to the prosperity of both. He would now move,

"That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty, representing to Her Majesty the great importance to this country of the trade with the Empire of the Brazils, and humbly praying Her Majesty to adopt such measures as may appear best calculated to maintain and improve the commercial relations between the United Kingdom and the Brazils."

Mr. Ewart seconded the Motion. The country had a right to complain that no satisfactory result had been obtained from the recent negotiations between this country and the Brazils on the subject of the Commercial Treaty. The Government made no progress in their attempts to put down slavery in the Brazils by negotiation, while they had placed our commercial relations with that country in the greatest danger. This question of the Sugar Duties was important to every consumer in this country. The great burthen of those duties fell upon the poorer classes, who were compelled to consume an adulterated article. The onus probandi was with the Members of the Government opposite, to inform the House what result, if any, had attended their negotiations—what their intentions were with regard to West-India interests, and what they proposed to do in regard to the interests of the consumer in this country. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would give effect to those sound principles of free-trade which he had already enunciated in a certain periodical publication. As for the right hon. Baronet near him, he knew that he was restrained from acting as his own sense of what was right would prompt him to do by the powerful combination behind him. There were the West and East India interests united, forming a vast "duopoly," which prevented the right hon. Baronet from carrying into effect his own sounder principles.

Mr. Gladstone: Mr. Speaker, I trust that nothing will fall from me in the course of the remarks which I am about to make in reply to the observations which have fallen from the right hon. Gentleman who has brought forward this Motion, and the hon. Gentleman who has immediately preceded me, which can justly give rise to the inference that Her Majesty's Government is in any manner indifferent to the importance of the trade which exists between this country and the Brazils. Neither do I desire it to be inferred, from anything I may think it necessary to say, that Her Majesty's Government are perfectly satisfied with the present state of the Customs' law with respect to sugar, if it be simply viewed as a commercial or a mercantile subject of consideration. Sir, I am bound to add that I trust nothing will fall from me which could have the effect of conveying to the hon. Gentlemen opposite, or to the people out of doors, the slightest intimation of the course which Her Majesty's Government may think proper to pursue during this Session of Parliament with respect to any one item of the Import Duties. It is with some regret I state this, because both the hon. Gentlemen who have preceded me have signified it as their intention to draw from the Government some intimation as to their intentions in reference to the law affecting sugar, coffee, and copper. Sir, I am convinced that the good sense of hon. Members will convince them that no person holding office in the Government of this country, who had learned so much as the A B C of his duties, can allow himself, by a discussion which has been promoted at the instance of a single individual, to be led into a declaration of the financial intentions of Her Majesty's Government at an earlier period of the Session than was necessary. If hon. Gentlemen opposite draw any such conclusion from what I may think it necessary to say, I can only tell them that they will draw them upon their own responsibility, and I should wish them to recollect that the chances are decidedly in favour of their being in the wrong. Sir, in adverting to intermeddle with domestic institutions, that Her Majesty's Government are led to take the broad distinction, and to include not only the Slave-trade and slavery, but it was because the slavery of Brasil is essentially and indissolubly connected with the Slave Trade. If the slavery of the Brasils be so managed and worked as to be in effect a means of maintaining the Slave Trade of the Brasils, then, I say, that the Slave Trade of the Brasils connects itself at once with the question, which is no domestic or national question, but a question almost taking the rank of a question of international law—a question of humanity at large—a question on which every nation in Europe has acquired a title to speak and to be heard, and on which Great Britain has, above all, a title to speak, because she has made the greatest efforts. Having endeavoured to explain that it was from no desire to interfere with the internal institutions of Brasil, simply considered, that Her Majesty's Government did make demands, undoubtedly of a national nature, in deference to unusual and peculiar circumstances, I then go to notice the argument of the right hon. Gentleman, as brought against Government in regard to their inconsistency. He said, that something was done in the case of coffee, and that a willingness was expressed to do more; and that although it might be true, that the cultivation of sugar was a more useful labour, than the cultivation of coffee, yet it mattered very little to the unhappy slave, in the middle passages, whether he were to be carried to the Brasils to cultivate sugar or coffee, as far as the horrors of the Slave Trade were concerned. I grant you that if the cultivation of coffee was likely to have the same effect on the Slave Trade as the cultivation of sugar, the argument would be valid, but the difference is this, that to cultivate sugar, slaves will be carried across the Atlantic; to cultivate coffee they will not, because the cultivation of coffee can be carried on more economically by freemen than by slaves. The cultivation of coffee adapts itself to the capabilities of the family, it is a cultivation in which not only men, but women, boys and girls, can find a place. It does not carry women slaves across the Atlantic—the proportion is only one-fourth; but the cultivation of sugar carries young men, the great mass under twenty years of age, valuable for hard labour, out of whom a few years' labour can be got before they sink into the grave. If you look to the increase of coffee, you will find it is perfectly easy, in the western hemisphere, for coffee, the produce of free labour, to compete with slave-grown coffee. St. Domingo exports 5,000,000 lbs. of coffee. I never heard that there was more difficulty in raising coffee in St. Domingo than in the Brasils, but St. Domingo exports no sugar. If we are to take experience for our guide, I say it does appear it is perfectly easy and practicable to raise coffee by free labour; and it is my firm belief, that if the duty on coffee in this country or anywhere else were to be so altered to-morrow as to stimulate the cultivation of coffee in the Brasils, it would lead to an increased cultivation; but it would be the interest of the Brasils to endeavour to supply the means of that increase by free labour, and not by sending to Africa. He did not dwell mainly on that; he stated the conduct of the present Government as to copper ore in 1842, and made an argument on that subject to which I shall presently advert. But I will say this, if it be true that the present Government had been guilty of the grossest injustice, I care not how gross, in their measure as to copper, would it follow that it befitted the House of Commons to overlook practical questions in connection with the sugar duties? But I deny the inconsistency. The right hon. Gentleman said, that he had an accumulation of facts which rendered his case most triumphant. He said, that if one description of labour was more weary and wasting than another, it was the labour of the slave in mines; he showed that the present Government had so reduced the duties on the admission of foreign copper ore, that whereas formerly there was scarcely any copper ore entered for consumption, yet, that since that period a considerable quantity had been so entered; he said, that we had encouraged the labour of slaves in mines, in order to get that ore; having shown that, he said, "This is exactly parallel to the case of Brazilian sugar; only do for sugar what you have done for copper ore." His argument would be very strong if it were true, but it is altogether wanting in resemblance in the main part of the case. The right hon. Gentleman appears to labour under the delusion that the measure taken in 1842 was a measure passed in favour of the importer of copper ore, to increase the facilities of bringing copper ore to this country. [Mr. Labouchere.—It has done so.] I say, that neither was it the object of that alteration to do that, nor has it been the effect. You show me that considerable quantities have been introduced; you have not shown the quantities now entered for consumption. You stand upon that distinction—you will not take into your consideration commercial results—you will not condescend to ask whether it was a favour to the importer of copper ore, but because the form happened to be technically the same as that in which a favour might be granted, you come forward and demand that a similar favour should be granted as to sugar. No doubt the whole quantity imported may have increased, but if the right hon. Gentleman will call for a specification of the countries from which it has come, he will find that there has been no increase upon that imported which is raised by the labour of slaves; on the contrary he will find, that in the imports of ore raised by slave-labour there has been actually a diminution, the fact being that the large quantity came from Chile, where slavery does not prevail. But, Sir, I stand upon the practical effect of the change we effected. The change we made in respect of copper ore in 1842, was not intended to be a favour to the producers of copper ore in foreign countries. Our object was to protect the smelting power of this country by a reduction in the duty, to allow them to compete with the rival manufacturers on the Continent. Still it was not for the purposes of protection alone; it was intended to benefit the Treasury of this country, and in our Treasury the difference has been placed. A great distinction exists between copper ore and sugar. It must be borne in mind, that in regard to sugar we do not grow enough for our own consumption, but that in regard to copper ore we are an exporting country. I will give the right hon. Gentleman the very best authority upon the subject. I hold in my hand a number of letters which I have received from divers places. The right hon. Gentleman has taunted us with doing that for copper ore which we refuse to do for sugar—that we gave great additional facilities to the importation of copper ore; and says he, do the same for sugar. Sir, I hold in my hand a letter from New York, in which the writer states that copper ore is now largely sent to that country for the purpose of being smelted, in place of being sent to England. [Mr. Labouchere: Because you have done away with the privilege of smelting in bond.] Undoubtedly; but that is only one disadvantage, and the advantage we have gained is infinitely greater. The intention of the change which we made was to improve the condition of the smelter, or at least that he should be enabled to maintain his position. I believe that he is now in a worse position than he was in 1842, but I also believe it is not on account of the change we made, but is to be fairly attributed to the very depressed state of the markets for his produce. But, Sir, can anything be more vague or unsatisfactory than to say, because you have made a change in the law regulating the importation of copper ore, therefore it is our bounden duty to make a corresponding change in the laws which regulate the importation of sugar, taking no notice of the fact, that by so doing we would give the greatest encouragement to slave-labour, and by a natural consequence to the Slave Trade. Then, Sir, with regard to the amount of inconvenience that this country has suffered, I do not mean to take my stand upon the fact, that the price of sugar has been moderate. The right hon. Gentleman commented strongly on the statements made by my noble Friend, the Member for Liverpool, as to the price. I can only answer for my own estimate, and I leave my noble Friend to reply for himself. In passing I may mention that my estimate—that upon which I founded my calculations—was, that there would be an importation of 207,000 cwts. Now, Sir, that anticipation was exactly verified—the importation was 207,000 cwts. I must admit, that in 1843, the importation was but 204,000 cwts., and I give the right hon. Gentleman the benefit of the difference. But I maintain, that, as on the one hand, if the Government can show that no great inconvenience results from the law in its present shape that is not a sufficient reason for abiding by it, so, on the other hand the infliction of some inconvenience, and the possibility of placing things on a better footing in a commercial point of view, do not justify us in overlooking all other circumstances. Sir, I will not trouble the House with going into the question of prices; but if we take a period of three years since the propositions of the late Government were made, it is no doubt true, that the prices of that period were the most moderate prices of any which have prevailed in this country since the time slavery was abolished—there can be no doubt of the truth of that proposition; but it must also be admitted, that the halcyon days for low prices were in the time of slavery—those were the days for cheap sugar; and the question now raised by the right hon. Gentleman is whether we will again go back to those days, and have cheap sugar from Brazil, and thereby afford every encouragement to slavery and the Slave Trade, which it has been the policy of this country to attempt to exterminate. The right hon. Gentleman wished it to be understood, that the cause of the failure of the mission of Mr. Ellis was to be attributed not to any want of temper or good faith on the part of the Brazilians, but to the dogged resolution of Her Majesty's Government to introduce considerations of humanity, and insist on introducing stipulations concerning slavery, into what was a strictly commercial negotiation. Now, Sir, that was not at all the case. It is very true, that Mr. Ellis failed in effecting the object for which he was dispatched. It is true that, among other things, Mr. Ellis was empowered to deal with the Brazilian Government on terms of mutual advantage, and to tell them that they would be admitted to send Sugar to England upon modified terms, on condition that they made concessions respecting the Slave Trade. But, Sir, it was not on that proposition that the negotiation was broken off—it was upon a demand made by Brazil. And I consider it due to Mr. Ellis to say that there is but one opinion, both on the part of the British public, as well as on that of the Brazilian Government, that there was nothing in that Gentleman's conduct, or in the ability with which he conducted the negotiation, to justify any one in coming to the conclusion that the want of success was attributable to him. The honour, straightforwardness and ability of the hon. Gentleman was acknowledged on both sides. The demand made by the Brazilian Government was this—they said, "We will enter into a commercial treaty with you if you will admit our staple production into the markets of Great Britain at a differential duty"—not of one-tenth of the value; "but at a differential duty of one-tenth more than the duty you levy upon Sugar, the produce of your own colonies." The first demand was for an absolute equality—that their Sugar, the produce of African slaves, should be admitted on the payment of the same duty as the Sugar produced by the free labour of Jamaica or Demerara. Remember, not one-tenth of the value, but at one-tenth of the duty. Suppose, Sir, that the duty levied upon Sugar, the produce of British colonies, to be 25s., the demand made by the Brazilian Government was, that the maximum of duty to be levied upon the slave Sugar of Brazil should be 27s. 6d. Sir, if my recollection serves me right, it was upon that demand being made and persisted in, that it was considered utterly hopeless to pursue the negotiation any further. Now, Sir, although the hon. Gentleman who seconded this Motion (Mr. Ewart) has declared that he is in favour of an absolute equality on the duties on sugar, either from our own possessions or those of other countries, still I think it is the almost universal opinion of this House and of the country, that so long as differential duties are recognised, there is a very strong claim for protection on the part of the sugar-growers of our colonial possessions. Not on behalf of the East Indies, or on behalf of the Mauritius, where the supply of labour is now comparatively abundant, but on behalf of the West India colonies, where the scarcity of labour has been produced by our legislation. I call for protection, and surely that Legislature which caused the deficiency of labour, will not altogether abolish that protection which they now enjoy, and which I think is their due? I may as well state to the House, because it will be made known in the Brazils, what were the terms which were offered by, and the demands made on behalf of the Brazilian Government. And, Sir, I must say that, whether owing to discussions in this House, wherein our trade with Brazil has been treated as the only one which was worth a moment's consideration, or from whatever other cause I do not know, but the Gentlemen who are charged with the Government of that country are labouring under very false impressions upon that head. They would not allow, for a moment, that a Treaty of reciprocity was a fair and equal Treaty between the two nations. Equality of duties on ships, and equality in respect of duties on goods, placing us on a similar footing with other countries, they conceived and maintained was conferring a great boon upon this country, and they demanded an equivalent for that imaginary boon. Now, Sir, it must be admitted, that with regard to Tariff Treaties, there are always very great difficulties in the way. Whether it arise from ignorance or selfishness—or from our always taking a personal in place of a national view of any question, still there are always extreme difficulties in the way of entering into those Treaties; but that any country should deliberately take up the notion that a perfect equality was granting a great boon to the other party is certainly astonishing; however, that was the case with the Brazilians, and the difficulty appeared to us so great, that we considered it hopeless to proceed with the negotiations until a very great change has taken place in the temper and feelings of the Brazilian Government. When the Chevalier Ribeiro arrived in this country, he made the demand which I have detailed to the House, and as a compensation he offered to negotiate with respect to two articles of commerce, certainly of very considerable importance—viz., cottons and woollen goods. The terms he offered were such as to show the spirit in which his Government were determined to act. On the part of the Brazils, he engaged not to tax our woollen goods at a higher rate than 20 per cent.—and upon the cottons of England, which constitutes nearly three-fifths of our trade, he would consent that they should not be taxed over 40 per cent., while he offered us the wide margin of 2s. 6d. on the respective sugars of our West Indian possessions; on the other hand, he generously offered that upon our coarse cottons—for our exports of that article to the Brazils are all for the slaves, and are therefore, coarse—he consents that they shall not be taxed at more than the moderate impost of 40 per cent., and by the same Treaty, every other privilege which we now enjoy was to be given up into the bargain. And, further, Sir, this Treaty which was to confer such a boon upon us, was to come into operation instantly, and abolish the present Treaty, under which we pay only 15 per cent. and are under no restrictions whatever. Now, I have no doubt hon. Gentlemen opposite may suppose that these high duties were to be imposed for the purposes of revenue, and that the 2s. 6d. differential duty was one of protection. But not even that consolation remains to us, because it appears that under the influence of the wild dreams in which they indulge respecting their power and the importance of their trade, a deliberate determination has been taken to raise a commercial marine in the Brazils, and establish manufactures all over the country. Those duties of 30 and 40 per cent. were not to be raised as a revenue and to meet any financial difficulties—no, they were to be levied for the purpose of protecting the manufactures they were about to establish. The right hon. Gentleman alluded to a statement made by some gentleman holding a situation in Brazil similar to one of our directors to the Board of Customs. I will answer this authority by the dictum of one who may be looked on as the Chairman of the Board. In the month of May, 1843, the report was published, which the right hon. Gentleman lauded as being the production of a rational man. To that report was appended a decree under which the commission was constituted. After the constitution of the commission, however, a law was passed, the object of which was, to create a protective system, and under colour of that to raise a cotton manufacture. And what does the House suppose the standard of protection to be?—60 per cent.! And not only that, but those wise and provident legislators, apprehensive that 60 per cent. might not prove effective, thought it right to provide that in case more was necessary more should be granted? Owing to such demands—to such principles being assumed—looking to what was offered in return for our slight of our own colonies, and to the avowed object of raising up a protective system on the most unequal terms, I maintain the Government was justified—setting aside every consideration of Slavery and the Slave Trade—in regarding as perfectly hopeless negotiations on such a commercial basis. I do not, Sir, mean to say for a moment that there was anything offensive in the conduct of the Chevalier Ribeiro—quite the contrary, but he was fettered; and upon commercial grounds alone, leaving out of sight all those connected with humanity, the terms offered were such that no Minister could entertain them. At the same time, when the right hon. Gentleman expressed an opinion that, while a general Treaty of Imports and Exports was broken off, the two countries should continue their commercial confidence and equality of dealing, he fully assented to it as that on which the Government was prepared to act. Now, Sir, with respect to the future, considering the period of the year at which we are, it is my duty to be silent. But before I sit down, allow me for a moment to allude to what fell from the right hon. Gentleman respecting the Chevalier's visit to France. The right hon. Gentleman said, that Chevalier Ribeiro, failing in the object of his mission to this country, had gone to Paris to conclude a treaty with France. Of course it is very difficult for us to speak positively of anything which is not within our own knowledge; but I have high authority for believing that no treaty has been entered into. Let the right hon. Gentleman, as he talks about the probabilities of the case, let him look at America. America has no scruples on the subject of slavery, therefore, whatever duties America retains must be for the purposes of protection alone. Now America puts on a protective duty of 13*s.* a cwt., and, considering that she grew her own sugar, it was evident she took care of her own subjects. [Mr. Thornely : Coffee is admitted free.] Undoubtedly ; but I do not think that our proceeding, in respect of the duties on coffee, can ever become the subject of complaint on the part of the Brazilian Government. Let us look again to Germany. The right hon. Gentleman said, he had taken the greatest pains to investigate the subject. It would be unfair to take advantage of any special source of information, which, as a member of the Government, I might possess, against the right hon. Gentleman. But my source of information is that which is open to all the Members of the House, the Library of the House of Commons. If the right hon. Gentleman had taken the trouble to look into Mr. M'Gregor's compilation of tariffs, he would have found in page 47 of the duties of the Germanic Union, that the duty which is levied in Germany on foreign sugar, and which I apprehend is a protective duty, is no less than 27*s.* a cwt. [An hon. Member : No ; 15*s.*] No ; it is 27*s.*, and not only that, but the course of events there of late years has been adverse to the Brazils ; for about three years ago the duty was only 15*s.*, but within the last two years the Germanic Union have raised it to 27*s.* Thus there is levied in Germany a protective duty of 27*s.* a cwt. [An hon. Member : Not a protective, but a revenue duty.] You may call a rose by any other name, but it will smell just as sweet. However, whether it be a revenue duty or not, what encouragement is it to the trade of the Brazils ? I never heard any advocate for protection on this or the other side of the House say that 27*s.* a cwt. would not be an adequate protective duty for Colonial Sugar. In the case of France, the right hon. Gentleman has fallen into a strange and singular error. From the principles of classification on which the French tariff is formed it is extremely difficult to understand it, and I have no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman has lost his way amidst the multiform distinctions with which it abounds. The French have to protect their own beet-root Sugar against their own colonial Sugar and then they have to protect both against foreign Sugar ; and they do both pretty effectually. On the beet-root Sugar they levy a duty for the purposes of revenue from 25*f.* to 46½*f.* per two cwt., according to quality ; and on their own colonial Sugar they levy a differential duty of 20*f.* to protect the beet-root Sugar, so that there is on French colonial Sugar a duty of from 45*f.* to 66½*f.* per two cwt., according to quality. And what is the duty on foreign Sugar ? The duty on foreign Sugar is, at the lowest, about 65*f.* per two cwt. for the lowest quality, to 85*f.* if imported in a French ship, and 105*f.* if imported in a foreign ship—so that there is a differential duty against foreign Sugar varying from 21*f.* to nearly 40*f.* There is, therefore, not the facility for the introduction of foreign Sugar into France which the right hon. Gentleman would lead the House to believe there is. The French seem to feel the pressure of the system, and passed a law in July which is to begin to take effect on the 1st of August, 1844, to alter it. By that law the duty on beet-root Sugar will be raised 5*f.* a-year till it reaches 45*f.*, the lowest point at which colonial Sugar can be now entered, and, therefore, about the year 1848 the French will be in a condition to deal with the question as one of simple protection. An effort was made to alter the law about twelve months ago, but it failed, except so far as regards a very modified change. Again, if the right hon. Gentleman refers to the state of the trade between the Brazils and France, he will find, that that trade is as unfavourable to the Brazils as the trade between this country and the Brazils. It is true the Brazils receive advantages from the indirect trade with France, but those advantages are not now much greater than those which she receives from this country, and are not likely to become greater, as the French ships are not so suited to that trade as ours are. The returns show this. The imports of England to the Brasils are to the exports from the Brazils to England as five is to two ; while the imports of France to the Brazils are to the exports from the Brazils to France little more than as five is to two. I recal these matters merely because I wish to point out, that as far as respects the duties and the law of France as to Sugar, the Brazils has little more to expect from her than she has from England. The right hon. Gentleman said, that the Chevalier Ribeiro, after the failure of the negotiations here, went to Paris to negoci-

ate a treaty there, and then returned to Brasil. It is rash to infer from Signor Ribeiro's going to Paris, that he went there for the purpose of negotiating a treaty; for the fact was, that he had been for many years in Paris as the resident minister for his Government, and was only withdrawn from his ordinary duties to come over here, and when the negotiation failed he returned to resume those duties. It would be a great misfortune if exaggerated apprehensions went forth through this country with regard to the danger of losing the trade with the Brazils. I do not share in any such apprehension; for considering that the commerce of the Brazils depends mainly on British capital, that every important branch of trade there, is carried on chiefly by British skill and experience—(there may be an exception on this article or that)—considering that the Brazils finds the manufactures of this country cheaper and better than those of any other country, I do not entertain the belief that that country will adopt the suicidal policy of excluding British manufactures from her markets. As to raising up a protective system, nothing can be more ominous or extravagant than the report of the Minister of Finance; but I do not doubt but that the good sense displayed by the Commission instituted for carrying out that plan may tend to modify the views propounded in it. The right hon. Gentleman ought to do Her Majesty's Government the justice to state, that the decree and report which went to establish this new protective system, through the medium of an average duty of 60 per cent. bore date in May last, and were adopted as the ground of the Chevalier Ribeiro's mission, so that they could not be ascribed to the failure of that mission. I do not wish to trouble the House further. I hope that I have not done injustice to the argument of the right hon. Gentleman, or to the manner in which he urged it. In that manner I find nothing to complain of; but as to the general grounds of the Motion, I must say, that while I deeply regret the reservations which the Government is compelled to make with regard to the admission of foreign sugar—reservations, however, which are not made, as the right hon. Gentleman said, for the purpose of making of the Sugar Duties a bulwark for the Corn Laws;—for I feel them to be more invidious every year since so many concessions have been made on other points, while as regards the trade of Brazil I admit its importance, but deprecate exaggerated statements of that importance, for I have seen the mischief which such statements produce when they reach places where arguments are not canvassed with the same accuracy as within the walls of the British House of Commons,—while I say I admit the importance of that trade, and will be amongst the first to embrace any legislative means to extend it, yet I am not prepared, and I trust the House is not prepared—whatever may be the taunts of inconsistency thrown out as to the doctrines which particular individuals may have heretofore avowed—to pursue at all hazards and to all extremities a commercial object, and to throw into utter disregard for, I admit, considerations of great practical weight and moment, questions connected with the interests and happiness of mankind.

Mr. M. Gibson thought the House, after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, would feel that his right hon. Friend had a full justification for interference. Indeed, it appeared to him that great part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, had very little connection with the question now before them. The question they had before them was this:—How were they to deal at the present time with the state of their commercial relations with the Brazils? It was not denied that those relations were now in a precarious position, that they were important, and that there was a deficiency of commercial returns from the Brazils; while the exchanges were affected by the difficulty of a direct interchange with that country. These things were not denied; and he imagined his right hon. Friend simply asked Her Majesty's Government now to take them into their consideration, and to pledge themselves that they would immediately and forthwith adopt some measure to bring this state of things to a satisfactory termination. The right hon. Gentleman said, the good sense of Members must inform them that it was impossible that a Minister should state what reduction of duties he meant to make. He could not understand why, if a Minister meant to make a reduction of the duties on Sugar, or any other important commodity, he should not say so. He could understand why a Minister should not be able to make up his mind to a reduction of duties, but he could not understand why, if Ministers had made up their minds, they should not tell the House so forthwith. They had also been told by the right hon. Gentleman, in the course of his speech, a great deal of what France and America were doing, and a great deal of what the Brazils were doing. The defects in the commercial systems of other countries had been dilated upon, but he contended, if the Brazilian commercial system was bad, our own was worse. Although the right hon. Gentleman might disapprove of their having recommended the imposition of 60 per cent. protection on certain interests of that country, he must not forget that our own protection on colonial sugars was something like 300 per cent. Bad as the protective system of the Brazils was, our own was infinitely worse. Bad statesmen and political economists as they were, we had proved ourselves much more faulty. Though they had put on 15 per cent. on our manufactured goods, the Brazilians did not raise up protective systems as we did. Ministers perceived that the Brazilians were not disposed to be so liberal as they ought to be, and therefore they said they would not do justice to the consumers of sugar in this country. Was ever argument heard of so ridiculous or so unjust? As the right hon. Gentleman had thought fit to attack the policy of that country, it would have been more fair in him to have read the whole of the financial report to which he had referred, instead of quoting one passage here and another there, to suit the views of particular individuals. If the right hon. Gentleman had done so, he would have found that the Brazilian Commission actually went the length of recommending that differential duties, as between particular countries, should not be adopted. They did not recommend that the produce of any particular country should be placed at a disadvantage in the Brazilian market, and it was therefore entirely beside the question for them to be concerning themselves with what might be going on in France, Austria, and Russia, or any other country, for the Brazilians had themselves determined they would admit the goods of all countries on the same footing, though they might recommend a general raising of duties. They had heard a great deal of Slavery and the Slave Trade; but he must be permitted to remark that the course taken by Her Majesty's Government, in reference to this question, somewhat resembled the course which the noble Lord, the Secretary for the Colonies, said the late Government took on most questions of public policy—like the game of thimble-rig. He thought the present was a case exactly in point. Sometimes they were told it was Slavery, sometimes it was the Slave Trade, so that they never knew under what thimble the pea was. When they urged that Ministers had got all the Treaties against the Slave Trade they could expect to get, that they had obtained all the stipulations which could be offered to them in negotiations, then it was replied that it was not the Slave Trade, it was Slavery they were anxious to put down; but now, when Ministers were charged with making a pretext of the question of Slavery, they went back and told their opponents that it was the Slave Trade against which they directed their efforts. Now, he ventured to say, if they were to look back to the proposition of the noble Lord, the Member for London, they would find that it was Slavery on which the present Ministers had grounded their opposition to that plan. They said they could not admit the Sugar of Brazil and Cuba until they had made some attempt to induce those Governments to put down Slavery, that they must have some preliminary Treaty. He was sorry the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had left his place, because he wished to ask him how he proposed to treat with the Brazilian Government, in reference to the question of Slavery, and with whom he would have treated? Could the President of the Board of Trade tell him that there was anybody or any potentate in Brazil that had the power to put down Slavery and the Slave Trade if they were so willing? Unless the right hon. Gentleman could assure them that there was somebody who possessed that power, with whom did he propose to treat? The right hon. Gentleman could not propose to treat with parties who had no power—he could not have meant to raise expectations that could never be realised and hopes that could never be fulfilled. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman, the President of the Board of Trade, as he was an advocate for putting down Slavery by coercion and the interference of foreign countries—what put down Slavery and the Slave Trade in this country? Was it hostile tariffs? Was it the visits of foreign cruisers on our coasts? Was it menacing negotiations? Nothing of this means was used to put down Slavery in the British dominions. He said it was the formation of an enlightened public opinion in this country, the conviction that Slavery was contrary to every law, moral or divine, and to the principles of religion, that caused the suppression of Slavery, and not those external influences to which the right hon. Gentleman seemed disposed to trust. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Peel), now that he had returned to his place, to what authority he intended to appeal in Brazil to aid him in putting down Slavery in that country? Did the right hon. Gentleman think that the Brazilian Government or any party in that country could abolish a system which was so interwoven with all the feelings, prejudices, and pecuniary interests of the great proprietary classes in that empire? The right hon. Gentleman surely would not have offered a condition which he knew could not be fulfilled; either he must have known that there was such a power with which it was right and fit to treat, which could put down Slavery, or he laid himself open to the charge of having proposed the reduction of the Sugar Duties on a pretext, and having given rise to expectations which there was no chance of realizing. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman how that public opinion was to be formed in Brazil, which he contended was the only power in that or any other country which could effectually put down Slavery? He (Mr. Gibson) said that a system of coercion, of intimidation, of hostile tariffs, would retard and prevent the formation of such a public opinion. And why? Because it would enlist on the side of Slavery the spirit of nationality, it would induce the Brazilians to forget the iniquity of Slavery, and look at it only as an institution which they must vindicate in order to assert their national independence. But did not every reasonable man in this country know perfectly well it was not Slavery that prevented Government from altering the Sugar Duties? There was not a man, woman, or child in the British dominions who gave them credit for sincerity in this allegation. Why, who were we, to be talking about Slavery? Was it so long since we were slave-owners ourselves? These duties were imposed at a time when we were slave-owners, and were, therefore, clearly not imposed for the purpose of preventing the import of sugar, which was the produce of slave-labour, to come into competition then with the produce of free labour. Perhaps Ministers would tell the House that they would have taken them off, but for their wish to prevent slave-labour from competition with free. He (Mr. Gibson) did not believe they would; he believed their object at first was monopoly, and that it was still monopoly. If they really meant to prohibit foreign Sugars by a duty, why not say so? why not call the duty a prohibitory duty? Why delude us with the idea that some foreign Sugar might come in under particular circumstances, when we know perfectly well that their object was to exclude entirely the Sugar of all foreign countries from coming into competition with the produce of our own Colonies? The right hon. Gentleman did go the length of saying that all the Colonies must be protected. There was another reason, therefore, besides their unwillingness to encourage Slavery. The Colonies must be protected. And why protect them? He wanted to know why the West-Indian colonies were to be protected at the expense of the consumers of this country. He wanted to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman, the President of the Board of Trade, who was a West-India or East-India proprietor himself. If the right hon. Gentleman were to go to Manchester to buy a bale of cotton goods, would he give more than a Brazilian buyer? [No.] Well, then, he contended that a Manchester cotton manufacturer should not be obliged to give more for a hogshead of Sugar to a West Indian than he would give to a Brazilian planter. Was his hon. Friend, the Member for Weymouth, prepared that a system should be arranged, so that the West-India buyers should give half as much again for a bale of cotton goods as the Brazilian buyer? If he was not prepared to agree to this arrangement, what justice was there in making the Manchester manufacturer pay half as much more for his Sugar to the West Indians than he would to the Brazilians? If you protected the colonial grower, why not protect the Manchester manufacturer, who was obliged to produce cheap cottons or hardwares, and send to all the colonial markets in the world to compete with foreign producers? You could not protect him; and, therefore, he demanded solely that he should not be obliged to give the West-India proprietor more for his hogshead than he could get it for from the Brazilian proprietor. The protection they now gave was that of particular favoured classes; they could not make it general, and, therefore, they must give it up entirely. He thought the system on which they were now acting was of all protective systems the most unjust and indefensible. His right hon. Friend had mentioned, that 114 English ships came from the Brazils with the produce of that country, of which only twenty-one came to England, while the remaining ninety-three visited the ports of all the rest of the world, competing with foreign ships in foreign markets. Why not protect the ninety-three which competed with foreign shipping, and could get no more freight than the foreign ship-owner? The next question that arose was whether this protection did the West Indies any good? It was said the West Indians were in great difficulty and distress. Now, he was prepared to contend, that protection would never extricate them from those difficulties. It had been proved to demonstration, that it was this very protective system, which, by forcing capital into unnatural channels, was the cause of the great difficulties under which they were now labouring. They pretended indeed, that it was the emancipation of the slaves which had embarrassed these Gentlemen, and made it impossible for them to procure a sufficient and continuous supply of labour, and therefore claimed protection for a time until they should be enabled to recover from their embarrassments. He believed it was very generally understood that Emancipation had been paid for. We had given 20,000,000*l.* to liberate the slaves; that account was closed, and could not be re-opened. They said, in addition to that, they must have time. The hon. Member for Dumfries very judiciously asked what time they would be content with? Would they be satisfied with twelve years, with twenty-four years, or with any definite period? No, they would have nothing short of eternity. They would not part with the monopoly as long as they could maintain it. He pitied most sincerely the difficulties under which these proprietors were now labouring, because he believed it was the protective system which had been the means of bringing them into their present difficulties. He would ask his hon. Friend (Mr. Bernal) if he complained of the emancipation of the slaves, whether he would be prepared to go back to Slavery, even as a profitable mode of production? He (Mr. Gibson) would say, that great as the difficulties of the West Indians were, they would be still greater if they went back to Slavery. They would get their labour now more cheaply, and with greater facility, if there were proper arrangements for supplying free labour to the Colonies, than they did under the old system. In support of the view he took of the effects of the protective system in the West-Indies, he would take the liberty of quoting from the Colonial Magazine, just published, a passage written by a Gentleman who was a supporter of the right hon. Gentleman's Government, and favourable to protection and restrictive duties, and all the policy on which Government had taken their stand; he referred to Dr. Binns, who had practised for many years as a physician in the West-Indies. This writer said, having previously remarked that several profitable modes of husbandry had been abandoned, in order to cultivate Sugar,—

"The cultivation of cotton was never unprofitable in Jamaica; but it, unfortunately, was seldom carefully prepared for the market, and, what was still more unfortunate, even when well prepared, it was less profitable than sugar; for colonial Sugar enjoying a monopoly to the exclusion of French, Spanish, and even Portuguese adventurers and capitalists who flocked in hundreds to the West-Indies as the arena of Plutus, in which they were to struggle for a few brief years, and then return to their native land laden with the largest of fortunes, turned all their attention to the sugar cane—perhaps the most unlucky, as it has been to its cultivators the most fatal, of all the products of the tropics. This I consider to have been induced by the monopoly—that very monopoly for which the West Indians so long contended. . . But in endeavouring to accomplish this desirable end, a great principle was overlooked, viz., that it is not only hazardous, but positively baneful, to attempt to establish new manufactures by bounties and monopolies, so that, by the greater prospect of gain which the latter present, to induce capitalists to remove capital from one investment to another. Now this false step has never been retraced in the instances of indigo and cotton, and but for a most providential alteration in the duties on coffee, that valuable necessary of life would have shared the same fate. Had this monopoly not been granted to the planter, and had they not adhered to the undue cultivation of the sugar cane, to the exclusion of nearly all other tropical products, without calling the discoveries of modern chemistry in the value of manures to their aid, and without availing themselves of the assistance of the scanty knowledge and clumsy practice of the worst agriculturists in Britain, where, even at the present day, agriculture scarcely attains the eminence of an art, much less a science, they would not now have been so painfully—I may almost add, hopelessly—in the power of their enemies."

Here was the testimony of a Gentleman who had no desire to promote free-trade opinions, and who was well qualified to speak on the subject, from his experience of the industrial condition of the Colonies—and he thought that they had been reduced to their present state by the operation of monopoly. They neglected the cultivation of a great many articles, for the benefits they were to derive from sugar, and now the day of retribution was come, and they were called on to suffer from the past follies of legislation. But former bad legislation was no excuse for present wrongs inflicted on the manufacturers of this country. They asked what they had done that their rights should be sacrificed to perpetuate a system of monopoly which had been productive of nothing but evil. At the time the laws establishing this system were passed, the manufacturing interest was not represented in the House. It was no answer to tell him that the Legislature had committed a great blunder in giving the West Indians protection, and therefore that the labouring classes must be forced to pay a high price for their sugar, and to find employment scarce. If this monopoly was bad, he would call on Government to state why the present time was not as good for abolishing it as any other. He was sure the right hon. Gentleman would not go the length of saying that he would maintain it to all time, or that, as a Minister of the Crown, he would stand by the monopoly. If not, he must be prepared to say, that a time would come when he would do away with it. Then, what time better than the present? Was there anything in the relations of British trade which made it unfit. But they pay so little attention to the complaints of the trading interests. That day he had presented a petition from the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, signed by the President, which stated that "the petitioners had had the conviction of the impolicy of the differential duties on sugar strengthened by observing the disasters that had resulted to our commerce generally, and had seen with increasing alarm the precarious and tottering condition of the important trade in which this country is at present engaged with the Brazils, and which is at present threatened almost with annihilation. The petitioners begged to inform the House that the merchants engaged in this trade had felt the necessity of diminishing their transactions from the impossibility of receiving adequate returns, as by the enormous duty sugar was almost prevented from being brought into the United Kingdom. They stated that the Brazils only laid 15 per cent. duty on the goods imported from Great Britain, while we taxed their produce 300 per cent. They also submitted to the House that the sum paid by the people of this country in excessive duties on coffee was more than the value of all our exports to the British West Indies together, while the remission of these exorbitant imposts would furnish the means of giving increased employment to the labouring classes, as well as greatly add to the comforts of the labouring classes. The petitioners, therefore, feeling the vital importance of our trade with the Brazils, prayed that immediate measures might be taken to restore it to prosperity by an equalisation of duty on foreign and colonial sugars and coffees." He thought no reason could be assigned why obstacles should be thrown in the way of our trade with the Brazils, unless there was some cause of State necessity, which could not exist in the present case. A differential duty diminished revenue, and shackled commerce. He thought his right hon. Friend was entitled to the gratitude of the country for having called the attention of the House to this important Question, and elicited some declaration as to what the views of the Government were on this important Question. Whether the attempt to abolish the monopoly was immediately followed by success or not, he believed that what had passed to-night would lead the country to see the impolicy of the monopoly, and raise such an expression of public opinion against it as no Minister of the Crown would long be able to resist. He begged to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the position in which he stood with respect to the Sugar Duties. These were about to expire, and a new Bill must be brought in; but if the monopoly was to be persevered in, and the Bill framed on the principle of exclusion, there were those in that House who would offer it the strongest possible opposition. It was perfectly intolerable that any proposition should be made for the exclusion of foreign sugar from consumption at the present time. This country, with all its increased population and vastly greater number of purchasers, did not now consume more sugar than it had done forty years ago, and the laborious poor were not able to obtain so much as was allowed to a pauper in the workhouse. On every occasion, then, in which the forms of the House would justify opposition, he trusted that it would be offered, and he should be prepared to divide on every clause, aye, and on every word of the Bill. If Ministers should come forward in the teeth of justice, and persist in the maintenance of a monopoly which every principle of justice condemned, and which he knew was working the greatest amount of misery in the manufacturing districts, and depriving the labourers and manufacturers of the full reward of their industry and enterprise. They would not be satisfied, therefore, with a simple division on the amounts of duty in committee, but in every stage, on the first, second, and third readings, on the passing of the Bill, the going into Committee, and on every clause, there were Gentlemen who would take the sense of the House against the Bill, with the view of opening their eyes to the enormity of excluding supplies of foreign Sugar from the country. The slavery delusion had been discovered to be a hypocritical pretext; the Anti-Slavery Society itself would not support it; they were against the system of having war cruisers on the coast of Brazil, and they would rather see their doctrines spread by the spirit of religion than at the point of the bayonet—by commercial intercourse than by hostile negotiations. There was no support any longer to be looked for in the country on this ground; Liverpool would give none. He challenged the noble Lord to go to Liverpool and tell his constituency that his real reason for opposing the admission of foreign Sugars was, that he did not like to encourage slavery in Brazil. The noble Lord (Lord Sandon) must know that his constituents had given their opinion that this was a transparent and hypocritical pretext, and that he could no longer be considered, in that House, the representative of the opinions of the merchants, bankers, or manufacturers of Liverpool. If they were to analyze the poll books of the borough of Liverpool, they would find that the noble Lord and his Colleague are not the representatives of the majority of the shopkeepers, and traders, and manufacturers of that place; but of a class of men who did not adhere very steadily to any line of opinion, and whose ruling principle was that of voting for that party which paid the best. He did not accuse any body of excessive bribery and corruption; but he told the noble Lord that the value of his opinion upon this subject was very much lessened by the fact, which he (Mr. M. Gibson) believed to be the case, that the sentiments of the majority of the Liverpool people were very much changed in regard to this question. He believed that free trade doctrines had made very great progress in this country, and the noble Lord would probably find that he would have occasion yet to make some very great modification in his opinions upon this subject, to meet the views of his constituents. He begged to remind the noble Lord, now that the Sugar duties were again about to come under consideration, that he would be expected to take a very active part in the discussion upon that question. He would be called upon to express a decided opinion as to whether or not he would be a party to laying a duty upon an article of very great luxury, almost amounting to a necessary for the working classes, which should exclude it from their use, and at the same time shut out the produce of British manufactures from markets which would otherwise be open to them. On the other hand, he challenged the noble Lord to show that the restrictive system had had the effect of keeping the West India proprietors out of embarrassment; he challenged him to show that it had been of any service in the cause of humanity, as related to the matter of slavery; he challenged him to show that this system did not operate as an injustice and a hardship to the great body of the working classes of this country. The ready answer upon all questions of this kind, whether the Corn-laws or the Sugar duties, was always employing emigration or immigration. When the population was said to be out of employ and starving, the answer was, let them emigrate. When the Sugar market was inadequately supplied, the answer was, let an immigration of free labour take place into the West Indies, and the produce will be greater. Thus these political economists must alter the distribution of the whole human race, before they could arrive at the accomplishment of their peculiar views. They would do anything rather than follow the doctrine which had been enunciated by the right hon. Gentleman opposite himself, of buying in the cheapest, and selling in the dearest market. In fact, the protective system, the pet doctrine of the party opposite, was at the root of all the commercial evils of the country. In the matter of Sugar, he denied that immigration could do anything to remedy the deficiency which existed in the market at the present moment. The only chance which remained was to excite a spirit of competition in the minds of the West India proprietors, by throwing open the market. It was the interest of the growers not to produce largely, but rather to obtain increased prices by keeping down the supply. Lord Elgin, the Governor of Jamaica, had said in one of his reports that he considered that if the proprietors were to put forth increased exertions they might produce half as much again as they did at present. This was, he thought, a fair statement of the case of the West India proprietors; but he hoped that the noble Lord, who expressed a hope that West India proprietors should go out and live upon their estates, did not mean to say that they should wait for any amelioration in this matter till those Gentlemen thought proper to do so. This was a question of right; and whether amendment in the supply was eventually to be obtained by means of immigration, or by the residence of proprietors upon their estates, he could see no reason why they should wait for an act of justice, namely, the equalization of the duties upon Sugar. He gave notice that he should endeavour by all means to obtain this measure of justice, and that he should give every possible opposition to a continuation of the present system of wrong and monopoly.

Viscount Sandon regretted that the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down should have thought it necessary to mix up with the discussion of a question of importance like the present, the little petty politics connected with the representation of Liverpool. He thought the hon. Gentleman might have spoken upon this great commercial question without raking up all the petty tattle, to be heard only in the worst society of Liverpool upon this subject, which was one almost of a personal nature. The charges which the hon. Gentleman now made he had made more than once before, and they had been more than once contradicted. The hon. Gentleman had charged him with having been elected by what the hon. Gentleman was pleased to call the venal portion of the population of Liverpool; and he had more than once informed the hon. Gentleman that he had been elected by a majority of the whole population of that town, and with that he was content. He was once told by the hon. Gentleman that he was not elected by the majority of the merchants of Liverpool: in answer to which he would appeal to the names of all the great mercantile firms connected with the Exchange and the Commercial Rooms, and who were ranked amongst his supporters. He had thus very briefly noticed these accusations—he trusted it would be for the last time, and that the hon. Gentleman would not again force before the House personal questions of this kind. He believed, however, on the present occasion, that the hon. Gentleman had been forced upon this line of debate, by the impossibility in which he found himself of answering the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, for a speech more satisfactory and more exhausting upon every branch of the question it would be impossible to conceive. It embraced the whole question, both in its commercial relations, and as it affected the question of humanity. The hon. Member for Manchester alleged that the alteration of the Sugar Duties would throw open an extensive market for our manufactures. On the other hand, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade showed that even if they were to go so low as to leave a balance of only 2s. 6d. in favour of our colonial sugars, the cottons of Manchester would only be admitted into Brazil at a duty of 40 per cent.. Nor was this a boon so great and so important to the manufacturers of Manchester that it was worth scrambling for, in opposition to a great principle of policy which had been adopted with the general consent of the nation. The hon. Gentleman challenged him (Viscount Sandon) to go down to his constituents at Liverpool, and tell them that he advocated the continuance of the present duties upon principles of humanity. Now he believed, that were he to do so, the result would prove that the opinions of the people of Liverpool were unchanged upon this question, and that they had a strong horror of the encouragement of the practice of slavery, in common with the majority of the community. The fact was, he believed, that the hon. Gentleman was in the habit of mixing in society of a peculiar character, and that he was led at last to believe that the noise and the buzzing which went on around him was the voice of truth. He believed, that the feeling of the great body of the people of this country was unchanged as to slavery, and that if they were appealed to on that subject at another general election they would unequivocally declare it; and he believed that that feeling was so deep-rooted, that mere considerations of pounds, shillings, and pence, would not induce them to sacrifice it. The proposition made by the noble Lord the Member for London, some two or three years ago, would have actually brought the price of sugar to within two or three shillings of what it was at present. Now, he asked, was it worth while to commit a great act of iniquity for the sake of so small a consideration? As to the present state of the market, the case was not so strong for an alteration of those duties as it was at the time when the right hon. Gentleman himself (Mr. F. T. Baring), as one of the Government thought it his duty to impose these very duties. The right hon. Member for Taunton had taunted him with the inaccuracy of his estimates upon this subject. But the fact was, that the right hon. Gentleman had attached much more importance to them than he had ever thought of doing. All that he had pledged himself to was, that the price should never become a starvation price; and he was fully borne out in this, for ever since the period when he spoke the price had been falling. He admitted, that the importations from the West Indies had exceeded his estimate, and he was glad to find it was so; and with proper management the importation might be still further increased. The fact was, that they had the choice between the immigration of free labourers into the West-India colonies or the importation of Sugars the produce of slave-labour into our markets, and he trusted that the feeling of the country would make no hesitation as to which to accept. He admitted, that the state of the Sugar-market was by no means satisfactory. He thought the price of 68s. an extravagant one; but still it was defensible at present upon the score of the abolition of slavery. Hon. Gentlemen might laugh at motives of humanity, but this was not the fashion some years ago. The question was, whether the admission of Brazilian Sugar would not be a boon and encouragement to the employers of slave-labour. He maintained, that it would be, and upon that ground alone he should be prepared to oppose this proposition.

Mr. Bright said, that throughout the evening he had not heard any discussion of this question on its real merits, namely, the effect which it had upon the great body of the consumers of this country. Hon. Gentlemen opposite had tried to put the House upon a false scent, and had talked of the discouragement of Slavery, as if that was the great cause nearest their hearts. But it was somewhat a drawback to the force of these arguments, that the right hon. Gentleman, the President of the Board of Trade, who had used them, was of a family which in former times had been connected extensively with the practice of Slavery. He meant to make no charge against any individual, nor as to any particular acts. He believed that nothing had been done by any of the Gentlemen of that family but what any person who had slaves was necessitated to do; but still the right hon. Gentleman and his family notoriously belonged to a party which had always supported the principle of Slavery, and had kept slaves as long as public opinion in this country allowed them. The noble Lord, the Member for Liverpool, had spoken of the strong opinions entertained by his constituents in regard to this question. Now he recollected that the hon. Member for Evesham, who was sitting beside the noble Lord, had some time back delivered some lectures in Liverpool in support of the cause of Slavery, and that the only parties who supported him in that enterprise were those who supported the noble Lord at his election. He was aware that the Anti-Slavery Committee had sent some kind of memorial or report to the Government against the reduction of the duties on foreign sugars, but he knew also that in this course they had not been supported by many of the Anti-Slavery Societies in the provinces. The Hibernian Society, as well as the Societies of Glasgow, Liverpool, Birmingham, Manchester, Hitchin, Devizes, and many others, had dissented from the Central Society on that very ground, and the Society in consequence of this fatal error had fallen into complete helplessness. From his own experience, he (Mr. Bright), having visited almost every borough in England during the last few months, could safely say that anti-slavery notions would not be a hinderance in the way of any Gentleman who came forward in favour of Free-trade opinions. He declared that he could only express disgust and amazement at the manner in which noble Lords and hon. Gentlemen spoke of the Africans in the Brazils, while entirely overlooking the famishing population in their own manufacturing counties and agricultural districts. Who were they who had scruples about the introduction of Brazilian Sugar into this country? Not the poor, but the rich; and yet the rich were amply fed out of the short supply of that article before the poor could obtain a share. If the President of the Board of Trade, or the noble Lord, the Member for Liverpool, had no scruple to use other productions of slave-labour, how came it that they had a right, by reason of their conscientious scruples, to deny to five out of six of the population a supply of sugar, though coming from the Brazils? Treaties had been spoken of as between this country and the Brasils? Suppose the Brazilians would allow British goods to go into their country without any duty, what effect would that have upon the Government, or upon the Sugar question? They had already almost an open market with the Brasils. The Brazilian Government had done for this country almost everything they could do; they had placed only a duty of 15 or 18 per cent. upon British goods, and yet our trade with that country for many years past had been diminishing. The benefit of the existing Treaty had been destroyed by sacrificing the national good to class and selfish interests. The right hon. Gentleman alluded to the fact that the East Indies and the Mauritius would not long require protection, but that the West Indies would require it, because labour, from its scarcity, was so very dear. But the planters of Jamaica were themselves to blame for any scarcity of labour there. The climate of Jamaica was favourable to Negro population, and yet their numbers had, instead of increasing, greatly diminished. It had been stated, on good authority, that if negro emancipation had been postponed for fifty years, under the treatment of the planters of Jamaica, not a single negro would now be in existence. The cruelty practised was so great, the food so bad, the labour so long and heavy and barbarous, and their sufferings so appalling—that the whole negro race would have been exterminated. Therefore he thought it was a bad argument, that because the negro population of the West Indies was diminished, the people of this country should be robbed of between four and five millions annually to support the sugar monopoly for the benefit of those Colonies—a monopoly that worked injuriously, not only to the consumers but to the trade of the country at large. But it was useless to argue this question. There could be no two opinions upon it that the West-India planters derived the same advantage from this monopoly which the landed proprietors of this country sought from the Corn Laws. Of this the right hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial Benches were as well convinced as he was. They knew that this was merely a question of self-interest, and the country knew it too. However the monopolists might have hitherto succeeded in deluding the people, yet the fact having at length been found out, they might depend upon it there was intelligence and virtue enough in the country to put an end, not only to this, but to every other monopoly by which the people were suffering. He remembered that in the debate on the late Irish State Trials, an argument was put forth by a right hon. Gentleman in justification of the manner in which the Jury was constituted, in this form:—The right hon. Gentleman said, that if he were to bring an action of trespass against a sportsman for galloping over his estate, could it be considered fair that the Jury should be composed of fox-hunters. Now, "You," said Mr. Bright, "have galloped over my estate—you have galloped over not only my interests, but over the interests of 500 or 600 persons I employ, and who are deeply concerned in the prosperity of the Brazilian trade; you have disregarded the vital interests of several hundreds of working men, by whose suffrages I am permitted to speak in this House. I am here, it is true, on my own account. I do not dispute it; but I am here also on their account, and I am pleading before you, not a fox-hunting Jury, but a monopolist Jury; and I am endeavouring to show you that myself, that my workmen, that my neighbours, and my constituents are oppressed by the system you support." Who denied this? The right hon. Gentleman, the President of the Board of Trade, did not say a word about it. He knew a great deal better. The right hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel) must have envied, proficient as he was in the art, the dexterous manner in which his right hon. Colleague evaded the real question at issue. I never heard so many words put together with so much smoothness, at the same time entirely avoiding the only question in discussion. What did it concern the people whether the Whigs or the Tories were the more culpable? It was not enough for the country that the present Ministers could prove that the Whig Ministry was as bad as themselves. The country did not return Members to that House merely for the purpose of ascertaining that the Whigs were no better than the Tories. No; they were returned for the purpose of discussing these great questions, and for the purpose of settling them without favour or regard to any partial faction or interest whatsoever. Now, you monopolists all hang together. You are discussing the question of Sugar to-night, but it is the same interest, whether it be Corn, Sugar, or Timber. [Colonel Sibthorp: "Oh, oh."] I believe that sound came from the gallant Member for Lincoln. I met a large number of farmers at Lincoln, and I asked one of them, who objected to the repeal of the Corn Law, what he would do with the Sugar Duties, supposing the Corn Law should be repealed? "Why," said he, "I would repeal it to-morrow." What! total and immediate?" "Certainly," said he, "total and immediate." I asked a sugar planter on the Ministerial side of the House, who was only a sugar planter, what he would do with the Corn Law if the Sugar monopoly were to be abolished? "Why," said he "sweep it away immediately." "What! total and immediate repeal?" "Yes; certainly." Thus it appears that neither of these interests really cares one straw for the rest, any longer than they all work together, and, therefore, I charge all the monopolists—whether of Corn, Sugar, Coffee, or Timber—with combining to uphold a most iniquitous system, regardless of the duties they owe to their constituents and to their country. And what—continued the hon. Member—was the condition of the country now? Was it a matter of indifference to the Government that our trade with Brazil should be any longer sacrificed? Had they so soon forgotten that two years ago 200,000 working men came out of their houses in Lancashire asking this question of the Government, "What do you mean to do with us?" He (Mr. Bright) lived among them, and knew them well. He knew that it was by reason of their industry that the rents of the landholders had been doubled. Whenever distress existed in the manufacturing districts the revenue of the country declined. No state of agricultural prosperity ever yet maintained the revenue of the Kingdom, and unless the Government regarded those districts with a more favourable feeling, he could tell them that consequences would some day come, for which they would have received but a small compensation from the Corn Law or the Sugar Law. In addition to this there was Ireland. Could a great question like this, affecting as it did an extended and extending population, be discussed without taking into consideration the condition of Ireland? No doubt hon. Gentlemen would gladly forget that subject, but circumstances would not permit them. They must have the fact pointed out to them that there existed in Ireland two millions of people who were in the condition of absolute pauperism. This possibly was a matter of indifference to hon.

Gentlemen on the Ministerial Benches. He (Mr. Bright) could make great allowances, considering how they had engaged themselves during the recess, for their not being sware that two millions and a quarter of the people of Ireland were paupers. Now, the Brazilian trade was capable of employing a vast number of the population of Lancashire, and that population was very greatly increased by the people of Ireland, who were driven from their home by the brutality of the landlords of Ireland. He had at this moment many families in his employment, who could give horrible and appalling accounts of the circumstances under which they were driven from their country. With all that pauperism in Ireland—with a million of paupers in England and Wales—and with an enormous mass of poverty in Scotland—it was astonishing that a Government who professed to feel for the sufferings of the people would aggravate, instead of seeking to alleviate, those sufferings by still further depressing that trade which alone could afford them employment. The average wages of the agricultural labourers in many places did not amount to more than 6s. a week. Let the hon. Member for Dorsetshire get up and quote the statement from the pamphlet of the hon. and Rev. Godolphin Osborne upon that point. He (Mr. Bright) did not give them the authority of a Leaguer. The Rev. gentleman was no member of the League. He wrote "honourable" before his name, and therefore, it might be supposed that he was connected with the aristocracy; and he bore the title of "reverend," which showed that he was connected with an Establishment which was not particularly democratic in its tendencies, and yet that gentleman thought himself justified in making public a most appalling state of things, existing amongst the agricultural poor of Dorsetshire. ["Question."] Question! Yes it would become a question indeed some day, if it was not already a question. It might be even now important that some steps might be taken to ascertain the cause of the deep-seated discontent in the agricultural districts. This discontent, this poverty, this lowness of wages, and the crime and outrage upon property that existed in those districts were so great that the farmers were nearly all obliged to keep private watchmen on their farms and estates. Was it denied? Look at the newspapers. Did not almost every newspaper from the agricultural districts give appalling accounts of incendiarism, and did they not state that Mr. So-and-so was obliged to appoint persons to watch his property. Now, he maintained, that this terrible calamity of pauperism, want of employment, and destitution, existing in Ireland, and spreading through the agricultural and manufacturing districts of England, was chiefly owing to a want of trade arising from that system of monopoly which the House appeared to be determined to keep up. And for what? To protect class interests. But it was the business of that House to disregard those class interests, whether they were those of West-India planters or of landed proprietors: and if the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues had any sort of wish to be called Statesmen, and not the mere Ministers of a class—they would feel it to be their bounden duty to see why the great mass of the population of this country were so suffering and so injured, and if there were power and intelligence in the Representatives of the people to devise some measure by which a remedy for those evils might be adopted. Neither he nor the people had any interest in dear corn or dear sugar, neither had they any interest in dear cotton goods, for dearness is not necessary to good profits and wages. He was fully persuaded that those who maintained the existing system of monopoly wholly mistook their own interests as well as the interests of the country; and it was because he thought so that he should support the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Labouchere), and although a majority might now be against it, yet the Ministers of the Crown must not think that they were, therefore, in any way removed from the terrible and awful responsibility which rested upon them when they used to perpetuate a policy so injurious and unjust.

Mr. F. T. Baring began by adverting to what had fallen from the noble Member for Liverpool (Lord Sandon) on the subject of a proposition made while he (Mr. Baring) filled the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer. With any remarks upon that proposition he should not trouble the House farther than to say that it was founded upon joint considerations of revenue and trade; he had been told at the time that it would be ineffective, from not making a sufficient reduction in the price of sugars to the consumer, but whether it would have been so or not, the Government had now the means of affording a reduction of duty on all Sugars, which the then state of the public finances would not have allowed. There was, however, one point to which the House would give him leave to advert. It had been used as a taunt against the late Government that the Members of it had changed their opinion on the fitness of protecting colonial Sugar. To this he would reply, that the continuance of the Sugar Duties in 1840 was only a continuance of them for one year; and such was not only the intention of Ministers, but it was distinctly stated to parties representing the West-Indian interest—so much so, that he recollected that it excited a great deal of dissatisfaction, inasmuch as it was asserted that this short renewal indicated that the Government meant ultimately to deal with the question in the way of permanently reducing the protection. The noble Lord (Lord Sandon) had said that he had listened to the speech of the right hon. President of the Board of Trade with great satisfaction. He (Mr. Baring) had heard it with much pleasure from its fluency, its clearness, and the entire absence of irritating topics; but he looked back with anything but satisfaction to one part of the address. From the narration of the right hon. Gentleman he was grieved to learn that the result of the late negotiations had made the case hopeless for the future. The right hon. Gentleman had stated the proposition on the part of the Brazilian Government, and he (Mr. Baring) should probably have concurred in the opinion, that it could not have been accepted by Great Britain. What had been said, however, had left the impression on his mind, that the question had been dealt with at too late an hour. Some years ago, by dealing liberally with the great staple articles of Sugar and Coffee, a better feeling might have been produced in the Brazilian Government towards this country. He now saw, with the sincerest regret, that the Government of the Brazils was about to attempt that course of protection for rising manufactures which he was convinced it would not have pursued if a more liberal policy had been earlier adopted by this country. Never were two Empires better adapted for friendly commercial relations than Great Britain and the Brazils. He was not inclined to overrate the trade of the Brazils; but whatever might be its amount in the present state of our manufacturing interest, it ought not to have been neglected. The opportunity had been lost, and let the offers hereafter be what they might, he apprehended they would come too late. He had heard with satisfaction that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) entirely gave up the question of Sugar, in a commercial point of view, for he admitted that nothing could be more unsatisfactory than our position with regard to that commodity; but he (Mr. Baring) could not help recollecting, that in the resolution formerly brought forward by the noble Lord (Lord Sandon) the question of the supply of Sugar was also introduced. The question whether this country was sufficiently supplied with sugar, was one of great importance, and to it the right hon. Gentleman would, perhaps, have done well to address some part of his speech. He had watched the Estimates of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject of the supply of Sugar, and although he would not go through the figures, which would be rather a dull process, he might be allowed to advert to some few of the results. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had favoured the House with a calculation applicable to several years, but as to the years 1841 and 1842 it was to be observed that the right hon. Gentleman had been mistaken to the extent of some 1,160,000 cwt., or above three months' consumption. This was no slight error; but with regard to the last year there was apparently some confusion in the report of the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer but it seemed that on the whole three years, 1841, 1842, and 1843, there was a deficiency of the promised supply to the extent of above 2,000,000 cwt. or full six months' consumption. It might, however, be urged, that it was of little consequence whether the Estimate were right or wrong, as long as the supply was adequate to the demand; but no man who had attended to the figures could doubt that the consumption of Sugar had been stinted by the smallness of the supply. He would take the average supply of the last five years; the quantity of colonial Sugar imported annually beyond the quantity consumed was only about two days' consumption; this fact of itself seemed clearly to establish that the demand was stinted by the shortness of the supply. That was not all—for the consumption must be compared with the amount of population. Would the right hon. Gentleman contend that the consumption of Sugar had kept pace with the increase of population? Would any man acquainted with the habits of the people of Great Britain and Ireland, assert that the national consumption of Sugar at this moment ought not to have increased in comparison with 1831? When Mr. Huskisson brought forward his proposal on the Sugar Duties, he stated that there was a large mass of the poorer population of the three Kingdoms, which did not use Sugar at all, and such was evidently the case now, when it appeared from the returns, that while the consumption of tea and coffee had increased, the consumption of Sugar had not augmented in anything like the same proportion. The consumption of tea and coffee had each increased about 33 per cent. since 1831, while the increase in the consumption of Sugar in the same period was only 7 per cent. He would take an illustration from tobacco, in which trade there were loud complaints of smuggling and adulteration, and yet what was the result! In spite of smuggling and adulteration the increase in the consumption had been 17 per cent., while as he had before stated, the increase in the consumption of Sugar was only 7 per cent. In fact, every man who allowed himself to view the subject impartially must be convinced that the consumption of Sugar had been stinted by short supply, which short supply had been occasioned by monopoly. The topic of Slavery had been so constantly introduced into this question that it was hardly possible to avoid it; but he would ask, if, on the grounds urged by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) in relation to Sugar, it was possible to defend all the anomalies belonging to our system of trade? The importation of Copper, for instance, had been mentioned, and the right hon. Gentleman with his usual acuteness, had drawn a distinction in favour of Copper as compared with Sugar. The same ingenuity might, hereafter perhaps, establish some distinction between Brazilian and United States Sugar; but who would say that it was possible fairly and honestly to carry out the principles laid down as to Slavery and Sugar? He had listened to the right hon. Gentleman's case as regarded Copper with great attention, but how could the right hon. Gentleman maintain his own principles; for who would now say, when smelted copper was notoriously imported, that no copper from Cuba entered into the consumption of the country. In truth, it was impossible for the right hon. Gentleman to carry out his own principles; and the question, how far foreign countries would give Great Britain credit for perfect honesty of purpose, he had no great difficulty in solving, when he recollected how they universally beld that in her proceedings regarding the Slave Trade she had been governed mainly by regard to her own interests. It would be impossible for the right hon. Gentleman to negotiate with effect any commercial arrangements if the question of Slavery was to be a bar—how could the hon. Gentleman deal with any article, the produce of the United States, if it were necessary to make similar proposals as in the case of the Brazils. Almost the only commercial treaty the right hon. Gentleman had entered into was with Russia, and though slavery, strictly speaking, did not exist in that empire, still the system of serfs in Russia seemed almost to render it necessary upon his own principles, that the right hon. Gentleman should require of the Czar certain regulations to ameliorate the condition of the serfs. The right hon. Gentleman stated that he particularly objected to slavery in the Brazils, because it encouraged the Slave Trade, and he knew of no possible means of getting rid of the Slave Trade but by the abolition of slavery. According to the right hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel) last year some immediate measures were required for the amelioration of the condition of the slaves, with a view to the ultimate abolition of slavery. He did not mean to speak with the slightest disrespect of those who, in this country, entertained a strong feeling on the subject of slavery. On the contrary, he entertained the highest admiration for the motives which influenced them; and it was the duty of every man to do his utmost to get rid of such a scourge to human nature. But was the proposed condition likely to produce the slightest effect? Supposing the Brazils had accepted the offer of Great Britain; suppose it had undertaken to introduce immediate measures for the amelioration of the state of the slaves with a view to the ultimate abolition of slavery, how would it be possible for this country to take care that the measures were carried into effect? It might be well to obtain treaties, and to procure the insertion in them of articles in themselves adequate to the end, but how could Great Britain make sure that the articles would be observed? Were they to leave it to the Brazilian government to take measures for the amelioration and ultimate abolition of slavery. Had we not an example? Our Treaties for the Abolition of the Slave Trade were perfectly adequate, why were they not effective? Because the slave-trade was encouraged by the authorities of the Brazils—we could not put it down without the honest co-operation of the Brazils? Did they suppose that a mere treaty with the Brazilian government would carry into effect a new arrangement, while we could not enforce stipulations already existing with all our exertions, with our armed steamers, with our cruisers, and with all our means? How, then, could they enforce any stipulation as proposed to the Brazils, were we to interfere? Was there seriously any intention of such a proceeding? Would they propose to send protectors of slaves to be established throughout the Brazils? Were there to be a minister and consul for the purpose of constantly hearing complaints in the Brazils on the subject of slavery, and carrying them to the government of Brazil? Would they propose to adopt a system so much calculated as that must be to promote quarrels, and hostility, and bad feeling towards England? Would that course, he asked, be called one that was at all likely to lead to an increase of the popularity of England in Brazil? But he would put a case to illustrate that. When we had in operation the system of slavery in the West Indies, would it be permitted that a foreign country should become the protector of that population, and by treaty give them a right to do so? Would it be permitted that they should have such privilege secured by treaty, and that they could constantly make representations to their Government, and complain of us that we had broken faith when we refused to do as they should ask? So strongly did he feel on the subject, that he believed if such a treaty were entered into on our parts as gave such a right of interference when slavery existed in our West-India colonies, it would have had the effect of uniting one of the most powerful feelings, namely, national pride, with slavery, and postpone for a considerable time, instead of advancing its total abolition. At that late hour, and seeing the hon. Member for Dover opposite apparently so anxious to express his opinions on the subject, he should not trespass longer on the attention of the House.

He could not, in conclusion, refrain from expressing a hope that the right hon. Gentlemen opposite, if they saw that the Sugar Duties must be altered, would be wise in time, and that they would not in such case refuse a measure which might have been with more success introduced two or three years ago—that they would not postpone till too late adopting a course calculated to preserve and strengthen the relations between England and a most important country.

Sir R. Peel: Sir, I promise the House to make no observations not immediately bearing upon the question before the House, and I also promise the House to imitate the general tone and temper employed by the right hon. Gentleman who last discussed the subject. I will not even follow him in his criticism upon the failure of the Estimates of Chancellors of the Exchequer, which has become, by the way, rather a favorite subject of late with the right hon. Gentleman. Nor will I stop to inquire whether he be himself at all open to any recrimination. I hope all future Chancellors of the Exchequer may be as free as my right hon. Friend; for, indeed, I know no one to whom the right hon. Gentleman's strictures may more aptly be applied than to himself. Nay, don't challenge me to the proof, because I really do wish to imitate the general tone which this debate has taken. One word also, with respect to the observation of the right hon. Gentleman—that it was particularly unfortunate that we did not, some time since, adopt a more liberal policy with regard to the West Indies. The right hon. Gentleman repeated this statement three or four times. At first he dealt quite in generalities; but towards the close of his speech; when he began to warm, he became more definite, and fixed the period as “the last two or three years.” If the right hon. Gentleman had given a little more space, and had said three or four years, so as just to have included 1840, it would have been much better. That was the year in which two right hon. Gentlemen opposite, offered a most strenuous opposition to the proposal of the hon. Gentleman who seconded the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman, and it might have been fairer to have included that year. With respect to the criticisms of the right hon. Gentleman upon the Estimates of the Supply, I would say, upon the whole, that I think he is hardly warranted in the statements which he made with respect to the diminished consumption of sugar. With the permission of the House, I will refer to the statistics; for if we were to determine without reference to figures in these matters of a financial and commercial nature, and were to indulge altogether solely in that which might excite the largest share of interest, I fear we should never come to a satisfactory result upon the question. Just let us look at what has been the consumption of sugar in this country. Take the quantity of sugar taken out and retained for home consumption, for that is the fairest way of judging. From the year 1837 the quantity was—

		Cwts.
In the year 1837	..	3,954,767
— 1838	..	3,909,600
— 1840	..	3,592,518

In 1841, certainly, the quantity was increased to 4,065,724 cwt., but that was on account of the deficient consumption of the preceding year—a great impetus was given to the consumption of 1841 by the falling off in 1840. In 1842 the quantity was 3,876,343 cwt., and last year it increased to 4,045,105 cwt.; being a greater consumption than was ever known in this country at any former period, with the single exception of the year 1841, and the increase in that year is to be accounted for, as I have already said, by the deficient supply of the year preceding. But even in that year the consumption was only 20,000 cwt. more than it was last year. Therefore we have this fact before us, that in the year ending January, 1844, the consumption of sugar in this country was greater with one exception than in any year of any former period. At the same time particular estimates may have failed. We may have been wrong as to the supply from the Mauritius or the East Indies; yet, upon the whole, we have the fact of the greatly increased consumption of last year. Did that increased consumption equally increase the price? On the contrary, we find that

		Per cwt.
In the year 1839	the price was	39s. 2d.
— 1840	..	49s. 1d.
— 1841	..	38s. 3d.
— 1842	..	37s. 3d.

And 1843, the year of the greatest consumption, also coincided with the lowest price, for in 1843 the average price of sugar was only 34s. 1d. per cwt. In an-answer to the criticism of the right hon. Gentleman, then, we have these two ascertained facts—that in the last year we have the greatest consumption of sugar, and at the same time the lowest price. Now, I am bound at the same time to say that I do not think this at all conclusive against your increase of the consumption of sugar in this country. I am bound to admit that I think scarcely an article can be named the reduction of the price of which could add more to the material comforts of the population. I am bound to say, though as the consumption has increased, the price diminished, that forms no conclusive argument against a still greater increase of the consumption, in consequence of a still greater diminution of the price. At the same time I must ask hon. Gentlemen not to press as an argument against us that the supply has diminished and the price has increased, whereas the fact is, that the supply has increased and the price diminished. My statement is borne out by a comparison between the year 1842 and 1843. Of course, there has been a slight increase of population, but I have not taken remote periods. The right hon. Gentleman asks the House of Commons to vote an Address to Her Majesty, “representing to Her Majesty the great importance to this country of the trade with the Empire of the Brazils, and humbly praying Her Majesty to adopt such measures as may appear best calculated to maintain and improve the commercial relations between the United Kingdom and the Brazils.” It is very extraordinary that the House of Commons should say, that one in particular of all the countries of the civilised world should be represented to Her Majesty as of great importance in respect to trade. I do not undervalue the importance of trade with the Brazils, though I think it is rather exaggerated. But why should the House of Commons select that of all countries in the world for the purpose of making an Address to Her Majesty? Has it any reference to recent negotiations? If it has, I decidedly object to it, because it appears to imply an approbation of the course Brazil has taken. What are the facts? The manufactures of England being introduced at a duty of 15 per cent the Brazils make this proposition:—“You shall not impose a duty upon our sugar when imported into England which shall exceed by one-third the amount of duty you levy upon colonial Sugar; that is to say, if you levy a duty of 10s. upon colonial Sugar, we protest against your levying more than 11s. upon Brazilian produce. But at the same time we demand that you permit us to raise the duties which are now levied upon British manufactures from 15 per cent. to 40 per cent.” That is the proposal of the Brazils, and that proposal we have rejected. But if the House of Commons does not intend to take the Brazils abstractedly as a country most important, but to affirm that what the Brazils has proposed to us is reasonable and just, then I hope that the House will pause before it does anything that will sanction such a proposition. If there be an opportunity for negotiation between this country and Brazil, I should be sorry to say a word offensive to the Government of Brazil. I trust that better and more liberal feelings may exist; and I will not say a word which could by possibility check or counteract that feeling. But if you want to make Brazil unreasonable, if you want to induce Brazil in her negotiations to insist upon all that she has hitherto insisted upon, then you will pass a resolution which must have that practical bearing. But in what a position will you then place the Executive Government? I presume that the House is not going to take that step. But if the House of Commons thinks it wise to fetter the Executive Government with a resolution, with an Address to the Crown, which, if it means anything, implies an approbation of the course persisted in by one party, and that the adverse party, in what position shall we be placed? Will not the Brazils tell us, “You are fettered by a resolution of the House of Commons. Here is a resolution, not expressly stating, but certainly implying approbation of our course”? I earnestly advise the House to leave this matter in the hands of the Executive Government, and not to encourage the Brazils to persist in unreasonable propositions, and tie up the Government from acting freely according to circumstances. The House of Commons is invited to affirm this resolution upon various arguments, some of which have, I think, been effectively answered by my right hon. Friend. The right hon. Gentleman opposite warned the House in a solemn and emphatic address, and drew a sad contrast between the conduct of Germany and England. He said, "See what a course the Zollverein has taken. There is your great competitor. Contrast the facility which the Zollverein gives for importations from Brazil with your system!" The right hon. Gentleman invited the House of Commons to vote for this Address upon the assumption that the Zollverein imposed a duty of only 15s. per cwt. upon Sugar imported from the Brazils. The answer of my right hon. Friend was—"You are wrong. The duty is not 15s. but 27s." The right hon. Gentleman talked of the Treaty recently concluded between France and Brazil. I know that a statement to that effect has been made, probably for the purpose of creating an effect in this debate this night; and the contradiction will perhaps have as little effect to-morrow. I can only state that, as the Minister of England, I cannot positively deny that such a Treaty has been signed in Paris; but this I know, that no notification of any such Treaty has reached this country, and that it is wholly unknown to the French Ambassador here. Those who recollect the difficulties of France on this question will be able to form an opinion upon this point. I must say that a bolder statement was never made by man than that of the Member for Manchester. He said—"I give you warning that the manufacturing and commercial classes will decide against you in imposing any discriminating duties on Sugar the produce of slavery and free labour. The Anti-Slavery Society is decidedly adverse to you. They condemn the whole system of intervention by force for the suppression of the Slave-Trade. Your armed steamers are odious; and we do not want to encourage morality by war." I had an idea that I should hear that argument brought forward; and if I had been asked to name the man who would adduce it I should have named the hon. Gentleman. Now, here is a document which I myself received from the Anti-Slavery Society within the last month—and I hope the hon. Gentleman will permit the Anti-Slavery Society to speak for itself. It runs thus:—

"The Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society deem it their duty at the present moment to lay before you their sentiments in relation to a subject intimately connected with the great object of their pursuit—the extinction of Slavery, and the consequent cessation of the Slave Trade throughout the world."

I am perfectly ready to admit, that a part of this communication confirms the statement of the hon. Gentleman, that the Society is not in favour of armed means to suppress Slavery, and I will read the passage which bears upon it:—

"As for armed intervention and treaty stipulations, all experience shows that without having effected, and without holding forth any promise of effecting, the abolition of the Slave Trade, they have immeasurably aggravated the ferocity and destructiveness of it." "Under the influence of these considerations," (it goes on), "the Committee present their definite and earnest request to you, Sir Robert, as the head of Her Majesty's Government, that a measure may be prepared for admitting free-grown produce from all parts of the world into the British market, on the same terms as the produce of British possessions."

It concludes by saying—

"In any event, however, the Committee cannot but desire that no relaxation of existing duties on the produce of slave-labour shall be allowed. It is enough, the Committee think—it is far too much—that Great Britain now does by her unparalleled commerce to sustain and foster this gigantic evil, and it is time that her course was in the opposite direction; but, at all events, it may be hoped that this country will be spared the dishonour, and the world the misery, of any further aggravation of this horrible system by our means."

This is a communication from the Anti-Slavery Society, which, the hon. Gentleman told the House of Commons, was much too wise to seek to inculcate morality by means of discriminating duties between the produce of free labour and that of slave labour. [Mr. Gibson: I do not admit that that Committee represents the sentiments of the Anti-Slavery Society.] I thought the hon. Gentleman left an impression on the House that the Anti-Slavery Society objected to discriminating duties. Well, all I will state further upon this document is, that it bears the venerable name of Thomas Clarkson. I very much doubt whether the Anti-Slavery Society would disclaim the sentiments expressed by him, and, I apprehend, expressed on behalf of the Anti-Slavery Society. I do not say that those opinions ought to be binding on the Legislature. I do not mean to attach more weight to them than they deserve. But I protest against the hon. Gentleman quoting the authority of the Anti-Slavery Society in support of his views, when I prove upon the authority of the Anti-Slavery Society that their views are entirely opposed to his. The right hon. Gentleman who brought forward the present Motion, says, it is an indication to us to make a declaration on the subject of the Sugar Duties. If that was his object, why did he not express it? If his object was to recommend a reduction of the Sugar Duties, why did he not speak out? why had he not resolution enough to say so? Had he done so, I admit that I should not have considered myself entitled to accept of the invitation. I should not have considered it my duty to enter into a detailed consideration of our relations with Brazil, or anticipated a discussion which may properly take place when the subject comes again before the House; the right hon. Gentleman having given notice, that unless we consent to place the duties on Brazilian Sugar and Sugar the production of Cuba on precisely the same footing as that on colonial Sugar, he will offer opposition to every stage, to every line, to every word of the Sugar Duties Bill. I do not apprehend that in that course he will receive the support of hon. Gentlemen opposite, for in their last proposition they established a discriminating duty between Brazil and colonial Sugar. The right hon. Gentleman thought that prohibition ought to be avoided. He thought the prohibition much too high; but I did not hear him contend then, or since, that there ought to be no distinction between Sugar the produce of our colonial possessions and Brazilian Sugar. I ask what could be more injudicious than to propose the same rate of duty on the produce of foreign countries, where the Slave Trade is practically and notoriously carried on, as on the produce of our own possessions where we have abolished slavery? As for the Government wishing to protect a monopoly, I fully admit that the Government and the Legislature, so far as individual interests are concerned, have a perfect right to deal with this question of Sugar; but where we have a Colonial Empire I don't think we ought to be called upon to disregard all the social considerations which are connected with the subject. The hon. Member may say that there is only one question to be decided, namely, the interest of the consumers, or whatever will tend most to cheapen the price of Sugar; but I doubt whether that is the most economical view of the subject. I doubt whether, disregarding all considerations, being reckless of all consequences, and supposing your course to involve our Colonies in distress and anarchy—I doubt whether you can release yourself from the moral obligation imposed upon you, or whether by the adoption of that course you would be consulting a true economy. To say that the interest of the consumer is to be alone attended to, opens a very grave question; and I will say to the hon. Member for Durham that if his principle be good, we should have made no effort whatever for the extinction of slavery; because if you revive slavery in your own possessions you will have Sugar cheaper. If cheapness be the only object, why do we go to an immense expense for the purpose of enforcing the observance of Slave Treaties? or why do we not allow our own Colonies to import slaves? When they did so, Sugar was cheaper than at present, and you were not only enabled to supply this country, but had a surplus. To say then that the consideration of cheapness and the interest of the consumer is alone to be attended to is an impeachment of every act you have hitherto attempted with a view to extinguish the horrors of slavery and of every shilling you have expended in the prosecution of that object. We are now about to adopt a different plan for the extinction of the Slave Trade. We admit to the Anti-Slavery Society that our efforts have hitherto been in a great measure unavailing, and that whatever force you may station on the coast of the Brazils, even though it should remain there, it is nevertheless difficult to prevent the landing of slaves by thousands and tens of thousands: for the authorities connive at it, self-interests are too powerful, and the Treaties are not fairly executed. It has been suggested to us by Captain Denman, whose exertions are entitled to universal thanks, and whose suggestion is founded upon his own local experience of the coast of Africa—that without increasing our force we may act much more efficaciously for the suppression of the Slave Trade than we are doing at present. What he proposes is to establish a blockade of the whole of that part of the Western Coast of Africa from which slaves can be taken, in order that a constant guard be kept upon that coast. He as well as some local authorities gives it as his opinion that by withdrawing from the coast of the Brazils and the West Indies, a considerable portion of the force now employed there, and stationing it on the coast of Africa, by having steamers at the mouths of rivers, and by visiting every part of the 600 miles of coast—their opinion, and my confident belief is, that by this course we shall be more successful in suppressing the Slave Trade and preventing the evils and horrors of the passage, than by any course that has hitherto been tried. That experiment we are about to try, and God grant it may succeed. I trust the House of Commons will be influenced by higher and more honourable feelings than those expressed by the hon. Member for Durham. Looking to the course which we have pursued, at the sacrifice we have made in taxing this country with 20,000,000*l.* for abolishing slavery in our own dominions, I do trust that this House is not prepared to follow in the wake of that hon. Gentleman, and to admit the proposition, that every shilling that has been expended in mitigating this great moral evil, has been unjustifiably expended, or that we ought to look at no other consideration than what the price of Sugar is to the consumer. There was a time when persons of that hon. Gentleman's persuasion—for the honour of the persuasion I say it—when the members of that persuasion would not have uttered such sentiments. Nay, I am perfectly certain, that there was a time when they would, to a man, have disclaimed such a doctrine. Last year we passed an Act prohibiting the employment of British capital for the production of articles in which slave-labour was concerned, and to prevent a British subject so employing capital from recovering any debt that might be due to him. We are now about to try a great experiment to prevent the spread of slavery in Africa; but if you are prepared to admit Brazilian Sugar into consumption in this country, pass what laws you please respecting British capital, you will at once have a great aggravation of the evils both of slavery and the Slave Trade. The hon. Gentleman says, that we cannot guarantee that the Brazils will act upon our regulations; but I think I can suggest a mode by which much may be done towards the ultimate extinction of slavery. Suppose the Brazils consented that after a certain day all children of African negroes born in that country, should be free—suppose they consented that some means should be taken, by a mixed commission, for instance, for the purpose of insuring the enjoyment of that privilege to those actually so born, or suppose the commercial privileges granted by us depended on their adherence to this regulation—supposing these things, it is surely not impossible to conceive modes which might lead to the extinction of slavery, without that constant, perpetual, and vexatious interference with the domestic legislation of another country, which I fully admit is open to great objection. Sir, I shall forbear troubling the House any further at present. Opportunities will arise for a further discussion of the subject, not merely on the Sugar Duties, but I am bound to say, it may be discussed when the time arrives for a general view of the financial state of the country, without waiting for the expiration of the Treaty or its renewal. When my right hon. Friend brings forward the Budget, he will declare to the House his intentions with regard to the Sugar Duties. I shall at present abstain from all reference to that point, wishing, with my right hon. Friend, that no inference may be drawn from my present silence, reserving to the Government entirely the power of taking its course with respect to those duties as with regard to any other duties; but this I will say, that, as the existing treaty with Brazil will expire in the course of November next, I do hope the House of Commons will by a large majority, negative a proposition which can have no other effect than to encourage the Brazils to demand from us concessions which we believe to be unreasonable, and to prevent us from exercising that unfettered control which the Executive Government ought to have in negotiations with other nations.

Viscount Palmerston said, it was not his intention to detain the House long in discussing the question, which, he thought, had been brought by hon. Gentlemen on the other side within a very narrow compass. But he must, in the first place, vindicate his hon. Friend, the Member for Durham, from the unjust attack of the right hon. Baronet. The right hon. Baronet imputed to the hon. Member for Durham, that the line of argument he had used proved that he was insensible to the cause of humanity in reference to the Slave Trade—that he dwelt only on the economical advantages which would be conferred on the country by abating the price of Sugar 1*d.* per pound, and that he no longer entertained those sentiments which he and those belonging to the Society of Friends had heretofore professed on the subject of slavery. He

(Viscount Palmerston) appealed to the House whether anything which his hon. Friend had uttered could justify that imputation. If the Government were as sincere in their desire to suppress the Slave Trade, as he was persuaded the hon. Member for Durham was, its extinction would be effected sooner than was at present probable. The right hon. Baronet had been pleased to pay an ironical compliment to his right hon. Friend, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, upon his ability in framing Estimates; but the compliment might be well returned by his right hon. Friend, because his right hon. Friend could not attempt to compete in this respect with the right hon. Baronet; but to return to the question. As he had before said, it had been put on very narrow ground, because all those hon. Members who had spoken from the Treasury Benches had abandoned the financial argument. The right hon. Baronet said, that the consumption of Sugar might be greater in one year than in another; but even the right hon. Baronet had not contended that the supply from our Colonies was as great as the consumption of the country demanded, or that our consumption was as great as it would be if more facility were given for the exchange of foreign Sugar for British commodities, by which the trade of the country on the one hand, and the comforts of the lower classes on the other, would be greatly extended. This was the position advanced by his hon. Friends, and he was not going to add anything to the conclusive arguments which had been advanced by them. But the question had been reduced by the Government to a question of negotiation. He stated on a former evening, that in the Speech from the Throne, in the beginning of 1842, the Government departing from the usual custom by which negotiations are seldom adverted to unless they are terminated by treaties, had announced, that they were negotiating with several Powers, and that they trusted those negotiations would end in arrangements that would tend to increase the commerce of the country. He stated on that occasion, that they had never heard with what Powers those negotiations had been carried on, nor what had been the result thereof; but it now appeared that the negotiation with the Brazils was one of them; and he should certainly like to hear, on a fitting opportunity, what the others were. This negotiation with Brazil, to be sure, had not been conducted either with great success or dexterity. The right hon. Gentleman who had answered his right hon. Friend at once, as it appeared to him, threw over as advantageous, those treaties which were termed tariff conventions. He seemed to acquiesce in the opinion of his right hon. Friend that such arrangements were difficult of accomplishment, and that it was better to confine ourselves to more general treaties. Stipulating for reciprocal equality in regard to duties on navigation, and placing the contracting parties respectively on the footing of the most favoured nation. But the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government had throughout the whole of his speech argued the matter as if the object of the Government had been to obtain with Brazil, a Tariff Treaty and a Tariff Treaty alone; upon this material question, therefore, the Members of the Government seemed to entertain very different opinions. It was stated that the government of the Brazils had made some very unreasonable proposals. He thought the proposals stated by the right hon. Gentleman as having been made by Brazil, were unreasonable terms, and such as the Government were right not to accept; but if the late Government had been allowed to go into a negotiation with the Brazils in 1841, upon the footing on which the Government of that day meant to negotiate and proposed to the House to enable them to negotiate, it was not assuming too much to say, that they could have negotiated on much better terms, and they would have found the Brazilian government in a better temper for entering into a Treaty than it was now, after so long a delay. At that time, the existing Treaty had three years to run; but the Brazilian government knew now that it would expire in November next, and it is obvious, that on that account, they were more likely to have negotiated on reasonable terms then than now. He could only say, that although the late Government were not furnished by Parliament with the means of going into any detailed negotiation with the Brazilian minister in this country, yet judging from the language of that minister, he thought that if the British Government had then been able to hold out a fair prospect that the prohibitory Duties on Brazilian produce would have been reduced, the Government of Brazil was not indisposed to enter into just arrangements, as between the two countries. But when last this question was discussed, between the present Government and the Brazilian Envoy, the British Government appears to have made the commercial arrangements depend upon the prospective abolition of the condition of slavery in Brazil. It was argued last year by the Government, that it would be improper to admit Sugar, the produce of slave-labour; but now they shifted their ground, and it was not the Abolition of Slavery, but the suppression of the Slave Trade, at which they aimed. He was willing to meet them on that ground. What this change of position might indicate as to their future measures he would not inquire; if it was to be a step towards the relaxation of the restrictions on trade, he should be glad; they did not state what their intentions were, but perhaps those who had heard them might be able to form some shrewd guess on the subject. But the course pursued by them in their late negotiation was not consistent with their present argument. Their object is now stated to be to make the admission of Foreign Sugar conducive—not to the abolition of slavery, but to the suppression of the Slave Trade, and yet the proposition which they made to Brazil did not touch the Slave Trade; but was intended to effect an ultimate abolition of slavery—for they proposed that the government of Brazil should enact some municipal law, which should improve the present condition of the slave, and should also lay the foundation for his future emancipation. Still they said, that this proposal was consistent with their present argument, because they asserted that any Measure which laid the foundation for the future abolition of slavery, must tend to diminish the Slave Trade. This would be true, whenever, by such means the condition of slavery would be abolished, but in the intervening time the effect would be just the reverse. For let the House suppose for argument sake, that the Brazilian government had agreed to those terms—what would be the effect of this upon the Slave Trade? Their reason for refusing to admit Brazilian Sugar was, that if Brazilian grown Sugar was imported into this country the increased demand would give encouragement to extended cultivation, which could only be carried on by a greater importation of slaves, and thus a stimulus would be given to the Slave Trade. Now, this consequence would equally have followed even if the Brazilian government had agreed to the terms demanded by the present government. He would admit, that if they could abolish the condition of slavery, the Slave Trade would necessarily cease; but supposing the Brazilian government had agreed to the perspective measures proposed by the British Government—within what period does any man imagine that slavery would have ceased to exist in Brazil? Why the youngest person now breathing would probably not have lived to see the day. And what during that interval would have been the effect produced on the Slave Trade? Why necessarily to increase it. For within the whole interval between that time and some remote period when slavery should be abolished in the Brazils, would there not have been annually an enormous increase in the importation of slaves for the extension of Sugar cultivation? Therefore, he said, on their own showing the proposition of the Government was absurd. He was supposing that the Brazilians had not only agreed to the proposal, but had executed it bona fide; but what right had they to suppose that? What was their arguments about the Slave Trade? They said they had by Treaty from the Brazilian government, with regard to the Slave Trade, almost every condition that they could ask for its suppression. The first article of the Treaty of 1826 between this country and the Brazilian government for the suppression of the Slave Trade, said that from that time it should not be lawful for any Brazilian subject to engage in the Slave Trade, and that any Brazilian subject having so engaged should be deemed and treated as guilty of piracy. If the Brazilian government had performed the engagements they had entered into with this country, could any reasonable man believe that the Brazilian Slave Trade would not long ago have ceased. If the Brazilian government had dealt with the Brazilian Slave Trade as piracy, it was childish to suppose that it would not long since have been put down. But if the Brazilian government violated their Treaty engagements in this way, could there be any reliance placed on any local arrangements for the administration of Brazilian law for the gradual abolition of the condition of Slavery, from which the right hon. Baronet seemed to suppose such advantages would result. One of the conditions of the Treaty which he had just referred to was, that slaves captured on board slave-ships, and taken into Rio Janeiro, and condemned by the mixed Commission, should be free. Had this condition been fulfilled? Quite the contrary. It was notorious to all the world, that thousands of slaves thus emancipated by the mixed Commission at Rio Janeiro, and whom the Brazilian government was bound by Treaty to protect and maintain in a state of freedom, were as much slaves as those furtively introduced into the Brazils. Therefore, when the Government stated as an objection to letting in Brazilian Sugar, that by doing so it would be lending encouragement to the Slave Trade, and yet asserted that they would have let it in if the Brazilian Government had promised to enact some internal regulations with respect to the treatment of slaves in Brazil, he said, that such a line of argument was utterly valueless, and was a mere pretence set up for refusing to let Brazilian Sugar come into the markets of this country, and was one which any reasonable man should treat with scorn and ridicule. The fact was, that with all this apparent zeal against the Slave Trade and slavery, the real reason and ground of objection was a desire to favour those who were the active supporters of the Government; it was a wish to obtain and secure the support of the West-India interest, which was the real ground of objection to the extension of trade which this admission of foreign Sugar would produce. But they had been told, that, having colonies, this country should not deal with them with too rough a hand, by the enactment of measures which might be good in themselves, but which might have an injurious effect on the social condition of the colonies. This was an argument which was urged over and over again against the propositions here made for the abolition of the Slave Trade, and afterwards was repeated on the question for the Abolition of Slavery. In the latter case this argument was urged with a stronger appearance of reason than it could be in the present case, for it was contended, that by the Abolition of Slavery, a large population of uneducated persons was to be let loose on society who were not prepared for freedom, and who, by their unruly turbulence, might disturb the internal tranquillity of the colonies. But Parliament did not listen to such an argument; and was the House now to admit the principle that foreign sugar should not be admitted to the markets of this country, because the competition that would arise therefrom might be disadvantageous to our colonies? Why, surely after this country had paid such an enormous sum for the emancipation of the slaves in the British West-Indian islands, it was entitled to all the advantages which would result from the trade which would be created from the abolition of the prohibitive duties on foreign sugar. He, therefore, said that the question could not stand on the ground on which the Government wished to place it, and that the conditions which had been demanded from the Brazilian government were perfectly nugatory on the showing of the right hon. Baronet and his Colleagues. The only ground on which they proceeded was, the perpetuating the Sugar monopoly; for the line of argument which they used to justify them in refusing to let in foreign Sugar, was no more than declaring that this monopoly should be everlasting. If they were to wait until they could induce the Brazilians to abolish slavery, and the Slave Trade, he would venture to say that no person who was then a Member of that House would live to see the day when foreign Sugar would be admitted into the home markets of this country. The fact was, that the Government was very liberal in their speeches and in the enunciation of principles, but when they were called upon to put their professions to the test, they fell back on their old prejudices. They told the House that the principles of free-trade were the principles of common sense — that the only sound principle of commerce was to buy in the cheapest market, and to sell in the dearest; but when they were urged to apply this principle, even in a modified degree, to corn and sugar, they fell back on the prejudices of the monopolists, upon whose shoulders they came into office, and on whose support they depend for a continuance of that power which they employ so little for the welfare of the country, and they refuse to adhere to the principles which they had so ostentatiously put forth. The right hon. Baronet had made one objection to the Motion of his right hon. Friend, with respect to which he had no doubt but that on consideration his right hon. Friend would be willing to accommodate himself to the wishes of the right hon. Baronet. The Motion of his right hon. Friend was, "That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty, representing to Her Majesty the great importance to this country of the trade with the Empire of the Brazils, and humbly praying Her Majesty to adopt such measures as may appear best calculated to maintain and improve the commercial relations between the United Kingdom and the Brazils." Why, asked the right hon. Baronet, pick out the Brazils for this purpose? Why do you by making such a selection, encourage the Government of that country to resist a Tariff Treaty which the Government intended to propose to them. Now, he was sure that his right hon. Friend would meet the right hon. Baronet half way on this point, and if it would remove the objection of the right hon. Baronet to this Motion, he had no doubt that his right hon. Friend would generalise his proposition, and would thus remove this ground of complaint. The Motion of his right hon. Friend would then be "That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty representing to Her Majesty the great importance to this country of the trade with 'all foreign states,' and humbly praying Her Majesty to adopt such measures as may appear best calculated to maintain and improve the commercial relations between the United Kingdom and all other countries in the world." He was sure, that if this alteration of the Motion would be satisfactory to the right hon. Baronet, his right hon. Friend would cheerfully agree to such an Amendment, and would receive it with pleasure, as coming from the Treasury Bench.

The House then divided on Mr. Labouchere's Motion: Ayes 132; Noes 205: Majority 73.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

PETITIONS PRESENTED. By Lord Brougham, from Antrim, and Ulster, in favour of Dissenters' Chapels Bill.—From Dunbar, respecting Schoolmasters (Scotland).—By the Earl of Haddington, from Haddington and Berwick, against Alteration of the Corn Laws.—From Halthwaite, for Protection of the Agricultural Interest.

EXPENSE OF PROSECUTIONS AT PETTY SESSIONS.] The Marquess of Lansdowne rose to move for a return of the Fees to Clerks at Petty Sessions, similar to that which had been already agreed to in the other House of Parliament. It had been his intention to have included in that return an account of the Fees paid to the Clerks of the Peace, but, upon consideration, and as that return had not yet been called for in the other House of Parliament, he did not mean on the present occasion to extend the return to Clerks of the Peace; and he should, therefore, confine it to Clerks of Petty Sessions. The returns which he was about to move for had reference to a subject of very great importance to the poorer classes of the community, for he believed that nothing bore more heavily and with greater severity upon the poorer classes, than those demands for fees. He did not mean to say that those who obtained such fees made an unjust demand, or one that they were not entitled to make; but this he could say, that the result of those demands for fees, was, in many cases, an absolute denial of justice to a great number of persons in this country. He could state to their Lordships, from numerous examples of the severity with which these demands pressed on the poor, an instance which happened in his own neighbourhood. A person was committed on a charge of felony, and it turned out, upon investigation, that he had not committed felony at all; but the consequence of his being charged with felony was, that his mother, a poor woman, had been put to an expense of 14*l.*, although her son was acquitted. Another case occurred recently in Buckinghamshire, which forcibly illustrated the effect those demands produced as regarded the poorer classes. Two persons prosecuted for an assault of an atrocious nature; that assault was proved, and the result was a trifling fine upon the person convicted of this aggravated assault, whilst large costs were demanded and obtained from the persons who had the virtue—for it was in that case a virtue—of prosecuting the person who committed the assault. It would have been better for them if they had not prosecuted the man for the assault, but had assaulted him in return, as it cost them so much to prosecute him. Costs, which to their Lordships might appear trifling, were of the greatest importance to the poor who have such insufficient means of paying them. In Gloucestershire, another case of a similar nature happened. A young woman was charged with an assault by a man, but it turned out that he was the offender, and the girl was desired to prosecute him. She did so, and the result was, that in addition to the grievance she had already endured, she was obliged to pay a large sum in costs. The costs, in consequence of obtaining a conviction for the very smallest penalties, were sometimes very large, amounting to sums that never could have been intended by the Magistrates who adjudged those penalties. The noble Marquess concluded by moving for a return from the Clerk of each Petty Session of the Amount of Fees received by him for the last three years; a return of the Convictions during the same period, specifying the Amount of Fine or Penalty and of Costs in each case, the purpose to which the Fine was applied, or term of Imprisonment, and Expense of Imprisonment.—Ordered.

PRIVY COUNCIL APPELLATE JURISDICTION.] Lord Brougham said, that in moving the Second Reading of the Bill relative to the Appellate Jurisdiction of the Privy Council, which he had introduced a few days ago, he should address their Lordships as shortly as the nature of the subject and its great importance would permit. His observations would come under two heads,—first, with respect to the constitution of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and next with reference to the object of the Bill then before their Lordships. It was perfectly true, that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council had given general satisfaction to the suitors, and it was admitted that it was exceedingly well adapted to meet the objects for which it was originally formed. He should first observe upon the constitution of the Committee. It consisted of a certain proportion of Judges, of the present Lord Chancellor, and others who had been Chancellors, of the Chief Justices of the three Courts of Common Law, of the Vice Chancellor, and several other learned Judges, as well as of the Judges of the Admiralty and Arches Court, and they had a power of calling in as assessors certain Judges who had belonged to the East India Bench. That Court had been found to work well, and had been productive of great public advantage in hearing the numerous questions which came before it—questions of very different natures, and often embracing various interests of vast magnitude. In dealing with these various questions the Court was called on, not only to administer the law in Admiralty cases, and cases which came under the law of the Ecclesiastical Courts, but it had also to administer at one time Dutch law, at another time French law, at another time the Roman law, at another time a mixture of those laws, at another the laws and customs of India, and they were called on to do this in cases, such as in our colonies or possessions abroad, where the interests affected were very important. The range of their Jurisdiction was most extensive. Before them came cases connected with the Admiralty Court, the Ecclesiastical Courts, the Equity Courts, and the Courts of Criminal Jurisdiction. Before them were brought affairs of life and of property between man and man. But in every instance they were enabled to consult and to take the opinion of those Judges who presided over these different branches of Jurisprudence. But, independent of causes arising in this country, when it was considered that we had twenty-nine colonies (with their hundreds of thousands of subjects), from which various legal questions were brought on appeal to the Judicial Committee, added to which there was India, with a population which we did not count by hundreds of thousands but by millions, and when it was borne in mind that not only questions as to the right of territory of villages but of a whole Zeimandary, with an extent of territory almost amounting to a kingdom—when these things were considered, it was natural to suppose that questions of vast importance and no small difficulty were continually under the consideration of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. He recollected it to have been his duty to give judgment in a case where property to the amount of 800,000*l.* or 1,000,000*l.* was at stake. Where interests so great were submitted to their decision, they ought assuredly to render the tribunal as perfect as possible. Now admirably constituted as this tribunal was for great causes by its powers of adaptation, of calling in the aid of any judges most conversant with the subject matter, it was ill-adapted to despatch ordinary business by the way of judges constantly sitting. It was like Addison, who said, he had not a shilling in his pocket though he could draw for a hundred pounds, alluding to his want of conversation on ordinary topics. The noble and learned Lord then referred to the nature of the Bill. It was, he said, calculated to give to the Court a permanent President; but it was calculated to do what was of still greater importance—to supply a deficiency, which he was sure the country would not object to do, and which had arisen in this manner:—When the Court was originally constituted, two Common Law Judges were placed upon the Privy Council and made Members of the Judicial Committee, viz., Mr. Baron Parke, who, in consequence of the present state of business in the Common Law Courts, was unable to attend, and Mr. Justice Bosanquet, who had retired from the Bench, after a most distinguished professional career. The consequence was, that the Committee were thrown upon the assistance of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Campbell) and his right hon. Friend Mr. Pemberton Leigh. Their assistance was entirely voluntary and gratuitous, and to demand it the public had no manner of right whatever. This was a deficiency which ought to be supplied, and which he thought might be done by adding to the Court two Puisne Judges, who could, of course, be moderately paid. Into the details of this part of the case he would not now enter, particularly as the subject would be more properly one for the consideration of the Select Committee. He now came to deal with a most important part of the statement which he had to make to their Lordships. He should say nothing about the addition to the powers of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in matters of Patent. The Patent Jurisdiction which had been conferred on the Committee of Privy Council in 1835 had worked well, and all agreed that it might be advantageously extended in the way mentioned on the discussion of Lord Dundonald's petition the other day. But that was not the only matter being both legislative and judicial in some sort, which could properly be referred to the Judicial Committee. He considered that divorces might, with very great advantage to all parties, and to the public at large, be referred to the Judicial Committee. Their Lordships were aware that at present that Committee formed the last appeal in cases of divorce à mensa et thoro; he wished that it should be the tribunal in which cases of divorce à vinculo matrimonii should be adjudicated. Divorce was a matter altogether judicial in its character; and though Divorce Bills were called Acts of Parliament, they were by no means like measures of a legislative kind, and should therefore be referred to a Judicial Tribunal. This transfer of the Jurisdiction, under proper regulations, would have the effect of saving a vast proportion of the expence, which now attended the separate legislation necessary for every divorce à vinculo, and removing most of the other difficulties, inconveniences, and vexations thrown in the way of an injured husband seeking to relieve himself of an adulterous wife. The Law of England said, that marriage was not to be dissolved, and the remedy at present afforded in cases of adultery was not at all inconsistent with that principle which required a new law to be passed in particular cases and in particular circumstances. But the remedy was at present exclusively confined to the rich; no poor man, no man even of moderate fortune could avail himself of it. England was, in this respect an exception to all other Protestant countries. In Popish countries the whole question stood upon a different footing—the Church allowing of no divorce, because it regards marriage as a sacrament which we do not. Whether in those countries there was less adultery or not he could not say. But of Protestant countries this was the only one where so extraordinary a state of the law existed. In foreign countries where marriage was held to be (as here) no sacrament, and where further it was not held, as it was here, to be indissoluble, the punishment of the adulterous party, and the relief of the injured person, by full divorce, was, upon sufficient proof, available without any great difficulty; and such was the case, also, in Scotland. How stood the case in this country as to full divorces? For 135 years preceding the year 1835, the number of Divorce Bills passed was only 170, an average of only about  $1\frac{1}{4}$  per annum, or five in four years. In the last five years, the number had been much higher, there having been on an average nine every year. Now, if these one and a quarter Divorce Bills, or even these nine Divorce Bills per annum, represented the actual number of cases in which divorce was called for by adultery, the fact would be one of the most gratifying description, and we might well pride ourselves upon the unexampled morality of the English people—but he greatly doubted whether such was the fact. When he looked at Scotland, with a population of only one-eighth that of England, and with a standard of morality certainly not inferior to ours, he found that the average of divorces there, in the last five years, had been seventeen instead of one and a quarter, or fourteen times more than those in England; but did this prove that the people of Scotland were less moral, chaste, and religious than those of England? By no means; it only showed that the expence in the one country was very different from what it was in the other. In Scotland, a divorce à vinculo, where the parties resided in Edinburgh, might be obtained for 25*l.*; where the witnesses had to come from the country, it was 35*l.*, or thereabouts. Here in England, such a divorce, when the suit was not opposed, cost from 500*l.* to 600*l.*, or 700*l.*; when opposed, it cost from 1,000*l.* to 1,500*l.*, or 2,000*l.* Now, was this a remedy open alike to the rich and the poor, or was it not rather a remedy from which all but the rich were excluded? As to the previous proceedings in Doctors' Commons, he (Lord Brougham) altogether objected to them as futile and expensive. The interrogatories there were no check to collusion, no sifting of the true merits of the cases, no evisceration of evidence, no security against fraud. As a practical illustration of the gross defects and injustice of the present system, he would mention the case of a professional gentleman who, having the misfortune of an unchaste wife, had first proceeded against the adulterer, and obtained a verdict, and then against his wife, and obtained a decree of divorce à mensa et thoro. Every step of the proceeding was attended with difficulty, and vexation, and fearful expence. His expence began with a bill to his own procurator; she, under the advice throughout of her paramour, a professional man, met this by an opposition which run him up another bill, the heavy expence of which had to be defrayed, not by her or her paramour, but by the injured husband, who had to pay the costs both of his own and his wife's proceedings—for such is the law. He succeeded in this stage. The wife then appealed to the Dean of the Arches, at the expence, as before, of the husband, and the husband had to pay the expenses of that appeal—the tables being turned, he being made the defendant, and having here as before to pay both bills. Well; but he succeeds a second time. Then they appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; the Court of Delegates and the Commission of Review having been abolished, that Judicial Committee of the Privy Council had become the Supreme Court in such cases. It already possessed an appellate jurisdiction à mensa et thoro, but he proposed to transfer to it an original jurisdiction à vinculo matrimonii. But, to go on with the case. The husband succeeded again in obtaining a confirmation of the sentence of divorce à mensa et thoro, and had to pay for his wife's appeal and his own resistance to it; but by this time his means were so exhausted that he had not the money necessary for coming before their Lordships for that remedy which his wrongs demanded—a full and complete divorce à vinculo matrimonii, from a brazen, worthless woman. Nor was this all. During the whole proceeding (and the wife and her paramour had managed, by the aid of the law, to protract it over no less than five years), the same law had compelled the unhappy husband to allow alimony to his wife and her paramour—not to her paramour, certainly, but he, of course, participated—it was, of course, that the husband should allow alimony, so that all the time the guilty parties were actually living upon the means of the man they had so injured. He got rid of this expence, of course, at last, but then he had no 1,000*l.* or 2,000*l.* to prosecute his case before the House of Lords, opposed as it would have been by the other parties, nor even the 500*l.* or 600*l.* which a divorce, even if unopposed, would have cost him. And, accordingly, up to the present time, he was not sure at any moment but that some butcher's or baker's bill might be brought in for "necessaries" supplied to his wife, for such she still was; and though the decision he had obtained would ultimately be a bar to such a demand, yet he might be greatly annoyed in this way. There was another thing to be observed. Suppose—and the supposition was very probable—that an estate in fee simple or fee tail say of 3,000*l.* a year should devolve upon him, and he were to die before he had procured a divorce à vinculo, which proceeding would require the best part of a year, in that case, dowry not being barred by a divorce à mensa et thoro, the abandoned wife might become entitled to 1,000*l.* a year to spend with her paramour. It was impossible to conceive a more unsatisfactory state of the law than this, one running more counter to all rational principles, sinning more grossly against all justice, more frequently violating every principle of equity which the law ought immovably to adhere to, departing more utterly from that equal justice which should be dealt out between man and man, and equally to all the different classes of the community: more unfair and oppressive towards the poor man, because he is poor; more calculated to shelter the rich man, merely because he is rich. What more certain means of encouraging immorality could be devised than that of sheltering criminals from the consequences of their crimes, and tormenting the innocent sufferer because he has not money enough to purchase the whole remedy which the Legislature would otherwise dole out to him? The very delay, the very waiting for the progress and termination of litigation, was the sure means of perpetuating and propagating the offence, as in the instance of that profligate woman, whom he had mentioned without naming her, who flew in the face of all decency and all truth, and appealed to the Dean of the Arches. What did such persons say when thus attempting to palliate their crime, and to set traps perhaps to get money from the victim of their conspiracy? Upon what did they make their calculations and build their hopes? "Oh! he can't proceed against us—he is not a my Lord This, or a Sir William This, or a Mr. That; he is not a man of 5,000*l.* a-year; he cannot go into Doctors' Commons, or to the Houses of Parliament, and pay away thousands for a divorce Bill. Therefore we can do as we like: and if he proceed we shall get our alimony for five years. It will cost him perhaps 5,000*l.*, and after all he may be foiled in the end." And this was the inevitable consequence of the present system. But to go back to Scotland. Did any mortal man believe that there was more adultery in Scotland than in England and Ireland? It was ridiculous to suppose that. The fact was notoriously the contrary. The crime hardly existed there at all. Yet, with a population of only two-and-a-half millions of people, there were seventeen divorce Bills in one year, and only nine for the rest of the Empire; that was fifteen times more divorce Bills in the one country than in the other. He had consulted with eminent Scotch lawyers, of great practice, and they had assured him that the crime of adultery was of very rare occurrence, and they asserted that there was hardly known such a thing as adultery not visited by a judicial sentence and by the divorce of the woman; an object which in England, except in rich cases, was scarcely to be obtained. Did their Lordships, the Corinthian capital of society, the choice Aristocracy of the land, the Patrician order of Great Britain, think so meanly of themselves and their morals, as to suppose that adultery was confined to their own class? If so, they were unhappily most mistaken in their self-abasement. Constantly were applications made to the legal profession, by persons in the poorer classes, who complained of the infidelity of their partners, often under most aggravated circumstances; but all such were effectually precluded from obtaining justice by the present most unequal state of the law. Why, then, commit the worst of all errors, and carry candour to so ridiculous an extreme as to pretend—for it would be only pretence—that their Lordships and their families were morally more impure in respect to this matter than those who were far inferior to them in society? The case of the poor man was peculiarly hard. Their Lordships could watch over the education and moral training of their families; they could command both the leisure and the means of so doing; but the tradesman, who was compelled to go to his shop, or the artisan, who must attend to his work, was forced to leave the children of his marriage with the woman who had dishonoured his bed, or to strangers and servants, or peradventure, to the care of the parish. Now, the object of the Bill he was introducing was to relieve all those parties who suffered injustice under the existing law; but those parties were not the only parties who ought to complain of the present state of the law. He proposed to transfer the jurisdiction in cases of divorce à vinculo matrimonii to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, but still to maintain the prerogative of their Lordships' House. The party would be required to present a petition to that House, a petition which would cost nothing, praying the House, with the consent of the Crown, to refer the case to the Judicial Committee. But, he said, their Lordships had a right to complain of the state of the law as well as other parties, for anything more unsatisfactory than the manner in which business of this kind was conducted he could not recollect. In another House the expense was quite as great, but the business was a mere mockery; nobody attended to it. He was told that since he had left that House they had ceased to examine the witnesses as before; a copy of the evidence before their Lordships' House was merely sent in, and it was all a mockery together. If, however, the proceedings were carried on by the Judicial Committee, as he proposed, the effect would be a more close and satisfactory sifting of the evidence, and a greater security against collusion, and perjury, and fraud. That Committee would also have the assistance of the Consistorial Judges, who would discuss the inferior and trifling matter of divorce à mensa et thoro, and examine the witnesses viva voce, in the presence and through the instrumentality of the counsel for the parties. It would be seen, hereafter in Committee, whether they would require that which he considered as worthless, the divorce mensa et thoro in Doctors' Commons. Therefore he had said nothing of it in the Bill, leaving the Judicial Committee to call for that sentence and evidence in the Court there, as their Lordships did, generally speaking, though not compelled to do it. There were other provisions in the Bill. Divorce Bills, in adultery cases, were not the only judicial matters arising out of the present system of legislation. Estate Bills and Naturalization Bills might also be referred to the Judicial Committee with advantage. Therefore there was a general provision to enable either House of Parliament to send to the Judicial Committee any matter they thought fit, with the consent of the Crown, to be obtained by an Address. Undoubtedly, the effect of all this would be a great increase of business in the Committee; but if he was right in holding that the remedy of divorce at present was inaccessible, on account of the expense, and the delay, and the difficulty, then they ought to rejoice in the prospect of entirely altering that state of things, and rendering remedial measures in the cases mentioned easily attainable, and the increase of divorce Bills would be a great benefit as showing that a needful remedy had hitherto been withheld and now was granted to the subject. There were several additional clauses suggested by practitioners which might make improvements in the practice of the Judicial Committee; but he should leave details to be dealt with in Committee. He thanked their Lordships for their attention to his address, and would conclude by asking them to agree to the second reading of the Bill.

Lord Cottenham observed, that he should like to hear the opinion of his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack before he proceeded to offer any observations to the House.

The Lord Chancellor said, that after the appeal just made to him by his noble and learned Friend he would shortly state his view of the subject, but in doing so he wished it to be understood, that by assenting to the Motion to refer this Bill to a Select Committee, it was not by any means his intention to pledge himself to the support of the principles involved in it. He would first state his views with respect to the machinery—if he might so term it—of the Bill for the remodelling the construction of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Whenever the subject had come before the House, either when he was in or out of office, he had always stated his opinion to be, that there should be a fixed head to this tribunal; he therefore thought that it would be desirable, that this Measure should be sent to a Committee up stairs, with the view of considering whether such an arrangement should take place, and if so, what provisions should be made. He repeated that he retained his former opinion, that in every tribunal for the administration of justice, there should be a fixed president; and emphatically so in this case, for in this tribunal, where so many systems of law were administered, it was most desirable that a person should preside, who would devote his whole time to making himself master of the various systems of law that came under consideration. At present it was merely a voluntary Court, and the Judges, though summoned, might attend or not, at their pleasure. His noble and learned Friend, who attended that tribunal in a judicial capacity, attended most constantly and zealously to the business brought before them; but it did not follow that this would always be the case, and the time might come when it would become necessary to ask for the appointment of regular Judges in this Court. He, therefore, thought it proper, with regard to this subject, that the Bill should be read a second time and submitted to a Select Committee. As for the question of extending the duration of Patents, he confessed that he had not made up his mind on the subject; and he conceived that the point might well be considered in Committee up stairs. The jurisdiction at present given to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council with regard to Patents had worked extremely well, and it was well worthy of consideration whether it could not be enlarged with advantage. As for the other and very important question of Divorce, he must say, that it was as important a question as could come before Parliament; and he did not wish to be called upon to express an opinion on the sudden on the subject, as the question was one attended with so many difficulties, that he was most anxious not to go into the subject without having had an opportunity of considering the matter. His noble and learned Friend, however, should recollect, that by assenting to this proposition to refer the Bill to a Committee, he did not bind himself to its support at any future period. The observations of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Brougham) on the subject of Divorce, were entitled to the fullest attention; but till he saw and examined the details of the proposed plan, and had considered how it was to work, and had compared the proposed new system with the actual system, he could not express an opinion on a measure of such vast importance; therefore, as a member of Her Majesty's Government, he was willing to agree to the second reading, and to referring it to a Select Committee, always reserving to himself, and not being fettered by what then took place, as to his future opinion on this important subject. He, however, would caution their Lordships not, on any ground, to part with the judicial authority which they now possessed, or to consent to transfer it to another tribunal, for, if they did, they might depend upon it that their political authority would soon follow in the same way.

Lord Cottenham felt glad that he had given way to his noble and learned Friend who had just addressed the House, for after what had fallen from him he considered it would be unnecessary to address the House at length. Although his noble and learned Friend had not stated his opinion very fully on some parts of the Bill, yet with respect to other parts, after what had fallen from his noble Friend, he thought that there was no great danger that this would become part of the law of the land. He cautioned the House on one point of immense importance, namely, the delegating the Judicial Powers of that House to the Privy Council; but he did not touch on one important clause in the Bill by which any question, and almost any matter, might be taken from the jurisdiction of that House and transferred to the Privy Council. By the 9th clause it was proposed

"That as often as either House of Parliament shall think fit to refer any matter or thing for inquiry before the said Judicial Committee, it shall be lawful for such House of Parliament to present an Address to Her Majesty, setting forth the subject matter so directed to be referred, praying Her Majesty to refer such matter to the Judicial Committee, and being by Her Majesty referred to the said Judicial Committee, shall be inquired of and tried according to the course of the said Committee, and according to any rules and regulations made or under the power hereafter contained to be made by such Committee, and its report on being made to Her Majesty shall be laid before the House of Parliament which had presented the Address aforesaid, and be then and there dealt with as to the said House shall seem meet."

There was no limit whatever to the business thus to be transferred; and although his noble and learned Friend (Lord Brougham) had not stated this to be his opinion, yet he could not help recollecting that his noble and learned Friend proposed something like this in the House on a former occasion. The importance of making such a change might still rest on his mind; and if this Clause should become the law of the land, this House might soon find itself stripped of its Judicial Powers altogether. He would not say more, however, on this point after what had fallen from his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, who had so forcibly expressed his opinion as to the effects that would result from giving such a power as was invested in this Clause. There were two points of the Bill which he confessed appeared to him to be proper subjects of inquiry. In the first place with regard to Divorce, he admitted that the law of Divorce as it now existed, or rather the rules acted upon by that House were far from satisfactory. He did not think that an important matter of this kind should be left as it was, and that there should not be a mode of special jurisdiction for every case, by means of a general law, and that parties should then be able to obtain redress without delay, and unattended with its present enormous expense. But, however important it might be to provide a remedy for parties who were suitors in cases of this kind, yet it was perfectly clear to him that, if they provided the remedy which was proposed in this Bill, no redress whatever would be furnished. The objection was not that Divorce was applied by Act of Parliament, but, as was said by his noble and learned Friend, that the expense was so great to obtain redress, that the law was only for the rich, and that the poor were entirely excluded from it. What was proposed in this Bill was, that what was done in that House on questions of Divorce should be done before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. [Lord Brougham: What was done before this and the other House in every Divorce case.] Yes. The change which his noble and learned Friend proposes in this Bill was with a view to save expenses. Now, was his noble and learned Friend aware of the expenses of proceeding before the Committee of the Privy Council? He (Lord Cottenham) was satisfied, from inquiries which he had made, that the expenses of proceedings in that Court were much greater than was generally admitted, and than the subject required. But what would be the effect of the expenses after the adoption of the Address of both Houses? It must be recollected that there would be the expenses of agents, attorneys, counsel, and witnesses in that and the other House, as well as before the Privy Council; for it was proposed that the proceedings should originate in Parliament. He was not aware whether there were any fees payable in the proceedings before the Privy Council; but there were fees payable on these proceedings in that House. With the exception of fees payable to a very few individuals in that House, the great body of the fees of the House, in Divorce and other cases of Private Bills, did not go to individuals, but to the Fee Fund. Under these circumstances, if the fees were found to be oppressive, and that it appeared that public benefit would result from their reduction, the obvious course to pursue would be to reduce the fees and not transfer the jurisdiction. If the Bill passed in its present shape, and there was to be a double jurisdiction, the expenses of parties would be increased; and above all, if there were many witnesses to be examined. He, therefore, thought that they should not look merely to the expense attending the amount of the fees of parties coming to that House for a Divorce, à vinculo matrimonii. He did not dispute that it would be well, in cases of Divorce, to have some general jurisdiction, acting on known rules and adjudicating on fixed principles in all cases of persons coming for Divorces. Unfortunately there was no general law on the subject of Divorce, but for each individual case they had to make a separate law, and Parliament was called upon to pass a separate law in every case of Divorce à vinculo matrimonii. If they had a new tribunal for this description of cases, they might in the first instance make rules and orders for the regulation of the proceedings, and ultimately be enabled to frame a code of laws which would be applicable to the subject. At present they had no rules, law, or code on the subject, but they had merely for their guidance some regulations or forms of proceedings to be observed in Divorce Bills coming under the attention of that House. There could be no doubt but that the present evils attending these Bills were so great that it was a very proper subject for inquiry with a view to future legislation. It was to be hoped that the time was not distant when they would be enabled to adopt some general measure, and thus remove the objections which at present existed to the mode of proceeding in cases of Divorce; it was, therefore, not to inquiry into this part of the Bill, or to that relative to the extension of the duration of Patents that he objected. The question of the extension of the period of Patents was one which, from its nature, might require continued alteration, as the ingenuity of mankind was constantly being exercised in inventions and improvements, and therefore it might be requisite to adopt new regulations from time to time. He was surprised that his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack had given his unqualified sanction to another matter involved in this Bill, and which it was not clear to him was a subject that was open to or called for inquiry; he alluded to the part of it relative to the appointment of a permanent head of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

The Lord Chancellor remarked that he had not expressed his entire approbation of the Clause in question, but only to the principle of appointing a permanent President of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

his noble and learned Friend entertained to other parts of this Bill, that this portion also, to which he had just alluded, would not become the law of the land. His noble and learned Friend (Lord Brougham) was mistaken in supposing that he (Lord Cottenham) had formerly proposed that there should be a permanent head of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and that he had subsequently altered his opinion on the subject. He had certainly thought it would be better to have a permanent head of the Judicial Committee, but he never meant such an appointment as was proposed in the Clause in this Bill. It was proposed in this Clause that they should have three Judges to sit constantly in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Now, what he proposed was this, that a Judge presiding in another Court should be called upon to preside in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Now, when he came into the profession, and he believed for a very long period previously, the Privy Council had an appellate jurisdiction, as at present, in judicial cases from the Colonies and the East Indies, and the Privy Council on such occasions was presided over by the Master of the Rolls. The question then was, as to whether the judicial business of the Privy Council was then carried on in a way to give satisfaction to the public. He would ask, did not the decisions of Sir William Grant and Lord Alvanley in the Privy Council give satisfaction to the public? He asserted, that in the early part of their professional career, Sir William Grant and Lord Alvanley as constantly presided in the Privy Council as in the Rolls Court. [Lord Brougham remarked that Sir William Grant did not hold many sittings in the Rolls Court.] He was aware of that, but he wished to explain as to what he had formerly said respecting the appointment of a permanent head of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. He had proposed to the House to make an alteration in the establishment of the Court of Chancery, when his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack strongly expressed his opinion that the then Government proposed to give a much greater increase to the Court of Chancery than was necessary, and objected to the addition of two Vice Chancellors to the Court of Chancery; but subsequently his noble and learned Friend was induced to agree to the proposal. His noble and learned Friend in the centre of the Wool-sitting on the left hand of the Lord Chancellor, on the Woolsack], then objected to this measure as unnecessary, but suggested that there should be only one additional Vice Chancellor instead of two. The arrangement, however, which he (Lord Cottenham) had recommended was adopted, and under it there had not been such an increase of the business of the Court of Chancery as was anticipated by some, or was of such an extent as to prevent them getting through the business of the several Courts. He believed, as he had stated he had every reason to believe would be the case when he proposed this plan of extending the establishment to the Court of Chancery, that the new arrangement had been such as to allow the Master of the Rolls to sit constantly as the President of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; and if this suggestion was adopted, they would have the judicial business of the Privy Council presided over by one who, from the nature of his office, must be a Judge of great eminence and of high professional attainments, and who was in the constant exercise of judicial functions. The extent and nature of the active employment which would be thrown on him by presiding over the Committee of the Privy Council would not be such as to interfere in any way with the Judge sitting in his own court. The great objection that he entertained to the creation of a new appointment as President of the Judicial Committee was, that they would make a new and permanent office for a court which did not sit for more than a few days in the year. He intended to have moved a few days ago for a return of the number of days in which the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council had sat during the last three years, and showing how much business actually came before that tribunal; but he would do so on a future occasion. His noble and learned Friend had observed, that they could not judge by the past as to what would be the future business of the Committee of the Privy Council, if they had the additional jurisdiction which was proposed in this Bill. There was a recent return on the Table of the House of the number of cases which remained for judgment before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and from that he thought that they could form a tolerably good criterion as to whether it was expedient or not to have three permanent judges, with salaries, added to the constitution of this tribunal, in consequence of the probable increase of business before it. If reference was made to the return to which he had just adverted, it would appear, that in the order for the number of cases waiting for judgment before the Committee of the Privy Council, the answer was the word "Nil." Therefore, if they appointed these three permanent judges to form the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, they would have to sit until some causes became ripe for them to hear and adjudicate upon. His noble and learned Friend said, that it was to be hoped, that under the extended jurisdiction a great number of causes would be sent before it; the question, however, was, whether it was probable from past experience, that such an extent of business was likely to occur before this tribunal, as to justify their creating this permanent change. But there was not only this objection to the proposed new arrangement; they were called upon to appoint three judges to a tribunal, by which it was admitted, on all hands, the judicial business had hitherto been satisfactorily performed. The return, as well as the admission of his noble and learned Friend, showed that the business of their Committee of the Privy Council had been satisfactorily performed; what necessity was there for this change? Was there not then some danger, that if they appointed these three judges to this tribunal, the administration of the judicial business of the Committee of the Privy Council would be left entirely to these three judges, as the other Members named on the Committee would not attend? This, he believed, would be the natural and inevitable consequence of making this change in the constitution of this tribunal. Taking it altogether, there had hitherto been an ample attendance of the Members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, at the hearing of cases that came before that tribunal. His noble and learned Friend had stated, that he (Lord Cottenham) did not give attendance at the meetings of this Committee. Now, he would give a very good reason for not doing so. It was, that there was plenty of attendance at the sittings of the Committee without him, and not having any particular love for the thing, and finding that others gave a more regular attendance, he thought he would not interfere with their pleasures; but he had never failed to attend when it had been suggested to him that his presence would be desirable. The same was the case with respect to his attending at the hearing of Appeals in that House. He always made it a point to attend when he thought that his presence could be attended with the slightest public advantage; and he should appeal to his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, whether he had not always attended when it had been suggested to him. Indeed, during the present and the last Session he had attended to hear Appeals in that House twice a week when his noble and learned Friend was engaged in the Court of Chancery; and also when any subject came under attention in which his opinion was required. He admitted, that in consequence of the Judicial Committee being very well manned, he felt that it was useless to attend these meetings of the Privy Council, unless his presence was required. He did not think that any thing had occurred which could justify the House in arriving at the conclusion that there was likely to be any difficulty in obtaining a sufficient attendance of competent Members of that tribunal, under its present constitution, so as to justify them in adopting the plan proposed by his noble and learned Friend. Under these circumstances, then, was it not a most extraordinary proposition to ask the House to appoint three Judges with salaries to this tribunal, which would become, if the Bill passed in its present shape, the highest appellate Court of Jurisdiction in this country, for the judicial functions of the House would cease? It was proposed in this Bill that the chief Judge, as permanent head of this tribunal should receive 2,000*l.* a-year, the second Judge 1,500*l.* a-year, and the third 1,200*l.* a-year as salaries. Now, it was obvious, that from the amount of salaries proposed to be paid to these Judges, and also from the station and professional acquirements which it would be absolutely necessary that those holding such offices, and being called upon to discharge such functions, should possess, that they could not induce persons in high professional practice to accept such appointments; that therefore these offices were to be filled by persons who had retired from high judicial situations, and who were to receive their salaries in addition to their retired allowances. It was obvious that they could not get efficient Judges for this tribunal, if they were only to receive the small sums proposed in this Bill. Of course, he was aware that the insertion of the money clause in this Bill was only a preliminary matter, and that it must be erased previously to sending the Bill to the other House; but it was obviously inserted to show what was proposed to be done, and he, therefore, was fully justified in making the observations which he had respecting it. His noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack said, that he had only given his opinion as to the advantages of having a permanent head of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, although he gave some sort of intimation that in Committee he should propose some other plan for such appointment than was in the Bill. He could not help calling the attention of his noble and learned Friend to the very extraordinary situation in which this tribunal would be placed by the appointment of such a permanent head with a salary. The Judges of this tribunal had not hitherto been permanently appointed to those offices, for at present they must be Members of the Privy Council; and of necessity their being so, and their consequent exercising their judicial functions at this tribunal, must be dependent on the will of the Crown. It was true that the same objection, to a certain extent, might be raised to the appointment of the Master of the Rolls, or any other great judicial officer, to preside as permanent head of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. It was true that the Master of the Rolls could be deprived of his seat at the Privy Council, but he could not be deprived of his seat in his own Court; and this officer, therefore, could perform judicial functions in the Privy Council, without salary, incidental to the other judicial appointment which he held. This was an advantage which could not be obtained by any means of the arrangement proposed in this Bill. As long as a jurisdiction vested in the Privy Council, any Member of the Judicial Committee might cease to be competent to act as a Judge of that tribunal, as he was liable to be deprived of his seat as a Privy Councillor by the act of the Crown. Therefore, they must say whether they would put a Judge at the head of this tribunal, with other judicial duties to perform, or an individual, the exercise of whose functions as a Judge would entirely depend on the will of the Crown. In the latter case, it was clear that the appointment of the Judge was not independent of the Crown, for he could at any time be deprived of the power of discharging his judicial duties. In this state of things, when the returns which he intended to move for were produced, a state of facts would be shown which would give a full statement to the House as to whether this tribunal, as at present constituted, was competent to discharge all the duties which were entrusted to it; and, as there was no accumulation of business, whether there was likely, under any extension of its functions, to be such an increase of business as to call for a reconstitution of the tribunal. For his own part, he did not think that in the principle involved in this part of the subject there was matter which was necessary to refer to a Committee up stairs. He thought that the point involved regarded a matter, respecting which it was the duty of Her Majesty's Government to make up their minds one way or the other, and if they made up their minds, they should pronounce their opinion without going to a Committee. He conceived that the question involved a matter of great importance, which could not be elucidated by inquiry, and, therefore, that it was altogether unnecessary to make it a subject of reference to a select Committee. Those two parts of the Bill which took from and transferred the jurisdiction exercised by that House—excepting that regarding Divorce cases, and respecting which he did not object to inquiry—and also, so far as it proposed to appoint three salaried Judges to sit constantly in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, he conceived that Her Majesty's Government ought to make up their minds and not to allow inquiry. If they resorted to a Select Committee they could not acquire any information on these points, and he therefore could not see the least advantage that could be gained by doing so. The only cases in which it was advantageous to resort to a Select Committee was, first, when all the facts upon which they were called upon to legislate had not been fully elicited, and when, therefore, Parliament should proceed to obtain as full a knowledge as possible on the subject; and the other ground was, when the Government had made up their minds in favour of a measure on evidence which was before them, but which might not be sufficient, without further elucidation, to satisfy others. But on a subject with respect to which Her Majesty's Government had formed opinions, and made up their minds, he conceived that it was a dangerous course to resort to, to send a matter to a Committee, with respect to which they raised expectations, and formed hopes which never could be realised, and thus weakened the confidence in established institutions, on the ground that the House and the Government was willing to alter them. He would not give further trouble on this subject, beyond repeating that he did not concur in any part of the propositions that were involved in this Bill, with the exception of that for instituting an inquiry into the propriety of extending the jurisdiction of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in cases of Divorce, and also of giving them increased powers for the extension of the duration of Patents.

Lord Campbell said, that as subsequent opportunities would arise of discussing at length the various propositions involved in the Bill, he would content himself with making a very few observations. The Bill involved many subjects which he had long considered, and with respect to which he had formed opinions, which, however, he would not trouble the House with on that occasion; but he must at once declare, that he would be the last man, in or out of that House, to part with the functions which properly belonged to them, whether they were judicial or legislative. Whatever property belonged to that House, as the first tribunal of the kingdom, he would advise their Lordships to keep in their own hands. Their Lordships were a Court of Justice, not of original, but of appellate jurisdiction. With regard to Divorce Bills, they did not come before their Lordships properly, either as a branch of the Legislature, or as a Court of Appeal. His noble and learned Friend, the author of the Bill, had stated what it was impossible to contradict, that the dissolution of the marriage contract ought to be a judicial proceeding. It was so in every other country in the world, and he hoped it would be so before long in England, provided no facility were given to Divorce in any case where there was not clear proof of adultery on the part of the wife, and where the husband was not freed from all suspicion of collusion. If, however, the adultery of the wife was clearly proved, and the husband was free from such an imputation as he had referred to, it was the doctrine of Scripture, and it was the dictate of reason, that the marriage ought to be dissolved. And this was practically the law of England. In every case where adultery was proved satisfactorily, and the conduct of the husband was unimpeached, he obtained the remedy of divorce, if he was able to defray the expense of pursuing it. The question, therefore, was, by what means that law should be administered. Should it be by an Act of the Legislature, or by a decree of a judicial tribunal? There was no doubt that our present system of Divorce Bills had brought great scandal upon the administration of the law of this country. Foreigners looked upon it with amazement. He had conversed with many of them on the subject, and had been utterly at a loss to find any argument by which the practice could be at all palliated. It was also a serious inconvenience to that House last Session of Parliament—the business of the House was interrupted for several weeks in examining witnesses at the Bar upon Divorce Bills; and notwithstanding all the care of his noble and learned Friend on the centre of the Woolsack—and he was extremely solicitous on the subject—there was great difficulty in guarding against fraud, and such matters would be much better disposed of before a Judicial tribunal than in that House. He had come more recently from the other Chamber of Legislature than any of their Lordships, and the impression on his mind of the manner in which these Bills were treated there, was still most lively, and he confessed that he was quite ashamed to think of the scenes he had witnessed there. When a Divorce Bill was called, there was either a noise or a titter, and unless there was some piece of evidence, that some old gentleman was desirous of listening to, not the slightest attention was paid to the proceeding—no oath could be administered, and in short, it was a mere burlesque upon judicial proceedings. Suppose there was a foreigner under the gallery on such an occasion, he must be at a loss to understand what was going on; and he was sure that any Member of that House, or any citizen of this country, would be ashamed to explain it to him. Then the expense was so very great, that it was not a remedy for the poor or the middle classes; and he could not help thinking, notwithstanding what had fallen from his noble and learned Friend behind him (Lord Cottenham) for whose opinions he entertained the greatest respect, that before the Judicial Committee, there might be a remedy just as cheap as before the Court of Session in Scotland, where for a sum of 25*l.*, a Divorce à vinculo matrimonii might be procured. But he could not at all concur in the mode proposed by his noble and learned Friend—he thought the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council might be made an excellent Tribunal for this purpose. It could have the advantage of the presence of Equity, Consistorial, and Common Law Judges. The case might be gone into, and the witnesses examined more conveniently there, than at the Bar of that House, and he did not think any tribunal could be better constituted for the purpose of taking cognizance of the subject of Divorce. But what his noble and learned Friend proposed by this Bill was, not that there should be a reference at once to the Judicial Committee. There was first to be a Petition to that House. Their Lordships had no proper jurisdiction on the subject—it did not belong to them as a branch of the Legislature, as a Court of Justice, or a Court of Appeal; but still the unhappy husband was condemned first to petition their Lordships: then their Lordships were to address the Crown; then the Crown was to make a reference of the matter to the Judicial Committee; then the Committee was to examine witnesses and ascertain the fact; and what next? Why, the decision of the Committee was to be laid before the two Houses of Parliament, who were to judge whether the Committee had done right or wrong in pronouncing their judgment. Was it again to be argued by Counsel at the Bar of the House? Were they to sit in Committee, and again take the depositions? That would be the consequence of the plan proposed by his noble and learned Friend; but, of course, this might be reformed in Committee. His opinion was, that it should be open to any injured husband at once to apply to the Judicial Committee, and they should examine the case and deliver a judgment which should be final between the parties. With regard to the power of extending Patents, that was a matter which did not properly belong to their Lordships—Patents were originally granted by the Attorney General. His noble and learned Friend on the Wool-sack had granted many; it was properly the business of an Officer of the Crown or some judicial tribunal, and to that branch of the Bill no objection, he thought, could be made. But with regard to the general power of carrying all the business of that House to the Judicial Committee, he must certainly oppose it. He felt quite incompetent as a Member of that tribunal to take such functions upon him, and he should be obliged to call on his noble and learned Friend (Lord Brougham), who was ready at all times, at whatever cost and inconvenience it might occasion him, to take his (Lord Campbell's) place. If such a Bill as this were to pass, he certainly should require him to come from his retreat and to take his (Lord Campbell's) place at the Judicial Committee. But he apprehended that this was a clause that could not be introduced into the Bill as it was then framed, and that it was only specific powers which could be invested in that or any such tribunal. Now, he would come to the other point, respecting the constitution of the Court. He thought they might get on very well with the aid of his noble and learned Friend who had himself made out a very good case for him (Lord Campbell). He was rather surprised at finding him pushing his advantage (so far in showing that things had gone on excellently well as they were. He (Lord Brougham) said, truly that the business had been done, and he said also that it had been well done, and that there had been great satisfaction. If he could have shown that some great change would take place in the jurisdiction of the tribunal, unless not only Divorce Bills, but Estate, Inclosure Bills, Railway Bills, and other Bills of a public nature would be referred to the Judicial Committee, it might go on very well as it had hitherto done. It had given satisfaction, and he trusted would continue to do so. Now, for nearly three years he had himself, as the Lord President knew, assiduously attended. And he should still be willing to make an effort to be of some small service to his country. But whether there was to be a head or not, he could not conceive that it was necessary for there to be a head of the Court, such as was described in the Bill. He knew nothing of the individual—they might form their conjecture on this subject—but he discovered from the Bill that the new head was to be of high rank in the Court and out of the Court—he was to take precedence of all the Dukes of the land in that House at Coronations, and on every solemn occasion. He certainly must look with great respect on the tribunal of which he happened to be an unworthy member, but he could not conceive that its dignity or efficiency could depend on any individual having such extraordinary and unnecessary distinction. But as these matters would be more fully considered before a Committee, he would not then detain their Lordships longer. He thought, however, it was his duty to state to their Lordships with brevity the general view he took of the Bill. He had no objection to its being read a second time and going into Committee; but unless it was most materially altered he should not give his assent to it.

The Bishop of Exeter was sure that he should be forgiven for trespassing upon the time of the House when he conceived the spiritual interests of the country to be concerned; at the same time, he regretted that it should have fallen to his lot to speak upon this subject, when it might have been so much more ably performed by more distinguished Members of the Bench upon which he had the honour of a seat. The first objection which he should venture to make to this Bill, which, upon the whole, he doubted not, was calculated to promote the interests and to forward the justice of the country, was, that in extending the jurisdiction of the Judicial Committee it had not been sufficiently considered whether it might not be wise to diminish its jurisdiction. That Committee was at present the ultimate Court of Appeal on all spiritual cases whatsoever. He felt confident that the practical result of the Act delegating this power to the Judicial Committee was not considered at the time of its passing. The measure as their Lordships were all aware, was intended to supersede the old Courts of Appeal with respect to scriptural causes, which were found to be full of inconvenience. It was agreed to in consequence of the recommendation of a Commission appointed in 1830, who made a special report upon the subject, advising that in future such cases should be transferred to the Privy Council. But what reason did they urge for such a step? Simply the structure of the Privy Council. They said—"There are Lords spiritual and temporal, as well as lawyers of every court, in that Council, consequently that is the best possible place where such appeals should be decided." What followed? Soon after the adoption of that recommendation another measure was adopted transferring the jurisdiction of the Privy Council to the Judicial Committee, and that Judicial Committee was so constituted that it should practically, and, he (the Bishop of Exeter) believed necessarily, consist almost entirely of law Lords. Now, it was very desirable that the Members of the Church should not be mixed up with any deliberations of a judicial character, except such as were measures of a scriptural character, but the result of transferring the jurisdiction of the Privy Council to the Judicial Committee was, in point of fact, to remove from the Church, the ultimate decision of all matters connected even with the very doctrines of the Church. That he (the Bishop of Exeter) was sure could never have been intended, yet so it was; for at this hour, if a suit were brought against any of their Lordships for heresy, the Court of Appeal which would have to decide whether such person was a heretic or not would be this Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. He was quite certain that this was a matter which, at the time, must have been overlooked—he was sure it was a casus omissus. Take even the case of a bishop or of a clergyman brought to answer for any misconduct. In such a case one of the Bishops, who was a Member of the Privy Council, might sit on the Judicial Committee. That was a provision, but it did not go very far. The case would be an appeal from the Court of Arches; that would, of course, at once exclude the most Rev. Primate the Archbishop of Canterbury from sitting, in consequence of its being an appeal from his own Court. Then, if the case happened to have been heard in the Consistory Court of the right Rev. Prelate the Bishop of London, and the right Rev. Prelate were to avail himself of the very reasonable power of applying by Letter of Request to the Arches' Court, then both the Bishop of London and the Archbishop of Canterbury would be excluded. The only Member left would be the Archbishop of York, and he, as their Lordships well knew, laboured under the weight of nearly ninety years. He submitted that such was not the Court of Appeal to which cases should be submitted for decision that were of the utmost importance to the interests of the Church of this country. He did not think any Committee of the Privy Council could be made an adequate Court of Appeal for deciding upon Church matters. It had been said, that the Judicial Committee as constituted by the measure of 1833 had been found to work beneficially and satisfactorily to the country. But he must be forgiven if he said that there was one important exception—it had not given satisfaction to the Church of this country. He abstained from going into particulars, but he thought it unjust to the Church that there should not be some Court on which the Church might rely for its entire sufficiency to decide upon all matters that might be brought before them; and it was also unjust to the individuals who were placed in the high situation of the last appellate jurisdiction in this country, that matters should be brought before them on which it was utterly impossible for them to decide. There was a matter of great importance which would shortly come before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, on which they would have to pronounce judgment, which excited the greatest interest in the country, and affected a large class of persons—a matter on which, he was sure, the Members of that Committee would feel most strange, and totally foreign from all their study, and from which wisdom should make them recoil—yet, if this Bill before the House were carried into effect, that matter and others like it would be forced upon that Court, notwithstanding that that Bill was denominated a Bill to provide for the better Administration of Justice by Her Majesty's Privy Council, and to settle all that was deficient before. He (the Bishop of Exeter) rejoiced to hear that the Bill was likely to be sent to a Select Committee, because he thought the subject to which he had referred especially demanded the attention of that Committee. To deal frankly with the case, he must say, that he thought to provide an adequate Court of Appeal in scriptural cases could hardly be made a part of the Bill. It ought to be a distinct and separate power. He (the Bishop of Exeter) lamented to hear the noble Lord who had introduced this Bill speak of divorce à mensa et thoro as a trifling thing. A divorce à mensa et thoro was, in fact, a divorcing of the married parties. The Act of the Legislature, though called so, was not, in fact, an Act of divorce, its real nature being to enable those who were judicially divorced before by the sentence of divorce à mensa et thoro to contract matrimony, which, otherwise, by the defective state of the law, they could not do. For that reason he (the Bishop of Exeter) rejoiced that a Measure was to be introduced which would give to people divorced à mensa et thoro the power of marrying again without an Act of the Legislature. The question as to the power of releasing parties from the obligation of marriage à mensa et thoro was one which he was unwilling to approach, because he could not do so satisfactorily. But if this Bill passed, it would give to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council the power of awarding a total divorce with the ability of marrying afterwards, which would be giving a power unprecedented in the history of the legislation of this country. In no other case could a cause be decided in the Court in which it was first brought without an ultimate appeal. The Court was objectionable because there was no appeal from it, which there ought to be.

Lord Brougham said, the observations of the right Rev. Prelate deserved very great consideration, coming as they did from a Father of the Church. The right Rev. Prelate complained of the sort of persons who now exercised Spiritual Jurisdiction in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and said that they had not given as much satisfaction as was desirable to the Church in general; but the constitution of the Court of Delegates was formerly just as liable to the same objection. That Court was composed of Civilians and of Common Law Judges. In Escott's case—the Lay Baptism case—he had pronounced the judgment of the Court, and one of the Members of the Judicial Committee by whom they were on that occasion assisted was a Consistorial Judge, and they had affirmed the judgment of the Archbishop's Judge—namely, the Dean of the Arches. If, therefore, they had erred they had done so in company with the ecclesiastical authorities singled out to decide such cases, and appointed by the Bishops themselves. The quorum of the Court of Delegates had been composed of Doctors who had no practice, because if they had they were sure to be engaged in the cause; and who got only a guinea a day for their judicial services; there were four Doctors, and three Common Law Judges. As to the point alluded to by his noble and learned Friend as to precedence, it was only meant that they should take precedence in the Court; it was never anticipated that they would take precedence in the Drawing-rooms, about which no one cared a rush, at least no rational man. With respect to the importance of having a better staff of Judges, after all that he had heard, he certainly retained his opinion. His noble and learned Friend (Lord Cottenham) asked, what was the use of having three Judges? and he retorted on him some of the vituperation with which he (Lord Brougham) had assailed his noble and learned Friend's measure, and he seemed very much to enjoy himself in doing so. His noble and learned Friend had found his two Vice-Chancellors too many; he said that two were too many, but one was not sufficient, and so he supposed his noble and learned Friend meant that one and a half, and one and one quarter would just do; and he seemed to rejoice when he thought he had found him (Lord Brougham) falling into the same error as to the three Judges. But his answer was, that they had no right to count on those they had now; they had not got three Judges. There was not one permanent Judge; and if they went into Committee, his noble and learned Friend would find that they had often found extreme difficulty in getting Judges, and had indeed been obliged to reduce the quorum of the Judicial Committee from four to three on that account, in certain cases by a Bill of his (Lord Brougham's) passed last Session. He had heard his noble and learned Friend say a dozen times that he considered voluntary Judges to be totally out of the question for any Court. One ground of opposition to the Bill was, that that House would strip itself of jurisdiction. There was no necessity for the House to do that. So far from taking away the jurisdiction of Parliament, the Bill sought nothing of the kind; it merely allowed the Parliament to call to itself the aid of an ancillary body. He was astonished to hear it stated that in cases of Divorce, this Bill would effect no relief by providing that these cases should be tried before the Judicial Committee, and that there would be no difference in expence between the proposed plan, and a Bill in Parliament. Why, the last Divorce Bill, which had been slightly opposed, cost 940*l.*; a previous one, which was unopposed, had cost 500*l.* He should be able to prove before the Committee that the cost of a Divorce before the Judicial Committee would not necessarily be above 25*l.* The fees of the Judicial Committee might be greatly reduced; and he had no doubt but that a Divorce might be obtained at the same expence before the Judicial Committee as before the Court of Session in Scotland. For a mere Divorce à mensa et thoro the only benefit obtained was, that if the party should marry again it was not felony. With a Divorce only to that extent the parties were still married, and might put an end to their separation at any time by consent. The proof that the matrimonial tie was not dissolved was, that in law with a divorce à mensa et thoro the widow was dowable of her husband's landed estate, and the husband was entitled to his tenancy by the courtesy of the wife's landed estate after their separation, but this form of Divorce was obliged to be used, because their Lordships required it as a preliminary.

Lord Campbell said, the Bishop of London had attended the Judicial Committee on all Ecclesiastical occasions of its sitting, and had concurred in its decisions.

The Bishop of Exeter said, the Bishop of London only attended in the decision of cases of Church discipline. There were, however, other cases in which questions of Church doctrine were to be decided.

The Lord Chancellor would put it to the noble and learned Lord, whether it would not be better to divide his Bill into two parts? The Divorce part of the Bill was one of so much importance, that it might be a consideration whether it ought not to be a separate Bill.

Lord Brougham: That may be an instruction to the Committee.

The Lord Chancellor: Very well; I have no objection.

Bill read a second time, and referred to a Select Committee, with power to divide it into two parts, if they should so think fit.

COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS.] Mr. Hindley rose to move,

"That any Member whose constituents are locally interested in any competing lines of railway, may be permitted to sit upon the Committee appointed to decide upon their respective merits, though without being allowed to Vote upon any question arising thereon."

He considered that the Members of the House of Commons, by its late Resolutions, had given up the power of representing their constituents altogether. As long as private business was delegated to the House of Commons, every Member had a right to represent the local interests of his constituents. Personal interest, indeed, stood upon a different footing. Where a Member of the House had a personal interest in a particular line, he ought not to vote in the Committee upon it, because he might at least be suspected of being influenced by his own objects; and the result would be to weaken the effect of the decision. He had himself acted upon this principle when he held a number of shares in the Sheffield and Manchester Railway. On going down to the borough which he had the honour to represent, he found that there was a very considerable feeling in favour of another line. He himself then thought that the public interest would require both lines; and, in order that he might be an unprejudiced and unsuspected judge, he gave directions to his broker to sell his shares, and they were sold at a sacrifice of 1,000*l*. It was a fact that the shares fetched 800*l*. less than they would at the present day. Therefore, as to personal interests, he quite agreed in the propriety of the Resolution; but the local interests of constituents he regarded in a totally different light. To whom were the constituencies to look for the defence of their local interests, if not to the Gentlemen who were sent to represent them in that House? And were the Members of the House of Commons sunk so low in public estimation as to make it necessary to affirm that they had not sufficient sense of justice, or sufficient knowledge of what was due to themselves, to their constituents, and the country, to be enabled to give a fair and honest vote. He believed the fact to be, that many Members had not the moral courage, when there were two parties among their constituents, taking different views, to run the risk of offending one of them by declaring in favour of what they conceived to be most for the public interest. For his own part, he should never shrink from advocating what he believed to be for the public good, without reference to any party whatever. As the rule of the House stood originally, he asked, would any Member have been permitted by his constituents to absent himself from a Committee in which their interests were afected? If a Member said, "Gentlemen, I cannot vote for either of you;—both sides have great claims to attention, but I cannot favour either: I am interested for you;—I understand your case, no man better; but if I vote for either, every one will think I have been biassed, and, therefore I shall leave the matter to be disposed of by others who know nothing at all about it"—his constituents would have told him, that he was sent to that House to represent them, and that if he did not attend to their interests, the sooner he took himself away from the House of Commons the better. If, indeed, the duties of Members of that House were merely of a judicial character, he could understand that argument. If the interest of particular localities were to be decided by the learned Judges and twelve impartial Jurors, after hearing arguments of counsel well and good, but let not the House have any responsibility at all with respect to private business. Let all such business go to the Courts of Law, and then that House would be rid of a great deal of trouble. What was now done openly and publicly, would be liable, hereafter, to be done secretly. At present, if a Member took one side or the other, his whole conduct was before the eyes of his constituents, and if he acted unjustly, the public opinion of his constituents would punish him; but here were five Gentlemen—and who would tell him that some influence might not be used to impress them with a particular view, by arguments which had nothing to do with the justice of the case, by party influence, or other such means? Who was to tell him that this sort of back stair influence might not prevail, and that an individual whose conduct was not before all, might not act in a way which he would not have dared to do when he was open to the judgment of public opinion? He thought the House was departing from a truly English principle by adopting these Resolutions. He liked the principle, that a man who adopted a particular course, should be responsible to public opinion with respect to that course. If his constituents did not approve of it, they had a remedy in their own hands at the next election, but here the Committee acted in private and were not under the check of public supervision. He thought there was in that House a love of property and a love for the defence of persons who had property, an esprit de corps, and that, therefore, those who were not represented in that House, the great body of the people, had but little chance of any of their interests being brought before a private Committee. He should not detain the House longer, but he urged them to pause before they went too far with these Resolutions. If Gentlemen would look at this proposition, they would see that it was not to rescind the proposition adopted on Monday evening. He did not go so far as that. He did not ask that Members, whose constituents were locally interested, should sit and vote in the Committee, but what he asked was, that those whose constituents were so interested, should not be deprived of the opportunity of sitting in the Committee, hearing the arguments that might be adduced, asking questions of the witnesses, and then leaving it to the five impartial Gentlemen chosen by the Committee of Selection to decide how far those arguments possessed any real weight. He thought that this was due to the constituency—he trusted it would be allowed, and without further detaining the House, he moved the Resolution which he had put into the Speaker's hand.

Mr. Gladstone said, that having on the part of the Railway Committee moved a series of Resolutions on the subject to which this matter related, he must beg to say a very few words with respect to the Motion before the House. The hon. Gentleman had taken a good deal of credit to himself for not proposing on Friday a vote which should rescind the Resolutions agreed to on the previous Monday evening, notwithstanding that those Resolutions had been passed under every advantage which any discussion could possess, except, singly, the presence of the hon. Gentleman. With regard to the present Resolution he must observe that in the first place it was entirely superfluous, and in the second place would be extremely inconvenient. His belief was, that the hon. Gentleman was entirely mistaken in the impression that there was anything in the Resolutions which would deprive constituencies of the benefit of the presence and services of their representatives. He believed there was nothing in them to prevent any Member whose constituents were locally interested from using the privilege which, as a Member of that House, he possessed, and appearing in the Committee, and making any statement he might choose—not, indeed, being recognised as a Member of the Committee, and in fact appearing in no other capacity than that of a Member of Parliament; but the powers which he possessed as a Member of Parliament would be amply sufficient for any useful purpose, and would enable him to represent any claim on the part of his constituents. As such was the case, he thought great inconvenience would result from investing Members of that House, who were not Members of the Committee, with a recognised authority to appear as advocates or nominees sitting in the Committee, and possessing every authority except that of voting, but taking part in the discussions equally with the Members of the Committee. He thought to adopt such an arrangement, while it was totally unnecessary as aiming at supplying a defect which did not exist, would be exceedingly mischievous, because it would impair the authority which belonged to the Committee, and would constitute a number of Members of the Committee, who would be swayed by different interests, and must render the tribunal less competent to conduct the proceedings in such a manner as would be conducive to the interests of the public; and, therefore, as well as because it was utterly unnecessary, he trusted the House would have no hesitation in negating the motion.

Mr. W. Patten was extremely glad to hear what had fallen from his right hon. Friend. There had been a great difference in Committee as to whether Members were to be allowed to attend and represent the interests of their constituents. He thought that if it had been known, at the time when the measure was introduced, that Members would have the power of stating the case of their constituents, who were not able to appear by Counsel, many who supported the measure would have voted against it on that express ground.

Mr. Labouchere agreed in substance with what had been stated by the President of the Board of Trade. He was aware that any Member had the right to be present at a Committee, but he was not aware that he had a right to address the Committee. He spoke under correction, when he said so, but his impression was, that a Member had no right to address a Committee unless he was a Member of it. Whether it were so or not, he would vote against his hon. Friend the Member for Ashton, who had brought forward his Motion against a Resolution carried upon the other side by a large majority. The effect of the Motion would only be to protract the proceedings and increase the difficulties of those coming before the Committee. On the point which he had raised he trusted that the Speaker would state what was the law and practice of Parliament.

Mr. Gladstone said, he had not meant to state that any Member had an absolute right to address the Committee; all he had meant to say was, that, practically, no objection was felt to the making of a statement.

The Speaker wished to observe, in reply to the question of the right hon. Gentleman, that no Member who was not a Member of the Committee had any right to interfere with the proceedings. He had no right to examine witnesses, though he might be present in the room.

Dr. Bowring had received several communications, stating that out of doors great satisfaction was felt at the adoption of the Resolutions, and a desire was expressed by many that the same principle should be established, not only with respect to Railroads but on every Private Bill.

Mr. H. Hinde thought that, as the House had decided by the former Resolutions not to admit the representation of Local Interests, they would not be disposed to adopt the very imperfect remedy proposed by the hon. Gentleman opposite. He wished to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade on this subject. He understood it had been stated that it was not the intention of the Committee to whom it had been referred to decide what were competing lines, to report the evidence taken by them to the House. He wished to know whether there would be any objection to communicate that evidence?

Mr. Hindley observed that if any measure affecting the interests of his constituents were referred to a Select Committee, he should apply to that Committee, as matter of courtesy, to receive his suggestions.

Mr. Hawes thought it ought to be clearly understood what was the law and practice on this point. If he were a Member of the Committee, and any Member of the House who was not on the Committee endeavoured to influence the proceedings, he should exercise what he considered to be his undoubted privilege, and request the Gentleman to abstain.

The Speaker begged to repeat that no Member who was not a Member of the Committee had any right whatever to attend for the purpose of addressing the Committee, or of putting questions to the witnesses, or interfering in any way whatever in the proceedings.

Motion withdrawn.

GWALIOR—PROCLAMATION OF LORD ELLENBOROUGH.] Mr. Macaulay wished to put that day again the question he had put the day preceding. The question itself, he perceived, had been misunderstood. He had been represented as saying that the late operations in Gwalior were recited in the Proclamation of the Governor General to have taken place in consequence of the Treaty of 1805, whilst what he had said was, that they were there declared to have taken place in consequence of a Treaty which he affirmed was notoriously annulled in 1805. He wished now to know if the right hon. Baronet was prepared to lay on the Table of the House a copy of the Proclamation?

Sir R. Peel replied, that the Indian mail had arrived in the course of that day. He presumed, that the Proclamation as published was perfectly correct, and he was sure the right hon. Gentleman would not ask him for a more particular answer at that moment. The despatch conveyed ninety-seven inclosures, and there was not as yet time to examine them particularly. He could not doubt, however, that the Proclamation was amongst them, and there could be no objection to lay it on the Table of the House. The right hon. Gentleman, on his own authority, had affirmed that the Treaty of 1804 was notoriously annulled in 1805. There were three treaties between the Government of India and Scinde—a Treaty in 1803, in 1804, and in 1805. The Treaty of 1803 was a general Treaty of Peace. The Treaty of 1804 was a Treaty of Alliance, offensive and defensive, and stipulating that the Maharajah should have a right to call upon the Government of India for assistance in case of turbulence in his territory. That was the effect of the Treaty of 1804; and there was another Treaty which removed some doubts that had arisen with respect to the Treaty of 1803, but had no reference to the Treaty of 1804. The question was, whether the Treaty of 1804 had been superseded : it could not, he thought, be said to have been notoriously annulled by the subsequent Treaty. These, he believed, were the facts with respect to these treaties.

Mr. Macaulay did not mean now to enter into the discussion. The right hon. Gentleman, he understood, would lay copies of the Treaties before the House; and he, therefore, should not at present give any decided opinion on the matter.

CONSUMPTION OF SUGAR.] Mr. Milner Gibson took that opportunity of asking the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, a question in reference to a statement that had fallen from him in the debate on the preceding night, with respect to the Sugar monopoly. He understood the right hon. Gentleman to affirm, that the consumption of Sugar during the year 1844 had been greater than at any former period. [[Cries of "No, No."]] He understood the right hon. Gentleman to declare, that the consumption of Sugar in the year, ending the 1st of January, 1844, was greater than at any former period with one exception. Now, having taken some trouble to look at Parliamentary Papers, and to make calculations, upon proper authority, with reference to the amount of Sugar that had been taken into consumption in past years, he found, by his calculations, that in the years 1830, 1831, 1836, and 1837, the quantity of Sugar consumed was greater than in the year ending the 1st of January 1844. He was anxious, therefore, to ask the right hon. Gentleman this, not whether the consumption of Sugar, for the year ending the 1st of January, 1844, was actually greater than in previous years, but were they to take as the basis of future argument, that the consumption of Sugar during the year ending the 1st of January, 1844, had been greater than in any former year, with one single exception?

Sir Robert Peel replied, that if he had made a misstatement there were surely the means of correcting it. He had spoken at the time from documents that he held in his hand. These were returns for the last ten or twelve years, he thought for the last ten years. He spoke from Papers, and he stated that the consumption of Sugar in the last year was greater than in any former year, with one exception, the year 1841: in the year 1841, 4,065,724 cwt., and last year, 4,045,105

cwts. If he had made any misstatement he would willingly acquiesce in its correction.

TREATY WITH THE BRAZILS.] Mr. Ewart wished to ask the First Lord of the Treasury a question with respect to the Treaty with the Brazils. He understood, from the right hon. Gentleman, that the Brazilian government had proposed, that on our manufactures there should be a duty of from 40 to 60 per cent. on the value. Now, he begged to ask the right hon. Baronet whether the duty which the Brazilian government were willing to submit to on Brazilian sugar was not 150 per cent. on the value? He only asked the right hon. Baronet to give them what was the reciprocal duty on the value of the manufactures imported into Brazil, and the duty on the value of Brazilian produce imported into this country.

Sir R. Peel said, with respect to the calculation whether a certain amount of duty would be 150 per cent. on the value of the article, he thought the hon. Member was quite competent to make that calculation himself. The proposition made by the Brazilian government was, that its sugar should be admitted into this country at the same rate of duty as colonial Sugar. There was subsequently a relaxation of that condition; and the Brazilian government offered, that whatever might be the amount of duty on colonial Sugar, the duty on Brazilian Sugar should not exceed that by more than one-tenth—that was to say, if 10s. was the duty on colonial produce, the duty on Brazilian produce should not exceed 11s. With respect to manufactured produce, the proposal of the Brazilian government was, that the duty on cotton wool should be 40 per cent. ad valorem; that the duty on woollen goods should be 30 per cent. ad valorem; on other articles there was to be no restriction.

Mr. Warburton said, the question was simply an arithmetical one; it was whether 27s. 6d.—that was 25s., plus 2s. 6d.—was not ad valorem a duty at the rate of 158 per cent. His hon. Friend wished to draw a contrast between the rate of duty the Brazilians wished to put on our produce, and the rate of duty they were prepared to submit to from us, that was 40 or 50 per cent. on their side, on our goods, against 158 per cent. on our side, on their Sugar.

EMPLOYMENT OF SHIPS TO COLLECT RATES (IRELAND).] Captain Pechell rose to explain a statement which he had made on Friday last on the subject of the employment of the Navy to enforce the payment of Poor-rates in Ireland. The right hon. Baronet opposite, one of the Lords of the Admiralty, had stated that he was not aware of the existence of such a practice; and he had quoted from an Irish county paper a statement that the Earl of Lucan had, at a meeting of the Castlebar Union, declared his determination rather to encourage resistance to the poor-rate collectors, than to submit to the imposition of a new rate, while so large a portion of the first rate remained uncollected. In reply to the Earl of Lucan, Captain Blake was reported to have said that naval forces were coming round to the coast; and the Earl of Lucan was reported to have replied that he had no doubt but that the Government would send forces to enforce the collection of the rates. He had since received a communication from the Earl of Lucan denying that he had ever made such a statement, and he thought it his duty to state that fact to the House. At the same time, he begged to state that he had only quoted the statement as he had found it in the Mayo Telegraph, published in the noble Earl's own county.

REDUCTION OF THE THREE-AND-A-HALF PER CENT. STOCKS.] House in a Committee on the Three-and-a-Half per Cent. Annuities Acts.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer: The subject, Sir, which it is my duty to submit to the House is one which will be acknowledged by every one to be of very considerable importance. It involves the dealing with a large amount of the public debt. It is calculated to produce a great annual saving of the charge which the public incur on account of that debt; and if the House should be pleased to agree to the Measure which I shall submit to it, that Measure will tend, in my opinion, to raise the character and the power of this country by evincing the fact of her great resources, combined with a strict application of honour in the discharge of her national engagements. If I were for the first time calling upon the House to deal with a subject of this importance, I might think it necessary to enlarge upon the motives which justify me in making such a proposal as that which I am about to submit to the House. But I am not the first financial Minister of this country who has had to perform the pleasing task of recommending a similar arrangement to the House, and the principle upon which this arrangement proceeds is one so universally acknowledged by Statesmen of the greatest financial ability, and by men of every shade of political opinion—it has been so frequently recommended by Committees of this House, and so frequently acknowledged and confirmed by Parliament, that I feel myself relieved from the necessity which, upon such an occasion, might otherwise be imposed upon me of showing to the House the correctness of the principle upon which I ask it to proceed. My task is of a different nature. The propriety of thus affording relief to the public being acknowledged, the duty that devolves upon me is to satisfy the House that the time has arrived, and that the circumstances are favourable for accomplishing a reduction of the interest on the National Debt, which will produce a great public annual saving. It is in the discharge of that duty, then, that I now present myself to the House, and I beg their attention for a short period while I state to them the grounds upon which I conceive it to be my duty to propose, and upon which I trust the House will think it their duty to concur in, the Measure which I shall submit to them. The proceeding I am about to recommend to the House, is to deal with a very large amount of debt—an amount of debt absolutely larger than any with which Parliament has ever been called upon to deal. It is a sum amounting to little less than 250,000,000*l.* of the National Debt. If it be considered relatively in its proportion to the whole amount of the debt, I cannot say that in that respect the amount is unprecedented, because when I look back to the first occasion on which a reduction of the annual interest was proposed to the House of Commons, by Mr. Pelham in the year 1749, I find that that Minister had to deal with a sum inferior in amount to the present, but with a sum which, compared with the existing debt of the country at the time, amounted to more than one-third of the whole amount of the then debt of the country. But, even at that early period, that able Minister, relying upon the character and credit of the country, and upon the disposition of all its inhabitants to contribute to its true welfare, carried his arrangement into effect, without any difficulty, and with universal applause. I have alluded to the magnitude of the present operation, because I think that upon an occasion of this sort it is fitting that the House should have the whole case fully before them, and that in considering the circumstances under which the arrangement is to be made, they should be fully aware of the interests which are at stake, and which must form, in the eyes of every reflecting person, a main element in the consideration of the subject. I say, Sir, that the time has arrived in which this operation can be effected with safety and security to the public, and I think I may add, with every reasonable chance of success. In the first place I may, in proof of the reasonableness of that belief, allude to the general opinion of the country for some time past, that it is now the duty of the Government to undertake some operation of this kind. No man can have paid any attention to the organs of public opinion without seeing, in the midst of very varying views as to the course that ought to be pursued, one uniform expression of opinion that the time was not distant at which the interest on the debt would be susceptible of reduction. And that opinion thus generally expressed is confirmed by an attentive consideration of the present state of the money market of this country. I believe that there never was a period in the history of this country at which the amount of capital seeking employment was greater than it is at the present moment. That abundance of capital has resulted from various causes. It has been in a great degree the result of the large amount of capital which the industry of individuals in this country has in a series of years accumulated, and which has created an amount of wealth greater than prevails in any other country in the world. It is also owing, in a great degree, to that general discredit of foreign securities, and that uncertainty which has attended the payment of interest upon those securities, which has made British capitalists unwilling to invest their money in that way. It has been increased also by that confidence in the firmness of our securities, which has brought to this country not only the capital of her own children, produced on her own soil, but which has drawn to this great city the capital of other nations, seeking for that capital a safe investment. The evidence, indeed, of that abundance of capital is to be found in the prices which our securities bring at this moment, and in the interest which those securities afford to those who have invested their money in them. At the present moment Consols bear an interest of a little more than 3*l.* 1*s.* per cent., and Exchequer Bills produce the owner an interest scarcely exceeding 2*l.* 4*s.* per cent. And although if we look to private securities it must be admitted that the rate of interest to be derived from them is greater, as it naturally must be, than that derived from the public securities, yet having to deal with public securities, we are justified in referring rather to the value of those securities in the market than to the value of loans made by private individuals. But notwithstanding this favourable state of the money market at the present moment, it may, perhaps be said, that there are circumstances which should lead us to think that this abundance of money, and this facility of acquiring loans, are likely to be of a temporary character. But, Sir, when I look around me, and see the good understanding which prevails between this country and all Foreign Powers—when I see the continued influx into this country day by day of capital from other countries, when I observe the revival of trade, of industry and of commerce in all parts of the world, when I see that the disturbing causes of war and tumult which had existed in distant countries are now effectually removed—and when above all, I recollect the energy and the industry of my countrymen in improving the opportunities which this altered state of circumstances affords—I cannot anticipate any reduction in the amount of capital to be employed at home, which should forbid the attempt, which I call upon the House to make, of relieving ourselves from a great annual charge. Sir, there is another essential element in the consideration of the period at which it may be proper to make changes like the present, and that is the state of the Revenue and the Expenditure of the country. I feel, Sir, what I am sure every Member who has turned his attention to this subject must feel, that a state which has not means adequate to defray its current expenditure by the resources it raises within the year, is not in a condition satisfactorily to deal with the debt which it may have to discharge. Its powers of dealing with any such subject are necessarily curtailed by the necessity of providing for the daily or the yearly service; and it must be compelled to forego advantages which, under a different state of things, it might be right and expedient that it should claim. I am happy to say, Sir,—and in saying it I am aware that I pay the highest tribute to the energy and the vigour of the House of Commons which I am now addressing—I am happy to say that by their exertions in the year 1842, and the determination which they evinced to place the Revenue of the country on a footing adequate to meet every exigency of the public service, they have placed themselves in a situation in which they may congratulate themselves that the Revenue of the country does somewhat more than equal its annual Expenditure. And they have thereby reaped the advantages which a firm adherence to the principle upon which they have acted is sure to give; that is, the effecting not a temporary reduction of the annual expenditure but a permanent reduction of that charge which bears most heavily upon the country. Sir, I have said that the income of the present year will, so far as I am at present enabled to calculate, more than suffice to meet the charges of the year. So far as we have had experience of the two last quarters this has been shown by documents already before the House; and the House will observe, moreover, in those documents this additional circumstance of congratulation, that not only have we before us the prospect of meeting every current expense but it will be found on a reference to that Paper I have a short time since had the honour to lay on the Table of the House, that whereas at the commencement of the year the balance in the Exchequer was about 1,400,000*l.*, that balance was raised at the end of the last quarter to 4,700,000*l.* And every one must be conscious what great facilities for any important financial operation must be derived from that improvement in our situation, which, although far from making the Exchequer altogether independent of advances from other quarters, has, nevertheless, a direct operation on the amount of those advances and by diminishing interest on them gives greater energy and power to those to whom the Administration of the Financial Affairs of the country is confided.

I am happy to be also enabled to state to the House, that speaking from the information which I now possess, there are no Deficiency Bills of the Bank unsatisfied. We are at this period of the quarter free from the incumbrance of those advances which have on former occasions been made by the Bank of England for the purpose of enabling the Government to meet the demands of the public service. I can state further to the House, that since the 5th of April last it has not been necessary on any one occasion to apply to the Bank for advances in anticipation of the Supplies voted by Parliament—a proceeding authorised by a Resolution of the Committee of Ways and Means, and which has under less favourable circumstances been essential to the carrying on of the business of the country. So far, therefore, as these floating incumbrances are concerned, which, however useful and advantageous in themselves, cripple the efforts of a Government in undertaking arrangements like the present, I can assure the House that from these incumbrances we are at the present moment free. I would also point the attention of the House to this circumstance, that the amount of the Unfunded Debt is one which, considering the great resources of this country, is of a very limited description—less, indeed, than on many antecedent occasions. After deducting the Exchequer Bills which are to be defrayed from the money to be derived from the Chinese contributions, the amount of the Exchequer Bills in circulation is between 18,000,000*l.* and 19,000,000*l.* only; they bear an interest, as I said before, not exceeding 2*l.* 4*s.* per cent.; and they are on this day at a premium in the market of 3*l.* 13*s.* per cent. Looking, therefore, at the whole state of our financial position—considering the wealth, the growing wealth, of this country, and its consequent accumulation of capital—considering that there is every prospect, humanly speaking, of a continuance of friendly relations between this country and Foreign Powers—considering that the Revenue has recovered from that temporary difficulty under which it had so long laboured—considering that we are free from those incumbrances of the unfunded or floating debt, which on former occasions had embarrassed the country, I think I have made out a case to the House which shows that the time has arrived at which it is the duty of those who have charge of the financial affairs of the country to make an attempt to reduce the interest upon the National Debt; and that moreover this is a time at which every reasonable man will admit that an attempt of the kind may be made with the greatest prospect of success. Sir, the debt with which we have to deal on this occasion amounts, as I before stated, to nearly 250,000,000*l.*, and consists of four several kinds of stock. In the first place the stock of Three-and-a-Half per Cent. originally created in 1818, was the foundation of the stock of this description amounting to 10,000,000. The next head of stock is the Reduced Three-and-a-Half per Cents. being the stock first established in the year 1760, and originally a Four per cent. stock, subsequently increased at different periods by several other loans and the funding of Exchequer Bills, but reduced in the year 1824, when the Earl of Ripon was Chancellor of the Exchequer, to Three-and-a-Half per Cent.; that debt amounts to 67,500,000*l.* The next stock is the New Three-and-a-Half per Cents. being the stock originally funded in the year 1784 at Five per cent., but which has, from the gradual progress of the growth of capital in this country, and the confidence entertained in its resources, undergone two several reductions; one in the year 1822, when Mr. Vansittart was Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the other in 1830, when I had the honour to hold the office I now fill, when it was reduced to Three-and-a-Half at which it has ever since remained. This stock amounts to 157,000,000*l.* The last stock is the one called the Old Three-and-a-Half per Cent. Stock, originally an Irish Stock, created in 1787, under various Acts of the Irish Parliament, from time to time augmented by additional sums that were added, making it amount to 14,600,000*l.* The amount of all these Stocks is 249,600,000*l.*, or, in round numbers, nearly 250,000,000*l.*, as I at first stated. It might certainly have been legally correct to have dealt separately with these several branches of Three-and-a-Half per Cent. Stock; but I conceive that principle, in itself legally correct, would have been in itself essentially unjust. I did not think it becoming in a great country like this to take advantage of one or two particular branches of Stock of smaller amount, and call on the proprietors who had invested their money in those funds to submit to a reduction which, from the smallness of the Stock, might more easily have been effected than on the whole. I, therefore, felt it my duty to bring a measure before the House, recommending, that the same rule should be applied to the whole, and that the reduction of interest should be made at once on all. With respect to these Stocks which I have enumerated, there is some difference in the circumstances in which they stand. With respect to three of them, they are absolutely at the disposal of Parliament; there is no guarantee existing to prevent Parliament from paying them off, or from offering a reduction of interest; no conditions which interfere with dealing with them in any way most expedient for the public. But there is one head of this Stock—namely, the Three-and-a-Half per Cents. of 1818, which stands in a somewhat different situation. When that Stock was created, the condition on which the holders of it advanced their money to the public was that they should have three benefits given them—first, a guarantee of interest up to April, 1829, a guarantee which, having been fulfilled, does not enter now into the consideration; another, that they should have six months' notice before any reduction or redemption of Stock; thirdly, that they should not be paid off in sums of less than 500,000*l.* at a time. In any arrangement, therefore, which I may submit to the House on this subject I am sure I shall carry the House along with me in adhering, to the letter, to the engagement then given, and in dealing with this stock in some way so as to produce a deduction in the annual interest, yet, in effecting that diminution, observing strictly, and to the letter, every existing engagement. Sir, if I look to the precedents for conducting operations of this description, I shall find at different times various modes of proceeding adopted. Advantages have been given to holders of a higher stock to induce them to accept a certain amount in a lower stock in many different forms. Sometimes these advantages were immediate, sometimes deferred; sometimes they were given in the shape of a pecuniary bonus, augmenting the capital of the debt; sometimes in augmenting the interest for a limited period; or sometimes—very frequently—nay, I may almost say the general advantage given has been by a guarantee against a further reduction for a certain period after the reduction has taken place. Many plans, as the House, no doubt, is well aware, have been put forward in the organs which inform the public as to the best mode of effecting the present reduction; but I think the House will agree with me in thinking that they have only three courses open to them of dealing with stock of this description with a view to reduction. The first would be to give to every holder of 100*l.* in the Three-and-a-half per Cent. Stock an equivalent amount of Stock in the Three per Cents., adding thereby to the capital of the Stock created. Another plan very much entertained by the public, and on which much has been said in favour, is to create a Two-and-a-Half per Cent. Stock, and give the holder of every 100*l.* in the Three-and-a-Half per Cents. such an amount of the Two-and-Half Stock as shall produce an interest of 3*l.* per cent. per annum. The third plan agitated was to reduce them to a Three per cent. Stock through the medium of a Three-and-a-Quarter per cent. Stock, the object of all being to reduce the interest of Three-and-a-Half per cent. to Three per cent., the advantage in point of interest to the public being intended to be the same, but the mode by which it is to be effected being different according to the different Stock in which the change is to be made. It is impossible to deny that in each of these plans some advantages are to be found, and I doubt not that there will be found advocates of all these plans among those who will discuss the proposition which I am about to make. I think that before I state the plan which I wish the House to adopt, it would be right I should lay down the principles on which in reviewing these several plans, my decision had been guided. I think it my duty, as agent for the public debtor, to endeavour to secure to the public the greatest possible advantage which can be secured consistently with that due regard for the creditor which fairness and a sense of justice require. My first duty is undoubtedly to the public, whose servant I am; but I feel it is perfectly possible to reconcile that duty with the regard due to the interests of the individuals who have lent their money to the public. Another principle on which I am determined to act is this, that I do not think it would be just to purchase great present advantages to the country at the expense of burthens to be sustained by those who come after. I think with respect to debts incurred in cases of war, it is quite legitimate that posterity should bear their share of those burthens by which the Empire has been extended, or the liberties of the country, which they are hereafter to enjoy, preserved; but to incur additional debt in times of peace, and thus burthen those who are to come after us, with a view of obtaining a greater immediate relief for ourselves, is a course which I do say I myself reprobate, and I am sure, when I mention it, that I shall meet the general concurrence of those who hear me. Such being the principles on which I propose to act, and in which, I trust, the House will concur, I have to apply them to the plans which I have mentioned. It must be obvious to the House that if the Three-and-a-Half per Cents. are to be reduced to Three per cent., by giving an amount of Consols, it would be essentially necessary in that operation, as was done in 1822, to give a certain bonus in the Three per Cents, for the purpose of ensuring the conversion. Considering the present price of the funds and the necessity of endeavouring to secure the conversion, the country would have been obliged thereby to create an additional capital debt of from 10,000,000*l.* to 12,000,000*l.*, the immediate result of which, to the public, would have been a saving of between 800,000*l.* and 900,000*l.* a-year. With respect to the second plan, to create a Two-and-a-Half per Cent. Stock, and give an equivalent in that so as to make it produce Three per cent. per annum, the augmentation of the capital of the debt must have been increased by such a plan not by 10,000,000*l.* but by 50,000,000*l.*, and although the saving by that arrangement to the public would have been 1,200,000*l.* a year, yet on the principle which I have laid down, I do not think that saving would justify or compensate for an addition to the mass of our debt by a capital of 50,000,000*l.* to be paid hereafter; for, however, at the present moment, it may, in the opinion of some gentlemen, be a matter of utter indifference what may be the amount of a debt which already amounts 700,000,000*l.*, and with respect to which persons may entertain very little prospect of ever paying it off, yet when we come to consider that a great nation like this may hereafter be engaged in wars and beset with difficulties, and under a necessity which might oblige it to recur to the money market of the country for the means of supporting those wars without ruin to the people, and to secure the preservation of the State, if we then weigh what would be the effect of 50,000,000*l.* or 60,000,000*l.* additional debt at such a moment, whatever may be their desire to effect an actual immediate saving of expense to the public, we shall see that to march on in such a course would be fatal to the permanent interest of the country. I, therefore, think it my duty altogether to discard these plans for procuring a large annual saving to the public by increasing the capital of the debt. The other plan then remains to be considered, which is to reduce the Three-and-a-Half per Cents. to Three per Cents., through the medium of a Three-and-a-quarter per cent. Stock. The result of that arrangement in the first instance, will, undoubtedly, be a diminished annual saving to the public; but against that is to be set the consideration that no increase of capital debt will be created, with this additional advantage, that there will be a future further reduction of the debt, which will secure, in due time, an increased advantage in point of annual revenue, an increased advantage so much the more valuable, because although it may not be brought to apply so immediately to the resources of the country, yet the country will receive the full value of the reduction, without any countervailing disadvantage. The plan which I shall propose to the House is, that every holder of Three-and-a-half per cent. Stock, shall receive a like amount of Three-and-a-quarter per cent. Stock, on which interest at the rate of Three-and-a-quarter per cent. per annum shall be paid until the 10th of October 1854, giving ten years during which Three-and-a-quarter will be payable on the Stock in question. I further propose, from and after that date, that the interest to be paid shall be at the rate of Three per cent. only, and that this Stock so being at Three per cent. shall be guaranteed against any further reduction for twenty years from and after that period, and the Stock, therefore, will remain at Three-and-a-quarter per cent. until October 1854, and from that date until the year 1874 at Three per cent. per annum, whatever may be the improvement in the market or whatever reductions may be applied to other portions of the National Debt. [Interruption, occasioned by many Members leaving the House.] I can hardly expect further attention at the hands of the House. The arrangements will be made in the mode in which similar arrangements have been made before, by allowing all persons, for a limited time, to express their dissent from the terms offered. With respect to that branch of Stock to which I have before alluded—namely, that of 1818, the proceedings will be different. I shall call on the House to resolve that that Stock shall be paid off at the date at which it is now legally liable to be paid off, unless the proprietors of the stock shall consent to accept the terms offered. The periods fixed will be those which have been fixed in analagous cases of reduction. In the instance of the three greater Stocks, the time allowed for dissent will be to the 23rd of March for England; for Europe to the 22nd of June: and out of Europe, to the 1st of February, 1845. Under these arrangements, if I should succeed in carrying them into effect, the immediate saving to the public, beginning the 10th of next October, will be a sum of 625,000*l.* a-year; and in the year 1854, when the other reduction comes into operation, the public will farther have the benefit of a saving of 625,000*l.* a-year more, making a total saving of 1,250,000*l.* a-year, without any disturbance of the public interests or any augmentation of capital, and without resorting to any of those expedients which ought not, and which would not be justified by the situation of the country, and moreover, without throwing the burthen on those who may come hereafter. I trust I have clearly explained to the House, the principles on which I intend to act. There is another important point connected with these arrangements which I think it necessary to state to the House. It is well known to those who have paid any attention to the finances of the country, that hitherto there has been considerable inconvenience experienced, an inconvenience affecting both the currency and credit of the country, from the great inequality of the payment of the interest of the debt which takes place at the different quarters of the year. At the present moment the amount of debt on which interest is paid in January and July amounts to nearly 534,000,000*l.*, while the amount of the debt on which interest is paid in April and October is only 215,000,000*l.*; and this inequality necessarily produces great fluctuations in the issues of notes as the means of effecting the payments. It is an inconvenience to the public interest and affects all the monetary transactions of the country. I have, therefore, thought it my duty in making the arrangements with respect to the general interest of this debt, to take the opportunity of equalising the payment so as to make them of nearly the same amount at the different quarters of the year, and I propose, for this reason, that the new Stock, part of which is now paid in January and July, and part in April and October, should, on and after this arrangement, be paid only in April and October, the parties whose dividends become due in July receiving a quarter's dividend in October; so that the whole debt, under the new arrangement, may start on the 10th of October. The consequence of the arrangement will be, that in the January and July quarters in future, the amount of the debt on which the interest is paid will be 373,000,000*l.*, and in April and October 376,000,000*l.*, making as equal a division as, under the circumstances, can be accomplished, and thereby tending I believe sincerely, most materially to benefit the general interests of the country by equalising throughout the year the different payments and receipts. Sir, I know not that it is necessary for me to make any further explanation to the House of the objects which the resolutions which I shall put into your hands are calculated to carry into effect. I, therefore, in conclusion, can only say, that if it shall be my good fortune to carry through with success this measure of relief to the public from a great present burthen and from a future burthen equally onerous at the expiration of ten years, it will be to myself the most gratifying circumstance of my life that I have been enabled on two several occasions, in the year 1830 and in the present year—to recommend to Parliament measures with respect to reductions of the national debt, which meeting their approbation, and approved of by them, will, I believe, meet with the general approbation of the country. However I may feel a personal gratification with regard to this question, it is still more satisfactory to believe that this House will be the instrument for procuring for the country the great advantage of that reduction of the annual charge which is the contemplated result of the arrangements now before the House. But, great as this gratification will be, there is one still higher, which I feel, both as a Minister of the Crown and as an Englishman, and it is this—it will give an irrefragable proof of the extent of the resources of this country, and furnish to other nations an example of the benefits which result from a strict adherence to national faith, and the maintenance of the public credit, with the full knowledge that such an adherence will never fail to reap its reward. We in this country have had to struggle with great difficulties. We have been engaged in arduous contests. There have been moments when the minds of the bravest among us have quailed, and given way to little short of despondency, reflecting on the difficulty of upholding the interests of the country, agitated by the pressure of taxation on those around us. But in times like these, we may well thank God that it never entered into the breast of Parliament to abandon the sacred principle of national faith. If we bore our burthens—heavy and sore as they were—it was under the confidence that honesty is the best policy. And now at a returning period of peace and tranquillity, we feel and we give to the world an example from which they may learn, that if in times of difficulty and danger they will look upon the maintenance of the public credit to be, as it is, the power and the strength of a country, the time may come when with universal approbation they may be enabled to afford real relief to their subjects, and to stand high among the nations of the earth. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the following resolutions:

“ 1. Resolved, That all and every person and persons, bodies politic and corporate, who now is or are or hereafter may be interested in or entitled unto any part of the National Debt, redeemable by law, which now carries an interest after the rate of 3*l.* 10*s.* per centum per annum, and known in Ireland by the several names of 3*l.* 10*s.* per Centum Old Stock and Government Debentures, Irish 3*l.* 10*s.* per Centum Reduced Annuities, and New 3*l.* 10*s.* per Centum Annuities and Government Debentures, and known in Great Britain by the several names of 3*l.* 10*s.* per Centum Reduced Annuities, and New 3*l.* 10*s.* per Centum Annuities, the dividends of which are paid either at the Bank of England or at the Bank of Ireland respectively, and who shall not signify his, her, or their dissent in the manner hereinafter mentioned, shall for every 100*l.* of such 3*l.* 10*s.* per Centum Annuities, or Government De-

"12. Resolved, That the Interest and Dividends payable in respect of the said 3*l.* 5*s.* per Centum Annuities and New 3*l.* per Centum Annuities shall be charged and chargeable upon, and shall be issued and paid out of, the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, on the 5th day of April and the 10th day of October in every year.

"13. Resolved, That every proprietor or proprietors of the said 3*l.* 10*s.* per Centum Annuities 1818, shall receive the Dividends of the said Annuities due thereon on the 10th day of October 1844, and no longer.

"14. Resolved, That it shall be lawful for the Accountant General of the Courts of Chancery in England and Ireland respectively, and also for the Accountant General of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, and for the Accountant in Bankruptcy in England, at any time before the 8th day of July 1844, to signify to the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, on behalf of any suitor or suitors, or others interested in any such 3*l.* 10*s.* per Centum Annuities 1818, standing in the names of such Accountants General and Accountant respectively, their assent to accept and receive shares in the said 3*l.* 5*s.* per Centum Annuities, and New 3*l.* per Centum Annuities, in lieu of all such 3*l.* 10*s.* per Centum Annuities 1818, standing in their names respectively; and the said Accountants General and Accountant respectively shall be fully indemnified against all actions, suits, and proceedings for and in respect of any action, matter, or thing done by them respectively in pursuance thereof.

"15. Resolved, That all executors, administrators, guardians, and trustees, may signify such assent at any time before the 20th day of April 1844, in respect of such shares of any of the said 3*l.* 10*s.* per Centum Annuities 1818, for the holding of which their names shall be made use of respectively, and shall be indemnified for giving such assent in respect thereof; and all executors, administrators, guardians, and trustees not signifying such assent, shall be deemed not to have assented as aforesaid, and shall be paid off accordingly."

Mr. F. T. Baring would trouble the Committee with but a very few words in reference to the resolutions which had just been submitted. To the various matters introduced very properly by the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer into the early part of his speech, he did not on that occasion think it necessary to turn his attention; he would, therefore, confine his observations to the proposal itself, and it was most gratifying to him to be enabled to say that he had heard that proposal stated with very great satisfaction. He should be sorry if in a question so important and so intimately connected with the public faith, the mere fact of their sitting on different sides of the House should occasion the slightest difference of opinion between himself and the right hon. Gentleman. Of course he confined his observations on that occasion to the principle upon which the right hon. Gentleman's plan proceeded. Whether the terms in which he proposed to carry out the scheme were inadequate to the performance of its duties or not, the holders of the stock would be the best judges, and must decide. The plan, so far as its principle went, and as it had been explained by the right hon. Gentleman, he was bound to say was in many respects most beneficial. The first great advantage of the plan was—that which had been stated by the right hon. Gentleman—that it did not create any additional debt. That in itself was a great public advantage. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had not stated, but it was only fair that he should state it, that the course which the right hon. Gentleman had taken was a very honest one for a Chancellor of the Exchequer to adopt, because he lost that advantage he might have obtained if he had made the reduction of the annual decrease take place immediately. He had however postponed it, though the contrary course would have been most convenient to the right hon. Gentleman—he had postponed the operation of his plan on consid-

ration of public faith and public interests. The right hon. Gentleman had not referred to this circumstance, but he felt bound to do so in justice to the right hon. Gentleman. Another advantage was the manner in which the plan would operate on private individuals, who were holders of the stock with which it was proposed to deal. It would come rather sharp upon them if the full reduction of one half per cent. were made at once; but by reducing the interest one quarter per cent. in the first instance and another quarter in ten years hence, they reduced the incomes of private holders in the most convenient mode to them. There was one circumstance connected with this proceeding which had been referred to by the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in regard to which he could not forbear the expression of the entire satisfaction and pleasure he felt, viz., that it would hold out not only to ourselves, but to other nations, a great practical lesson, that honesty and good faith, even under the greatest difficulties, had their pecuniary advantages as well as the more important and solid advantages resulting from the operation which such a course must necessarily have upon the good opinion and good feelings of the world. On the detailed plan of the right hon. Gentleman, he could not then, of course, give any opinion; he could only say that he most heartily wished him success.

Sir J. Rae Reid was gratified at the tone in which the question was discussed, and felt that he should not do his duty towards the right hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir F. Baring) if he did not congratulate him on the very handsome and liberal manner in which he had expressed his approval of the Government scheme, and he flattered himself that that feeling would be general. He was sure the holders of the Three-and-a-Half per Cents. would be gratified when they were informed of the manner in which the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to deal with the subject. The plan, under all the circumstances, was, he thought, the most convenient that could be proposed, and he believed it would give almost universal satisfaction. He had once been accused of being a most sanguine individual. He had been accused of making use of a metaphor in speaking of the commercial and manufacturing distress which prevailed two years ago. He had said, that that distress was a mere passing cloud, and that the sunshine of prosperity would soon return. And now what was the state of the case? The bright star of hope was before them, and he was satisfied that ere long the country would arrive at prosperity and success.

Mr. P. M. Stewart expressed his approbation of the manner in which the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been made. In the plan proposed, he thought the right hon. Gentleman had exercised not only a sound judgment, but a self-denial, which was highly creditable to him, in not taking advantages which he might have been expected to take. There was, however, one topic in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman which ought not to be passed over without some words of caution. He alluded to that portion of the right hon. Gentleman's speech in which he referred to the prospects of returning prosperity. The right hon. Gentleman could scarcely have forgotten the embarrassments which had followed the prosperity of 1824, and the disappointment of the sanguine expectations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer of that day, who, from talking so much about prospects of prosperity which were never realised, but utterly dispelled by the events of 1826, obtained for himself the name of "Prosperity Robinson." He hoped the present Chancellor of the Exchequer would not allow himself to be misled in a similar way by appearances which might be equally deceptive. The circumstances which had enabled the right hon. Gentleman to propose an arrangement so beneficial to the public creditor, afforded no proof of the prosperous condition of the country to which the right hon. Gentleman had alluded. On the contrary, the present condition of the money market, he thought, was a proof of the falling off of our domestic and foreign trade, by which capitalists were induced to invest their money in the public funds. This it was that had increased the price of funds to such an amount as had enabled the Chancellor of the Exchequer to propose the arrangements he had submitted to.

Sir John Easthope must apologise to the House for venturing to address to it any opinion of his upon such a question; but he could not refrain from expressing his approbation of the plan which the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer had propounded, and his cordial satisfaction at the unanimity with which it had been received; though he could not participate in the opinion of the hon. Member for Dover (Sir J. R. Reid), that the proposal would be accepted with delight by the holders of the stock. He congratulated the right hon. Gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer in having proposed a plan which was at once most just, simple, and certain of success. Whether he referred to its justice—looking at the present state of the money market, and the circumstances of the country; to its clearness and simplicity, by being divested of all complexity in the manner in which it was to be carried into effect; or whether in regard to the acceptance which it was, from those circumstances, almost certain to receive in all quarters, he could not doubt that the plan would be perfectly successful. He therefore begged to congratulate the House and the right hon. Gentleman, independently of all party considerations, on his having devised a scheme so just and effective.

Mr. W. Williams thought, that in the present condition of the money market, the terms proposed by the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer were as liberal as could be expected; but his chief ground for approving of the scheme was, that it made no addition to the capital of the debt. On former occasions, when the interest on the public funds had been reduced, it had been usual to give a bonus to the holders, thus increasing the funded debt. This was a most objectionable proceeding; and he was glad it was not adopted in the present instance. From the commencement of the American war, in 1775, to the close of the French war in 1815, 589,000,000*l.* had been added to the capital of the debt. He would not make any comment on the course of the Government in bringing up Stock to its present rate, for he did not wish to say anything to disturb the unanimity which prevailed; but he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer might propose another operation in finance, one which he (Mr. W. Williams) recommended some years ago, which would be attended with great public benefit, viz., a further reduction of the interest on Exchequer-bills, from 1½*d.* to 1¼*d.* a-day. At no former time had the premium on Exchequer-bills been higher than it was at present, in proportion to the rate of interest, and there could be no more appropriate time for making the reduction. He must join with the hon. Member who had last spoken, in cautioning the Chancellor of the Exchequer against indulging too far in the opinion that the existing indications of returning prosperity were likely to be permanent. The large quantity of gold in the Bank coffers, as compared with former years, was the consequence, not of the prosperity of the country, but of the recent operations in the gold coinage.

Mr. Alderman Thompson said, all the great interests of the country were prospering. The trade of the country, both domestic and foreign, was improving in all directions, and the great accumulation of capital in the country he attributed not to the falling off in trade and commerce, so much as to the discredit with which the British public looked upon foreign securities; especially on North American stock, which for many years had been a favourite investment. He thought, too, that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. Williams) was mistaken as to the cause of there being so much bullion at the Bank; for it must be remembered that the ten millions of light sovereigns which had found their way to the Bank had been replaced by others of full weight and value. The large amount of capital, therefore, in the country, was in his opinion a consequence of the prosperity of our foreign trade. With regard to the proposition of the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he must be permitted to tender his humble acknowledgment of its fairness, so far as regarded the stockholders; and fair also, as regarded the public debtor. He thought the right hon. Gentleman had acted most wisely when he saw the large amount of capital in the country, and the high rate at which the three-and-a-half stock stood, to reduce the interest, and that he had exercised a sound discretion in reducing the Three-and-a-half per cents. to three-and-a-quarter per cent., in the first instance, and to three per cent. at a future period, for if the full reduction were made at once, it would, without doubt, create some discontent and much confusion.

Mr. B. Hawes said, the first question to be considered in reference to the proposal to reduce the interest on those securities, was whether it were made with justice to, and would meet with the perfect concurrence of the parties concerned. He thought the right hon. Gentleman had vindicated his plan so far as its justice was concerned. The next question was whether it were a politic measure, and of that he thought there could be but little doubt. There was another part of the scheme which had not been adverted to by those hon. Gentlemen who had gone before him, viz., the arrangement proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the equalization of the dividends, which he considered of great value. He was addressing many hon. Gentlemen who were intimately connected with monetary transactions, and, he believed they would agree with him that that part of the measure, if proposed by itself, would have been accepted as a measure of great and peculiar advantage. The right hon. Gentleman, then, in introducing his measure had accompanied it by an arrangement which would confer an important and beneficial alteration in the system of apportioning the periodical payments. He fully concurred with what had fallen from the right hon. Member for Portsmouth; and he was quite sure the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer would feel, after the manner in which this proposal had been met on that (the Opposition) side of the House, that whatever discussion might take place, he would be governed by a reference to the public interests only, and not by any wish to throw difficulties in the way of the Government; and he hoped the course now adopted would encourage the Chancellor of the Exchequer to believe that when he should have great and beneficial measures to propose, sound in principle and consistent with justice, no party or factious opposition would be found. Though he prided himself on being a party man, knowing that by combining with a party only could he hope to be of use to his country in that House, still, on matters relating to trade and commerce, or any other subject, when the Government propounded sound principles and acted on true policy, however strong his opinions might be on certain party questions, and however strong his predilections in favour of the party with which he was connected, he trusted those opinions and predilections would never operate to induce him to throw any difficulties in the way.

Mr. Warburton joined in the congratulations which had been expressed at the turn the debate had taken, and at the saving which would result from the proposal when carried into effect. But while they were congratulating themselves that the money market was in a position to enable the Government to effect this operation, it ought to be recollected, that it was by the low rate of interest, which showed the low rate of profit obtained in trading and commercial transactions, which enabled the Chancellor of the Exchequer to succeed—

“—medio de fonte leporum
Surgit amari aliquid.”

Mr. Blewitt was surprised the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not stated how he proposed to pay off the dissentient holders.

Mr. Ricardo trusted the right hon. Gentleman would be prepared to pay off the Dissentients, should there be any. He approved of the plan the right hon. Gentleman had propounded, but it was possible that there might be some objection on the part of the holders, as the terms offered to them were not so favourable as they had been led to expect. He hoped, however, the right hon. Gentleman would be enabled to carry out the plan as he had proposed it. He wished to know how it was intended to levy the Income Tax on these annuities for the next ten years previous to the final reduction—whether it was to be taken as a permanent annuity, or a terminable one?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, with regard to the Income Tax, it would apply as at present to the whole incomes of the holders; and those who derived their incomes from an interest of Three-and-a-Half Per Cent., would pay on what they received only as they did now on the Three-and-a-Half per Cent. He could not sit down without expressing his strong feeling of the great kindness with which the proposition had been received by the House. At the same time he was bound to say that it was nothing more than he had anticipated. For whatever the party warfare in which they had been engaged—as he hoped and believed for the benefit of the country—he must say that on all occasions where practical measures of this kind were proposed by the Government, the House was always disposed to receive them favourably and to consider them with fairness and attention. He again thanked the House for its unanimity, of which he was the more sensible when he considered that that unanimity would secure to the public the advantages of the proposition.

Resolutions agreed to. House resumed.

On the Order of the Day for going into Committee of Supply, having been moved,

Mr. Sharman Crawford presented a petition from Aberdeen, praying that the House, before going into Committee of Supply, should take measures for redressing the grievances of the people, and particularly for securing a full and fair representation of the people at large. The hon. Gentleman then presented similar petitions from Bridport, Darlington, and Galashiels.

BLOCKADE OF THE RIVER PLATA.]

Mr. Ewart rose to make such inquiry as he trusted would not be unbecoming on his part in reference to our relations with Rio de la Plata, and particularly as to the war between the States of Buenos Ayres and Monte Video. He could conceive scarcely any part of the world of so much interest to our commerce as the Southern States of the Southern Continent of America. There was scarcely any part of the world yet unexplored by our commerce, capable of increasing it to so large an extent. As far as river communication was concerned, there was hardly any country so favourable for commerce as those vast provinces watered by the Plata, the Parana, and the Paraguay. The commerce of these States was of the greatest importance to this country. He need not refer to the article of hides, but he believed that the country in question had also the means of extending the cultivation of cotton. Indigo, too, might be produced there, and they had recent experience that wool—before almost unknown as coming from that part of the world—now formed one of the largest articles it sent into our markets. South America now stood third in the list of our sources of supply of that article. But the cotton trade claimed a still greater share of the consideration of this country. Our exports in 1841 to Rio de la Plata amounted to 1,000,000*l.* One half of this amount consisted of cotton goods. The amount of woollen goods was 200,000*l.* There was also a considerable export of linen goods, and looking to the elements of demand for our manufactures, he thought that there were few regions claiming our attention as much as those of the Rio de la Plata. Turning to the imports from thence into this country, he found, that of late years, they had very considerably increased. He had already alluded to the article of wool. In 1830, we only imported 30,000 lbs. of wool, while we now imported 5,000,000 lbs., and that was the species of wool on which the wool duty was most onerously felt. He would next touch on what might be called the diplomatic part of the question. He had heard complaints of various sorts upon this part of the subject. It was hoped by people engaged in the trade, that the suspension of commerce which had taken place, would be put an end to by the joint interference of the French and English Governments. Our own commerce with Rio de la Plata was almost paralysed by the unfortunate war now waging. He knew that a great many of the persons who were in the habit of supplying returns for our manufactured goods, were forced to serve in the ranks of the conflicting parties, particularly by General Rosas. He had heard also that there did not exist a feeling of harmony between the English and French Commanders on the coast. Complaints had also been made of the conduct of our Minister at Buenos Ayres, and it had been stated, that he showed himself more favourable to the Buenos Ayrean than to the Monte Videan party; while the Commander on the coast was accused of being more favourable to the Monte Videan than the Buenos Ayrean party. In the hope that some course would be adopted which would have the effect of bringing about a general harmony in the proceedings of Government, and their officials, and of putting an end to this foolish war, he now appealed to the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government. It was expected by the merchants of Liverpool, and the manufacturers of Manchester, that the combined operation of the French and English Governments would have put an end to the war. Such, however, had not been the case. He had recently seen it stated that a French vessel had sailed from Rio Janeiro to the mouth of the Plata, and it was thought to have been the bearer of some common resolution on the part of both Governments, with the view of putting an end to the petty animosities of the discordant states. He would not say whether justice was on the side of Rosas or Rivers ; his object was the extension of our commerce and manufactures, and the general interests of this country and the world. He was convinced that the general policy of the right hon. Baronet, was a peaceful policy ; and so far as was consistent with his duties as an independent Member of Parliament, he would support him or any other Minister in that policy ; but he trusted that he would be enabled, along with that great man at the head of the French Government, to consult the interests of this country and of humanity, by maintaining, without dishonour to either nation, the peace of the world. It was in the hope that some common understanding might come to by the Governments of France and England, that he asked the right hon. Gentleman to state whether he could give them any hopes of the probable conclusion of this unfortunate warfare. France was, as well as this country, deeply concerned in its conclusion ; and where there was a common interest, there might be a common combination ; and it might not be impossible that the Government of this country, and that of France, might be successful in putting down a war, in the termination of which they were mutually interested.

Sir Robert Peel had heard with great satisfaction the observations which the hon. Gentleman had made towards the conclusion of his speech, with respect to his determination, as an independent Member of Parliament, to place a liberal construction on every Act of the Executive Government in this country, which had for its object the maintenance of amicable relations with France consistently with the honour and interests of this country. The hon. Gentleman might depend upon it, that no compromise of the mutual interests of the country, or the honour of the country, would take place ; but the hon. Gentleman, and those who concurred with him in politics, were strengthening the hands of the Government, and facilitating the grand object of the maintenance of peace, by the avowal of their determination not to look out for subjects for party advantages, while (the Government) was labouring honestly for the maintenance of peace, by throwing out imputations that they were acting in subversion to France. He wished that the great man at the head of the Ministry, in that country, who was now pursuing, from the purest and most honourable motives, a course perfectly consistent with the honour of his country—a course of which the grand aim was to maintain peace—he wished that that great and good Minister had not such obstructions thrown in his way, for party purposes, which he (Sir Robert Peel) was proud to say, were not thrown in the way of his own Government. He believed that the Prime Minister of France was influenced by precisely the same motives by which the Ministers of this country were influenced ; he believed that M. Guizot was convinced that for the interest of both countries, for the general interests of commerce and civilisation, that it was of the utmost importance that a good understanding should be maintained, consistently with their mutual honour, between the two nations. But that Minister was determined to purchase that good understanding by no concession injurious to the interests or to the honour of France, and he could justly bear that testimony to his character and conduct. He had found that that was always the principle by which M. Guizot was governed, and he hoped that the liberal and enlightened public opinion of France would support him against those violent party attacks with which he had to contend. He (Sir Robert Peel) quite agreed with the hon. Gentleman as to the importance of our commercial relations with South America. He also agreed with him as to the lamentable consequences of this most foolish war. He did not look merely to the importance of Buenos Ayres, or of Monte Video, but he looked upon the river Plata as the great natural inlet for our commerce with that portion of the South American continent. It was the channel by which the productions of that country would naturally be conveyed to this country, and by means of which, also, our manufactures were to be conveyed into the interior ; and, therefore, he concurred with the hon. Gentleman that nothing could be more injurious to the commerce not only of this country, but to that of South America, than the continuance of this war. The conflict, however, was by no means of an ordinary character. It was the rivalry of personal interests, carried on at the expense of the happiness and industrial prosperity of the country. But the hon. Gentleman must recollect that he should forfeit his claims to the hon. Gentleman's confidence as a minister of peace, if he undertook to control the discretion of these independent states by too forcible an application of power. The Government had already resorted to every means short of actual armed intervention for the purpose of terminating the war. They first offered singly the mediation of England at an early period of the war. They afterwards offered, in connection with France, the joint mediation of the two countries. That mediation was accepted by Monte Video, but was rejected by Buenos Ayres. No effort had been left untried for the purpose of terminating the war; and he hoped that the hon. Gentleman would agree with him in thinking that it would not be wise for this country to interfere, by force of arms, to compel the restoration of peace. Indeed, he doubted whether tranquillity, obtained by such forcible means, would be likely to last. At all events, it would be necessary, in the event of such a measure being adopted, that the armed force which had been employed in restoring temporary calm should remain there to enforce the peaceful arrangements. Whether it would be possible for the Brazils, France, and England united to put a stop to hostilities by force, he would not say; but it was quite clear, that if any armed intervention could be justified, it could only be so by the concurrence in it of the three Powers most deeply interested in the termination of the war—Britain, France, and the Brazils. With respect to the conduct of the diplomatic agents and the naval officers, he would remark that they being on the spot, and lamenting the continuance of hostilities, had laboured most zealously to terminate them. It was possible, that in their zeal they might have stepped rather beyond the strict line of their instructions; but if they have done so, they had been influenced by the best motives and the sincerest desire to restore tranquillity. By recent accounts which he had received, he thought it likely that the war would soon be brought to a termination. However, it was difficult to say. Nothing could be more complicated than the condition of the parties engaged in it. It was not properly a conflict between Monte Video and Buenos Ayres. In fact, there was a strong Buenos Ayrean party in Monte Video. There was a Federal party and an Unitarian party—not, of course, having any relation to the Unitarians of this country—in Buenos Ayres, and, therefore, the war might be considered as rather between different parties in Buenos Ayres than between Buenos Ayres and Monte Video. There was also mixed up with the contest the personal rivalry of General Rivera and General Rosas, a rivalry carried on with fierceness and acrimony which it was almost impossible for the people here to form an idea of. But he repeated that the last accounts which he had received, gave him reason to think that there was a probability that peace would be restored, in consequence of the reverses sustained by one of the conflicting parties. He thought that Buenos Ayres would probably prevail, but he trusted that upon peace being restored, the party which might have the ultimate triumph would adopt the policy of healing the wounds so wantonly inflicted on the two countries, by taking measures for the restoration of commerce and peaceable industry, and by cementing the good understanding between them by mutual commercial relations with this country.

Order of the Day read.

PUBLIC GRIEVANCES—STOPPING THE SUPPLIES.] On the Motion that the Speaker do now leave the Chair,

Mr. S. Crawford said, that he had persevered for a considerable time in trying to induce the House to consider the Grievances of the people before they entered into a Committee of Supply. He wished it to be understood that while he would cease to persevere in this course, he did not give up his protest against the competency of this House to make laws or impose taxes, so long as the great body of the people remained unrepresented within its walls. He would add, however, that whenever the expression of the public voice became strong enough to justify the course, he would use every means allowed by the forms of the House to obstruct the voting away of the public money in the present constitution of the House.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES—DUELLING.] The House in Committee of Supply.

Several sums were voted on account of the Army Estimates.

On the vote of 141,610*l.*, for defraying the expenses of the widows of officers,

the fact of a pension being refused to the widow of the late Colonel Fawcett, on the ground that her husband had fallen in a duel. He wished the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to explain the grounds of the decision to which the Government had come; and also whether, having taken the step he had alluded to in this case, it was his intention to introduce some more general measure for the discouragement of duelling, both in the army and elsewhere, in order to carry into effect what appeared to be the object in view in the refusal of this pension.

Sir H. Hardinge thought he saw in his place an hon. and gallant Officer who had a Motion on this subject fixed for this evening. He thought that gallant Officer informed him it was his intention to postpone his Motion until Monday. He thought it would be inconvenient to give an explanation on these two occasions, though, if the House wished, he was perfectly ready to go on with his statement. Was he to understand, then, that the gallant Officer consented to take the discussion now. [Captain Bernal: "No."] After that answer, he thought he should do best by confining his explanation to the statement that the grounds on which he refused the widow of the late Colonel Fawcett a pension, were such as, in his discretion, did not justify him in recommending her to the favour of Her Majesty. Upon that being stated to his right hon. Friend (Sir Robert Peel), the right hon. Gentleman confirmed the view of the case which he (Sir H. Hardinge) had taken. As the gallant Officer still intended to bring forward the Motion of which he had given notice, he thought the noble Lord would see it was better not to persist in discussing the subject now.

Viscount Howick said, it might be very well for the gallant Officer and the right hon. Baronet and gallant Gentlemen opposite to take this course, but he confessed he did not think the House ought to agree to this Vote without further expression of opinion on the point to which he had alluded. He knew perfectly well when a Motion was brought forward, on the question being put for the Speaker to leave the Chair, in order to go into Committee of Supply, they were always met with the objection that they were interfering with the progress of the public business, and most justly so. He for one, whether sitting on that or on the other side of the House, had invariably set his face against discussions on the question for reading the Order of the Day, unless on occasions of so pressing a nature as not to admit of delay. To bring Motions forward for redress in going into Committee of Supply, was, he thought, continuing the soundest and best Parliamentary practice. But that was a case quite different in its nature from the present. He believed, if they were not prepared to take the strong step of moving an address to the Crown on this subject, for which he confessed he at least was not prepared, the proper and Parliamentary opportunity of raising a discussion on it was that which was now offered to the House, on the Vote being proposed for a sum to grant pensions to widows of deceased officers. He had expressed to the gallant Officer behind him a strong opinion to this effect—he had no wish to take the discussion on himself—he should have much preferred, that the gallant Officer should have brought the matter forward, as he had given notice of it, but, seeing that notice of it had been given for to-night; having himself come down, as others had done, exclusively on this account, and no notice of postponement having been given, he had urged the gallant Officer strongly to bring it forward. As the gallant Officer had not done so, he should take the liberty of now offering the very few remarks he was anxious to make. With respect to the refusal of the pension, all he had to say was, that if Her Majesty's Government were seriously prepared to take up this most important question of duelling, if they were prepared to do all in their power to discourage and put down this, as he must call it, most unchristian and sinful practice, then he should acquiesce in the necessity, however painful that necessity might be, of refusing to the unfortunate widow of the late Colonel Fawcett the pension to which, under the circumstances, she would be entitled. But if Her Majesty's Government were not prepared to do this—if they meant to leave the subject in its present most unsatisfactory condition—if they meant to take no effectual means for putting down the practice of duelling, then he did say that the step they had taken with respect to Mrs. Fawcett was a step not only of great hardship and great cruelty, but of great injustice. He said, unless they made a great change in their practice, they had no right to do this. If he was not greatly misinformed, it had been the practice, up to the most recent period, to put on officers of the army the absolute necessity, under some circumstances, of fighting a duel. If he was not mistaken, not more than a year ago, an officer had been sentenced to suspension from his rank and pay, by the finding of a court-martial, for not having taken steps to obtain an immediate and legitimate redress for a gross outrage. Now, he knew perfectly well what the answer to this was. When the charge was offered in this shape, when an officer was accused of conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman for not taking steps to obtain redress for an outrage offered to him, the answer was, that the redress which he ought to have sought for was that which would have been obtained from the Horse Guards. But he said boldly, that this was a mere evasion. They all knew that the real redress an officer under such circumstances was expected to ask for was that which was now called demanding satisfaction from his adversary. He would go further, he would ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman, the Judge Advocate General, whether, even since that right hon. Gentleman had been in office, the sentence of a court-martial had not been submitted to him, in which the ordinary forms of evasion had been neglected, and in which the officer was, under this form, sentenced for having declined to fight a duel. His information might be incorrect, but undoubtedly he had heard it, and that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had found that the sentence in that shape was one which was decidedly illegal, and could not be allowed to pass. But the very fact that the charge might be submitted to the court-martial in that form—if he was correctly informed that such was the case—did prove that what was really expected from an officer under such circumstances, was not that he should appeal to the Horse Guards, but that he should take redress into his own hands. Now, he said, if this had been allowed to go on in the Army, if much more efficient means than had been hitherto adopted to put down this system of duelling were not taken, it would be the very height of injustice to refuse to the widow of an officer who had fallen in a duel, the pension to which she would otherwise have been entitled. Ministers told the House that there was difficulty in legislating on the subject, and he admitted that there was. But with respect to the Army, he maintained that Her Majesty's Government, without legislating, had it in their power, most completely and entirely, if they were inclined to exercise it, to put down the practice of duelling. What could be the difficulty of taking this course, to make it known in an authoritative manner to officers, that Her Majesty's Government would not permit this practice to go on, to call on all officers who might receive an insult, to submit their case to a superior authority, by means of a Court of Inquiry, if legal difficulties stood in the way of appealing to a court-martial? By means of a Court of Inquiry, the character of each case might be ascertained, and the prerogative of the Crown in the power of dismissing a guilty party, on the report of a Court of Inquiry, would give ample means of discovering persons guilty of an insult, which, in the ordinary course, would lead to a duel. If Her Majesty's Government were to take this course—to offer redress in this manner to those who were insulted; and, at the same time, to give notice that every party, principal or second, engaged in a duel, would instantly and summarily be dismissed from Her Majesty's service—no man could doubt that the practice of duelling would be very speedily put down. They might even go further. He thought the practice of duelling was so great an evil—so contrary to what every man in private felt to be right and consistent with a man's duty, that not only as regarded the military and naval services, but the community at large, Government ought to take some means to suppress the practice. That task he did not believe to be impossible. In his opinion, what was required was, simply to modify the severity of the existing law. He believed, that what now defeated the law, in nine cases out of ten, was, that its undue severity ran counter to the common feeling of justice in men's breasts. The offence of killing a man in a duel was, technically and legally, murder; but surely it was felt by all that, although a great crime, it was still one of a very different character, and deserving a different measure of punishment from that of deliberate and wilful murder. He thought that the offence ought to be taken out of that class, and that special provisions, with a moderate amount of punishment, ought to be appointed for cases of duel. Having thus modified the law, Government should take care that the law, so altered, was uniformly and impartially administered. Besides this, another step might be taken which would do much to prevent what was considered the necessity of duelling, and that was to afford parties receiving insults, and who are at present the parties who fight duels, some means of obtaining from the legal tribunals of the country a redress in proportion to the offence. He did not think there was any insuperable difficulty in forming some law which would enable persons aggrieved and insulted to obtain redress proportioned to the offence from one of the courts of law. There were two courses open to Her Majesty's Government with reference to this pension. Either they might allow things to remain as they now were; and if they did, if they shut their eyes to the practice of duelling, if they would do nothing but connive at its existence as hitherto, then he must say they ought to grant Mrs. Fawcett the pension of which she had been deprived. The other course was, that they should set themselves seriously to work to put down the practice altogether, and that they should not look in any case to see who were the parties concerned. No one could help remarking, that in a case which occurred very lately, a person in a very high and distinguished situation which made the offence in him infinitely more serious and aggravated than it could be in any military officer—in that most remarkable case in which he thought the high authorities in whose presence the offence was committed had grievously failed in their duty to the country and to the court in which they presided, Her Majesty's Government had passed over the offence as if it were one of a most venal and trivial description. He said there was no consistency in this conduct; one line or the other ought to be adopted. They ought to strive to put down duelling on principle, to act impartially and generally against all offenders, or if this they would not do, they ought not to be guilty of what he must consider the cruelty and injustice of refusing to the widow of one of the unfortunate victims of this most unhappy system a pension which very possibly her circumstances might render particularly necessary to her.

Captain Bernal said, perhaps it might be satisfactory to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman after what had fallen from the noble Lord the Member for Sunderland, to know that he did not acknowledge that he had fairly laid himself open to the lecture which the noble Lord had read him on constitutional law. He had consulted several Members of equal standing with the noble Lord in the House as to the course which it would be proper to take on this question. Nothing had fallen from the noble Lord which would stop him from bringing forward on the Order of the Day for going into Committee of Supply the Motion of which he had given notice.

Sir H. Hardinge certainly thought that the speech of the noble Lord was not characterized by the usual fairness which marked his conduct in that House. The present case was to come forward on Monday next, and yet with that knowledge the noble Lord had taken this opportunity of discussing the whole discipline of the Army relating to duelling on an occasion when he must know that the Mutiny Act, and other opportunities, would enable him to bring forward this subject more conveniently than at present. Seeing that this question was to come forward on Monday, and that the gallant Officer (Captain Bernal) took a different view of it from him (Sir H. Hardinge) he thought it would have been more fair if the noble Lord had consented to postpone his observations till that occasion. Having already given the noble Lord all the explanation which he thought necessary on the subject of the soldiers' pension, he must decline entering into any further statement at present. With respect to the other part of the noble Lord's speech, whether the officers of the Army were expected to find their way out of every dispute into which they might get by duelling, and that this was connived at, as the noble Lord said, by individuals at the head of the Army—he must confess he was surprised that the noble Lord should bring forward such erroneous notions, notwithstanding the high office which he had held for several years as Secretary at War—he must give this part of the noble Lord's speech the strongest contradiction in his power. He did not believe that the statement of the noble Lord was borne out by facts. He was confident the noble Lord could not produce any instance in which officers had been brought to a court-martial and cashiered for not having fought a duel in consequence of having had an insult offered to them. He must observe, that there appeared to be in the mind of the noble Lord, as well as of other individuals, a great misunderstanding on this question. By the Articles of War, an officer was liable to be cashiered for fighting a duel, and it was stated, "that whoever should give, send, convey, or promote a challenge, or should upbraid an officer for refusing a challenge, should, if convicted thereof, be cashiered." Another Article said, "If any officer shall behave in a scandalous and infamous manner, unbecoming the character of an officer and a gentleman, he shall also be liable to be cashiered." Another Article said, "We do hereby acquit officers of any disgrace or opinion of disadvantage, which may arise from their refusing to accept a challenge, as they will only have acted in obedience to our own orders, and done their duty as good soldiers, who subject themselves to discipline." Having shown to the House what the Articles of War prescribed on this subject, he asked the noble Lord how it was possible that twelve or thirteen officers, men of education, put upon their oaths to judge in a case, and with this book the Articles of War open before them, could punish a man for declining a challenge? Officers were told they were not to accept one—that there was no disgrace in refusing it—but, according to the noble Lord's version of the discipline of the Army, an officer would be tried for scandalous and infamous conduct, unbecoming an officer and a gentleman, and might be cashiered, if the fact were proved, for refusing to fight a duel. Why, it would be a violation of their oaths in the members of any court to come to such a conclusion; it would be a violation of all decency and common sense. The noble Lord had had great opportunities, having been five or six years at the War Office, of proving the truth of this view of the subject; and if there were any defect in the Articles, it was the noble Lord's duty, when he filled that office, to recommend to Her Majesty any alterations which he might consider necessary to render them better adapted to the service. Under these circumstances, when the noble Lord told the Government of the present day, that they had it in their power to put down duelling, and that it ought to be put down in the Army, he was induced to ask what the noble Lord had been about during the five years of which he had spoken? Why did not the noble Lord put it down during that period? Why did he not take those steps which he found fault with the Government of the present day for not taking, when he had the Articles of War before him? He could assure the noble Lord that the subject had not escaped the attention of the present Commander-in-Chief and the Government, and though it did not become him to enter at length into this subject, because certain alterations in the forms of procedure had not yet received the sanction of Her Majesty, he would say that the question was under the consideration of the Government. With respect to the noble Lord's observations that officers were cashiered for not fighting duels, he would refer to the case mentioned, he believed, the other day, by the hon. Member for Wycombe (Captain Bernal), namely, that the very last mail from the West Indies had brought the case of an officer who had been tried for having submitted to an insult, because he would not fight a duel, and the opinion was that he would be cashiered. Whether he was or not, he really could not answer, but he would read the charge brought against an officer as late as 1843, without mentioning names. It was—

"For scandalous and infamous conduct, highly unbecoming the character of an officer and a gentleman, in submitting to, be repeatedly charged with ungentlemanly and black-guard conduct without further replying to said charges and language used to him, or reporting it to his commanding officer, or taking any measures for exculpating himself from charges so derogatory to his character."

Now this officer was brought to trial for conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman, and he (Sir H. Hardinge) maintained that when this occurred this officer ought to have gone before his brother officers and his commanding officer, and said, "Try me, I am ready to exculpate myself and disprove the charge brought against me." But, according to the erroneous version of the noble Lord, it would follow that twelve or thirteen gentlemen, sitting in a court with the Articles of War before them, were to suppose that this individual ought to have fought a duel, and ought not to have exculpated his character from these defamatory charges. He (Sir H. Hardinge) would only say he had been forty years in the Army, and he had never known one case at all approaching to such a result as the noble Lord had stated. He knew what the circumstances of the case he had alluded to were. The individual had acted in so dishonourable a manner, that he did not dare to demand an inquiry to exculpate himself, and his brother officers, therefore, forced him before a court-martial under the clause he had read which enacted that an officer might be brought to trial for scandalous and infamous conduct, unbecoming an officer and gentleman, and if convicted might be cashiered. It was said that an individual thus tried was brought to a court-martial for not fighting a duel; he contended that it was because he did not dare to attempt to vindicate himself, and was afraid to have his conduct inquired into. Could it be supposed that twelve or thirteen gentlemen, with the book from which he had quoted open before them, would be so lost to all sense of their duty as men and Christians, and to all regard for their oaths as to convict a man for refusing a challenge? He said, no such thing was ever done. In the same year (1843)—he took the most recent cases, because the noble Lord said the system was still being acted upon at the present day, and that officers were driven to the unchristian and unreasonable act of fighting a duel, when they ought to have a court of inquiry—in April, 1843, an officer was tried for scandalous and infamous conduct, in having submitted to be stigmatised as a liar and a scoundrel, and other opprobrious epithets, by another individual, for which the court found him guilty, and, of course, the individual was cashiered. When he (Sir H. Hardinge) made inquiries, what did he find? That that individual had conducted himself in such a disgraceful manner, that he did not dare to face a court of inquiry composed of his brother officers, and they had, therefore, brought him to a court-martial to exclude him from the regiment. How these cases could be construed into the view the noble Lord had taken of them, he could not understand. He could understand, if an officer had insulted another, and by his slackness in resenting insult, had exposed himself to odium, he might be sent to Coventry by his brother officers, and under such circumstance he might find his position so extremely unpleasant that he would be obliged to leave the regiment. He knew an instance in which a field officer, having a high sense of religion, and being a man of very conscientious mind, declined to fight a duel, because he would not sin against the command of God. The officers of the regiment knowing the inconvenience to which they were exposed by having a member of the regiment liable to such imputations, felt highly aggrieved. What was the consequence? The present Commander-in-Chief protected that individual to the full extent which the good of the service required; he caused an inquiry to be made respecting the transaction which had been the cause of quarrel between these parties, and the blamelessness of that officer's conduct having been fully established, the objection against him was withdrawn by his brother officers, and the gentleman, acting on the noble Lord's principle, of refusing to fight when he could not reconcile it to his conscience, was now in the service, a highly respected field-officer. He believed this course had been pursued in almost every instance; wherever an opportunity of discouraging duelling had offered itself, it had been discouraged. He could show by an extract what was the opinion of Sir Charles Morgan, who was Judge Advocate General several years ago. When he suspected that the wording of a charge which was brought against an officer, might be construed into an accusation for not fighting a duel, he caused the officers to be written to. The case occurred in 1804: the party was charged with "associating and being in habits of intimacy, at different periods since the 13th December, with Assistant-surgeon such-a-one, notwithstanding that he had been colared and struck by the Assistant-surgeon on the evening of the day previous, and for thus behaving himself, &c." The officer was struck and took no notice of it; he was brought to a court-martial; and Sir C. Morgan, thinking it possible there might have been some intention to punish him for not fighting, wrote this note—"the investigation of the second charge against Lieutenant ——— having ended in an acquittal, it is necessary to observe, that had I been aware of this previous to the trial, I should not have referred the case to a court-martial, as it appears to me that in substance, though not in direct terms, this charge comes little short of imputing to him as a crime that he did not challenge or fight a duel with the Assistant-surgeon." The Lieutenant was acquitted. There was no such intention on the part of the Court towards this officer, but merely because there was that suspicion of such an imputation, the Judge Advocate had entered this opinion. He could only assure the noble Lord that, in every case which had come before him having made every possible inquiry, both at the Horse-Guards and from his right hon. Friend near him, the Judge Advocate General since the hon. Member for Wycombe gave notice of his motion, he could not find a single instance in which any officer of the army had been brought to a court-martial because he had been wanting in courage to fight a duel. On the contrary, the cases in which trials growing out of transactions of this kind had occurred, were cases in which the persons brought to trial had stooped to disgraceful conduct, and did not dare to vindicate himself. He must withhold from the noble Lord any further statement as to the pension to the widow of Col. Fawcett; but he trusted that he should be able to satisfy the House, when the matter was brought before it, that he had acted as his duty required. He was the person responsible for the step that had been taken and he hoped he should be able to show that the discretion he had exercised had been a proper one.

Colonel Fox said, he would grant, that officers were seldom brought to a court-martial for not fighting duels, but he would ask if instances were not well known in which the Sovereign had dispensed with the services of officers for the only reason being that they had been put into Coventry for not fighting a duel? That was the manner in which the case was disposed of, and all who were acquainted with the subject knew it well.

Sir H. Hardinge said, the gallant officer, whose conduct in that House was always very fair, had made a statement which quite astonished him, when he declared that the Sovereign of the country was a party indirectly to punishing officers who refused to fight a duel, by telling them that their services were dispensed with. He knew no instances of that description; he had known instances in which quarrels had taken place, in which duels had been fought, and where it was necessary for the harmony of the regiment that certain officers should be removed from it. But he would tell the noble Lord and the gallant officer that if they persisted in pushing the question to this extremity, if they wished to assume that restrictions and restraints were to be imposed on officers of the army to which other members of the community were not to be subject, no legislation of so unjust a character would satisfy the Army. Instead of extirpating the evil of which all complained, he was convinced the noble Lord would aggravate it. All you could do until the general voice of the community agreed with the noble Lord—and he (Sir Henry Hardinge), for his part fully adopted the noble Lord's views, that duelling ought to be put down—all you could do was to modify the evil. When you had done that, the country would go with you. He would say that he did not believe there was more duelling in the army than among other portions of the community. He would instance the noble corps of the Royal Artillery, at Woolwich, in which he believed for a period of twenty years, with sixty or seventy officers sitting down to dinner every day at the mess, not a single duel had occurred. Government were anxious to take every possible step to discourage and suppress the practice of duelling in the Army; and when such unhappy cases as those of Lieutenant Munro and Colonel Fawcett occurred, it was their duty to watch and see whether they could take any course to correct the propensity to have recourse to this mode of adjusting disputes. But as to the noble Lord's statement, he might say he had never heard from any hon. Member of that House remarks which contained a greater portion of exaggeration.

Sir A. L. Hay would not enter upon the subject of the pension. There were courts of honour attached to every regiment, to which appeals ought to be made in such cases. Was the stigma to be removed by the person going before a Court-martial, and shielding himself under that court? He denied the fact. The question was beset with difficulties. It was asserted that there were more duels in the army than in civil society. He did not think that such was the case. This was a question which ought not to be taken up lightly. It must not be forgotten that there were connected with this matter circumstances allied with the best interests of the State, upon which it was not so easy to legislate; and it was under these circumstances that he believed the Army might be placed on a different footing, and that duelling might be done away with.

Mr. Bernal wished to know whether the subject of duelling was now to be discussed, or whether it was to be postponed until Monday, when his hon. relative had given notice of his intention to submit a Motion to the House. A wide field had been to-night opened by the noble Lord the Member for Sunderland; but if this discussion was not to terminate to-night, it would be better that not one word more should be said about it. The question was one which not merely affected officers in the military service of the country, but it was one which affected the country at large. There were upon the Statute-book laws which pronounced the offence of duelling to be murder; but juries evaded the law, and Judges gave the go-by to it. The subject was much too large to be discussed upon one vote of the Army Estimates. The question of duelling ought, in his judgment, to form a substantive Motion, and ought not to be discussed, on the vote of an amount of money for Widows' Pensions. He hoped, therefore, any further discussion on the question would now be waved.

Dr. Nicholl said, that having been appealed to by the noble Lord the Member for Sunderland, he begged to state that in the case mentioned by the noble Lord he (Dr. Nicholl) had found fault with the finding of the Court-martial, because the offence charged was that of not reporting the matter to the Commanding-officer (which was a military offence), and on that ground he, as Judge Advocate, had recommended the proceedings to be revised.

Mr. P. Borthwick thought, that as at present advised, it was most unjustifiable to visit upon the widow of Colonel Fawcett the punishment of withholding her pension. That unfortunate lady was the last person in the world who ought to suffer for the faults of others.

Viscount Howick briefly replied. He could not but complain of the miserable spirit of personality in which the right hon. and gallant Officer the Secretary-at-War had indulged. The right hon. and gallant Officer had given no answer to the arguments he had submitted to the Committee on the present occasion. The right hon. and gallant Officer had turned to the Mutiny Act and asked him, why, if it was not sufficient to put down duelling, he had not altered it? If the right hon. and gallant Officer thought it right and becoming to raise that question, he (Lord Howick) would at once give his answer. During the time he had the honour to fill the office of Secretary-at-War he had never been called upon to consider the case of the widow of an officer who had fallen in a duel, but if the exercise of that painful discretion had devolved upon him, he would not have advised the suspension of the pension to the widow, unless he had been at the same time prepared to put down duelling in the Army. At present an officer had the alternative of being sent to Coventry or becoming involved in a duel; one course or other ought to be adopted by the Government.

Captain Bernal hoped the right hon. and gallant Officer the Secretary at War, would not be tempted to-night to enter upon the discussion of a question of such vast interest. He could not but think that the attack made by the noble Lord upon the right hon. and gallant Officer the Secretary at War was most unfair. He hoped the right hon. and gallant Officer would maintain a judicious silence. The question was one upon which four or five of the oldest and most experienced Members of the House were anxious to declare their sentiments, and as the subject would on Monday regularly come on for discussion, he thought the right hon. and gallant Officer was justified in giving no answer to the attack made upon him by the noble Lord the Member for Sunderland.

Sir H. Hardinge observed, that the noble Lord opposite had talked of miserable personalities. Now, he appealed to every hon. Member who heard him, whether the whole amount of his attack upon the noble Lord was not confined to this—that you, who were five years in office, did not rectify errors which you expect those who have been only two years and a quarter in power and authority to have corrected. The noble Lord had exhibited a degree of ill-temper which was not justified by the circumstances.

Lord J. Manners entertained a strong conviction, that any attempt to establish a Court of Honour must fail. He was sure that it would be in vain to look to legislation for a remedy for this evil, which could only be put an end to by popular feeling.

Vote agreed to, as were several other Votes.

SUPPLY—ORDNANCE ESTIMATES.] Captain Boldero, in bringing forward the Ordnance Estimates, wished to offer a few words in explanation of the Votes he should propose. The fourth Vote was for the salaries of Barrack-masters at home and abroad. It was a Vote which from its nature could not vary much from year to year, but there was a small diminution this year above the last of 1881. That would have been increased to 5711., but for the necessity of sending out a barrack establishment to China. The fifth Vote was for Ordnance works and repairs in the United Kingdom and Colonies, the building and repair of barracks, barrack-masters' expenditure and allowances, and other matters of the like nature, 624,6151. He admitted the expenditure was heavy under this head, but the great amount of the Vote arose from circumstances over which the Ordnance Department had no control. Last summer the West Indies had been visited by a severe earthquake, which had fallen particularly heavy on the island of Antigua, where buildings of every kind had been overthrown, and, among the rest, the Ordnance buildings. Similar circumstances had occurred in the island of Zante, where the military hospital had been destroyed. Then at the Cape of Good Hope a battery, standing on the sea shore, of very great importance, as it commanded Cape Town, had had one flank injured by the sea. Another unfortunate occurrence was the fire at Norwich barracks, one wing of which had been totally destroyed. This was the effect of mere accident; some children had been playing with lucifer matches, and, though it was in the middle of the day, a great part of the building was burnt down before the fire could be put a stop to. During last year, also, the Ordnance powder establishment at Waltham was much injured by an explosion, in consequence of which not only much property was destroyed, but, he regretted to say, seven lives were lost. The expense of adapting three or four houses to the purposes of the establishment had been estimated, and the necessary expenditure, he had ascertained by a visit, would, in all probability, be 8,000*l.* or 10,000*l.* At Chatham, the Medway had undermined a gun-wharf, which would render necessary an outlay of 6,000*l.* or 7,000*l.* Another of the extraordinary circumstances which rendered this vote necessary was the fire at the Tower, which consumed 60,000 square feet of flooring in the armoury there. Then all the military stores in Tooley-street had been removed a few years ago to the Tower, but in consequence of the fire additional storeroom became requisite—the stores could not be classified—they could not be properly preserved—they could not classify—a remedy for the evil was indispensable. It was proposed to pull down the Tower barracks which were in a dilapidated state, and to convert other parts of them into storehouses. On the highest ground within the Tower it was intended to construct barracks with the entire approbation of the Duke of Wellington. There was only one work more of any importance that was proposed for the ensuing year—viz., the construction of barracks in the Isle of France. They paid annually 5,000*l.* to keep those barracks in order. It was intended to convert 4,000*l.* of that sum to this purpose this year, which would reduce the expense of the building to 10,000*l.*

The sixth Vote was for Military and Civil Contingencies, and in it was a large reduction of 64,000*l.* on last year's estimate, although an amount of 34,639*l.* had been transferred to the Ordnance by Treasury Minutes in the latter end of last year, which had formerly belonged to the Commissariat Department. On the tenth Vote, for Commissariat Supplies, on which there had been a great reduction, he would say with respect to the case of married officers, who lived out of barracks of their own free will, and not because there was not accommodation for them in the barracks—with regard to whom it had been made a matter of complaint, that they did not receive the same allowances of fuel and light, as those officers did who were obliged to live out of barracks when there was not room for them—that a decision (he was happy to state) had been arrived at which would afford another proof that the Duke of Wellington and the Master General of the Ordnance took an interest in all that was connected with the comfort of the officers in the service. In future no stores of any kind would be delivered without the barracks. It was intended to substitute a commuted allowance, and that all officers, whether their residence without the barracks was forced or voluntary, being married, should be put on the same footing. He would only add, that the reduction in the expense of the Ordnance Department since the present Government had come in was no less than 303,483*l.*

On the first Vote, that 127,043*l.* be granted to Her Majesty to defray the charge for Salaries to the Office of Ordnance, Dr. Bowring regretted that one general rule was not observed in drawing up the Public Estimates. He thought the Colonies ought to pay the expense of their own defence. The Ionian Islands were the only colonies which contributed from their public revenue for this object. He believed that if they put into the hands of the colonists a little more self-government they would be disposed to pay more of their own expenses.

Sir H. Douglas said, he appealed for relief from this contribution in favour of an interesting and peculiar people, thrown back at this time of day, by the remarkable vicissitudes in their history, for regeneration, in their social, moral, and political condition, and to whom we had solemnly pledged a peculiar and paternal solicitude. Placed on the confines of civilisation, these interesting

Islands presented a wide and noble field for improvement, when they came under the dominion of a Christian power. But it would ever be considered a stain in the history of Venice, and he must say in that of other Christian States, that whilst the Ionian Islands were used for maritime and military, and even for spiritual purposes, as the bulwarks of Christianity against the Infidels, no monument should have been raised, to commemorate the possession which the Venetian Government so long held, of those Islands, by any act which could show that, with real Christian spirit, they attended paternally to the moral and physical well-being of the people, and the general amelioration of those most interesting Islands. This was a duty which had devolved upon this great country. The glory and honour of our beloved Sovereign, the credit of the Government, the character of the country were at stake. We had under our protecting wing an interesting, a peculiar people, inhabiting a fair and classical region. All the sympathies and associations—classical, historical, ancient and modern, which we imbibed in our youth, and should carry with us to our graves—taught us to regard with deep interest, that peculiar people, whose destinies we hold in trust for good or for evil—for our glory, or to our shame. He should startle the House, shock the country, and wound the character of any British Government, were he to tell of the sacrifices and privations which were endured to enable the Ionian Government to liquidate the fixed tribute which they were bound to pay, and the manner and extent to which the exaction of this bond, retarded amelioration in the general condition of the Ionian Islands. [Lord Stanley here said, "It is done."] Done! when done? why was he not told of it? He appealed to the Committee whether he (Sir H. Douglas) having represented the case of the Ionian Islands, as now briefly stated, in 1838 to Lord Glenelg, in 1838 to Lord Normanby, and in 1839, 1840, and 1841, to Lord J. Russell, and in 1842 to his noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies, Lord Stanley—having, too, on his request, not called for the production of Papers which, by an order of the last session, were forthcoming, he (Sir H. Douglas) appealed to the Committee, whether the noble Lord had treated him either as a supporter of Her Majesty's Government, or as a friend of the noble Lord's, as he ought to have done; and therefore, he (Sir H. Douglas) would go through the case he had in hand, without

now heeding what the noble Lord had said. No one who was thoroughly acquainted with the Ionian Islands could, for a moment, doubt that the peculiar circumstances, and anomalous condition of those Islands, and the wants and necessities of the Ionian people, had not been considered as they ought to have been. Those Islands are not, as the hon. and learned Member for Bolton has inadvertently said, colonies. They are placed in a middle state, between the colonial and perfectly free independent state, without having, in some important respects, the advantages of either. Their productions are treated as foreign productions, although their ships are admitted to all the privileges of British vessels. An enormous duty, no less than 19½ per cent. is imposed on the export of those productions, to enable the Ionian Government to meet its obligations. That source of revenue has failed, by the diminution in price from about 74 dollars to about 18 per 1000 lbs., whilst the duty levied on the import of those productions into the United Kingdom, is upwards of 130 per cent on their prime cost. The progress of improvement of every description in the Ionian Islands is vastly retarded, and in some cases thrown back, by the exaction of this bond. The appropriations for public instruction are diminished; the public roads are falling into dilapidation and decay. There is no prison in Corfu; for want of that most essential institution, an old fort is used as a receptacle for offenders, convicts, and criminals of every age and description, without the possibility of classification or discipline. Lunatics were the inmates of prisons, associated with criminals and felons, for want of a lunatic asylum, until he (Sir H. Douglas) converted another old fort into a receptacle for those unhappy beings; and nothing has yet been done, from want of means, to provide a suitable building and establishment, in lieu of those temporary expedients. Every practicable exertion had been made by the Ionian Government to reduce the expenditure, and to increase the revenue, to enable the Ionian States to pay this enormous fixed tribute, and the other charges for British protection. He objected to this, not only in amount, but in principle. It was the worst of all principles to make the governed the debtors of the government. He (Sir H. Douglas) must advert to another sad part of this case. To give effect to an act passed in the time of his predecessor, Lord Nugent, he (Sir H. Douglas) had instituted a poor-house and house-of-industry at Corfu, for the reception of mendicants, so numerous in the Islands, and other destitute persons. That establishment had been abolished, since his (Sir H. Douglas's) departure, although it contained three paupers upwards of ninety years of age, six upwards of eighty, and many other destitute persons, far advanced in life. He (Sir H. Douglas) did not mean to assert, that the noble Lord had expressly ordered this to be done; but he did mean to say, that the instructions to pay up the contribution—to insist upon our bond, were so stringent, as to render this, and other sacrifices necessary. On these grounds, he (Sir H. Douglas) would appeal to the Committee, to the Government, and to the country, for some abatement and mitigation of these rates and terms. He advised and implored Her Majesty's Government to extend relief to the Ionian Islands before it became too late. The present, certainly, were not times of danger, but times of danger might come; and it was, therefore, to be hoped that Ministers would adopt the course he recommended, as likely to prove most creditable to themselves, beneficial to the Ionian Islands, and which would ensure to this country, the everlasting gratitude of the Ionian people.

Mr. W. Williams observed, that the Estimates of the present year were less by a sum of 9,000*l.* than those of last year, and that, at least, might be said to form a just ground of congratulation, even small as the amount of the saving was; for 9,000*l.* certainly was but a small sum compared with 1,800,000*l.* He regretted to see that more new barracks were to be built. Thus there was a sum of 117,000*l.* for new barracks at Manchester, and 26,000*l.* for new barracks at Newport, and there were to be new buildings at Liverpool, for the expense of which no sum was mentioned, but of course the buildings would cost something.

Captain Boldero said, it had been thought desirable to enlarge certain docks at Liverpool, and that the use of a battery belonging to the Government was found necessary for that purpose. The parties interested in the docks proposed to take the battery from the Government, and build another in lieu of it, and thus the public would not be put to any expense.

Captain Pechell said, that as they were upon the subject of barracks, he should mention an outrage which had been committed by certain of the soldiers who were quartered at barracks in the town which he had the honour to represent. He should not say anything about the decision of the Court of Law to which the subject had been submitted, beyond observing, that the parties had been subjected to severe punishment. It would be in the recollection of the House, that when a statement was first made on the matter, it was intimated that the suffering parties would be recompensed by the comrades of the persons who had inflicted this grievous injury upon them. He understood that 50*l.* or 60*l.* would hardly repair the damage which had been done. The poor man who had been attacked had had his goods destroyed—his lodgers would no longer remain with him, and the injuries which he had received disabled him from the performance of his usual duties. It was said that recompense would be made, and that statement no doubt had its weight with the chairman of the Quarter Sessions when sentence was passed upon the parties accused. They had been sentenced to ten months' imprisonment and hard labour—that was a severe sentence, but the crime which they had committed was a great crime, and the parties injured were now severe sufferers. He hoped, that under these circumstances, something would be done for them.

Sir H. Hardinge said, that several of the soldiers of the regiment in question had considered the conduct of their comrades in this case highly reprehensible, and had intended to raise a subscription with the view of compensating the injured parties. The attorney who had been employed by those parties had sought for and obtained a remedy by means of the Criminal Law. He pursued that sort of remedy to the utmost extent of the law; and now there was reason to believe, that three of the parties tried, found guilty, and sentenced, had nothing whatever to do with the riot. The House must see that no one could force the regiment to carry out their original intention of setting on foot a subscription.

Mr. Aglionby was sorry to hear the right hon. and gallant Member say, that three of the parties were innocent. It was a statement calculated to do much injury. He hoped that neither that nor the conduct of the attorney would have the effect of preventing the soldiers doing what they in the first instance had intended.

Sir H. Hardinge replied, that the attorney had conducted himself towards the commanding officer in a very offensive manner, and that his conduct was most improper; but he never meant to say that those circumstances would at all influence the conduct of the regiment towards the parties injured.

Mr. Aglionby would thus appeal to the regiment from his place in Parliament on behalf of men who were foreigners, who knew nothing of the laws of this country, and who placed their case in the hands of an attorney, who took proceedings under the Criminal Law. It was his opinion, that the officers, for the sake of the character of the regiment, ought to join in the subscription, and fully compensate the suffering parties.

Vote agreed to, as were several other Votes.

House resumed.

House adjourned at twenty minutes past eleven o'clock.

PETITIONS PRESENTED. By the Earl of Radnor, from Inhabitants of the County of Somerset, in favour of Free Trade.—By the Duke of Buccleugh, from Noblemen and others of the County of Elgin and Forres, and by the Duke of Richmond, from Guildford, Edinburgh, Selkirk, and Roxburghshire, for Agricultural Protection.—By Lord Brougham, from Rev. W. H. Turner, for Exemption from the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill.—By Lord Camoys, from Wigan, complaining of Jury on the State Trials.—From Evenham, against Union of Sees of St. Asaph and Bangor, and in favour of Bishopric at Manchester.

FREE TRADE—CORN LAW AGITATION.] The Earl of Radnor rose to present a petition from the county of Somerset, praying for the removal of all duties on the necessaries of life, and that the whole system of the taxation of the country should be placed on a more equable and equitable basis. He had given notice of his intention to present this petition, because he wished to have an opportunity of stating certain circumstances connected with it which he thought were worthy of observation. The petition was agreed to at a meeting presided over by the High Sheriff, and which had been called for by a requisition very numerous signed by freeholders. The meeting, was called for a very different object than that which was the result of it. It was called for the purpose of passing resolutions in favour of what was called protection. That was the avowed object of the meeting. A motion was made in support of legislative protection, considerable discussion took place upon it, and an amendment, embodying Free Trade principles, was submitted. This was put to the meeting, and, as decided by the High Sheriff, it was lost; the original resolution in favour of protection being declared by him to be carried. [Lord Brougham : "The High Sheriff had no doubt of it."] On this, parties became dissatisfied, and much altercation ensued. The Sheriff was requested to put the resolution a second time, but he refused to do so. But in consequence of this, when a petition to Parliament, embodying the resolution was brought forward, a petition, embodying Free Trade principles, was also brought forward by way of amendment. This amended petition was carried by a very large majority, and a vote of thanks passed to the Anti-Corn-Law League, and other resolutions, in a similar sense, passed with successively increasing majorities. These were the circumstances, as represented to him. In general, it happened unfortunately that the protectionist party objected to discussion. Their meetings were select and exclusive. This he could speak to from personal experience; for only the other day he went to a meeting called (as the notice said) to discuss this question; but when he got there he received an intimation that it was of a private character, and he consequently withdrew at once. The Anti-Corn-Law League had been accused of sending their emissaries through the country for the purpose of creating discord disunion, and incendiarism. Now, he denied distinctly and emphatically that the Anti-Corn-Law League was at all capable of any such act as that of forming any society that would have such a tendency and he defied any one to show that they had ever, by word or deed, merited such an accusation. [The Duke of Richmond : "They denounced the landlords."] At the protection meetings very gross abuse had been uttered against the members of the Anti-Corn-Law League, but they need not mind that, for hard words broke no bones, and he did not know that much harm was done except to those who used them; but he thought the attention of the Government ought to be directed to the language used by some Gentlemen which went beyond the limits of ordinary abuse. Mr. Newdigate, a Member of the House of Commons, had made statements at a meeting in Warwickshire, and had repeated them at a meeting in Uxbridge, to which he thought it necessary to direct such notice. He said,

"I take this opportunity of repeating what I said in the House of Commons, that, by the conduct of the Anti Corn Law League, that body is extensively implicated in the disturbances which have taken place in the northern part of the county. I said that as a magistrate, and from the knowledge which I obtained as such, and every one who knows me must be aware that I should not have stated it unless I knew it. The Anti Corn Law League is mixed up with the most seditious characters, and their object is to create confusion and discord throughout the land."

That was what was said by the Member for North Warwickshire. Either this was literally and truly a fact, or it was an exaggeration. If it was an exaggeration, it was in his opinion most unjustifiable to be thus holding up people to blame in this sort of way; but if it was a fact, then he should like to know whether this Gentleman had communicated it to the Government, because it would not be measuring out equal justice to punish the poor artizan and operative, and to let the rich go scot free if they were guilty. He knew not whether the object was, as had been hinted, to let them go on, as in Ireland, that they might be tried for conspiracy. If that were the policy he did not much admire it. At a late meeting at Uxbridge, Mr. Newdigate repeated the language he had quoted.

The Duke of Richmond: He had used it in the House of Commons, in the presence of the Government and the leaders of the Anti-Corn-Law League, who might have denied it if it was not true.

The Earl of Radnor said he did not know whether it had been stated in the presence of the Government, but if it had been in the presence of the leaders of the League, he was confident they would have been able to contradict it. Accusations of a similar kind had been made by a noble Lord, a Member of that House (the Earl of Harewood) at a meeting in Yorkshire. He had informed that noble Lord of his intention to bring this subject forward, and had his acknowledgment of the receipt of his letter; so that if the noble Lord was not now present he (Lord Radnor) was not to be blamed for his absence. The noble Lord accused the Anti-Corn-Law League of incendiarism. He said,

"There are other views in the Anti-Corn-Law Agitation than meet the public eye. What happened the other day to a farmer in Lincolnshire or Norfolk, I forget which. He attended a meeting and openly stated his opinions against the Anti-Corn-Law League, which every man has a right to do, when his stacks and his crops were burnt that night. No man in his senses can doubt the intention of the Anti-Corn-Law League."

Thus, although he did not state it in direct terms, the noble Lord raised an inference that the Anti-Corn-Law League had instigated an act of incendiarism. Was it right that such serious accusations as these should be lightly made? A clergyman, at a meeting at Stamford, and another at Northampton, made similar accusations. Now, he repeated, that although there might be foolish persons on both sides, the leaders of the Anti-Corn-Law League were as incapable as the noble Lord and the Gentleman to whom he had referred of inciting to the commission of crime, and he ventured to say that all the arguments used by the protection Gentlemen were much more likely to excite the burning of stacks than any used by the Anti-Corn-Law League. That body endeavoured to make corn plentiful and cheap, but the protectionists told the people that they would be better for corn being dear, and the labourers were thus encouraged to diminish the quantity of corn in order to produce that dearness which they were told was beneficial to them. They had quite acuteness enough and sufficient knowledge of political economy to know, that to make corn scarce was to make it dear; and this is what they were told was good for them. He thought it was lamentable that it should be propounded at pro-Corn-Law meetings that Free Trade was a delusion, and that a noble Duke opposite, a Member of the Government should have become a member or a subscriber to that association. [The Duke of Buccleuch: You are quite mistaken.] He was glad to hear that. It had been stated that the noble Duke had subscribed 100*l.* to one of those institutions: and he was now glad to hear that it was not true. However, it was lamentable that persons of high rank should go about the country stating that Free Trade was a delusion, and persuading unfortunate artizans, such as those from whom a memorial would be presented on a future occasion, that their sufferings arose from Free Trade. It appeared to him that the Government ought to pronounce distinctly its opinion on Free Trade, and to follow out its own principles truly and honestly. The noble Lord concluded by presenting the petition. Lord Portman begged leave, as connected with the county of Somerset, to make a few remarks on this petition. He thought there would be no difference between his noble Friend and himself as to the fact that the petition was carried by a majority of the persons present at the time when the question was put, nor would there be any dispute between them as to the resolution directly contradictory having been carried subsequently, and that the petition was then agreed to which had now been presented by the noble Earl. He was quite sure the noble Earl's brother, the High Sheriff, had exercised his judgment in the purest manner, and was convinced that in each case he was right in his decision, and he had not since stated that he was shaken in his decision as to the first resolution. But the noble Earl asked how, then, was it that the first petition was carried by a large majority, and that the subsequent petition had also been carried? The fact was, the party of the Anti-Corn-Law League were better organized than the opposite party. The farmers had conceived they had done all that was required of them by holding up their hands for the original Motion, and they found it by no means convenient to stand the hustling and jostling—he wished to use no stronger terms—which it was found desirable to practise in order to get those in front of the High Sheriff who had not been there before, and many retired, conceiving, as they had every reason to do, that there would be no further proceedings taken. The petition might certainly be received as the petition of the High Sheriff presiding at a meeting of 3,000 persons out of a population of half a million; and such a petition, coming from a great county like Somerset, could only be considered as the petition of the majority of those present at the time, but by no means as conveying the sense of that great county, containing, as it did nearly half a million of inhabitants, and 80,000 houses, and more than a million of acres of land. It was clear that the opinions expressed in the petition were not the opinions of the farmers, because they had formed themselves into societies in various parts of the counties, and were about to express their opinions, as the inhabitants of the towns did, in their own way. It was true the meeting was an open meeting, that it was open to the whole world, and that the whole country might have been there if they had chosen; but he dared say that the same reason had kept others away as had deterred him from attending it, namely, that they were not satisfied that the landed interest was in the hands of those who were most likely to protect it; or, on the other hand, that the cause of free-trade was intrusted to those who were best calculated to promote its success. He (Lord Portman) still adhered to a fixed duty, and therefore, he had all along abstained from taking part in the proceedings of either the Anti-Corn-League or the Anti-League Associations. For, on the one hand, he thought it dangerous to carry, by a legislative enactment, the total, immediate, and unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws; and, on the other hand, he thought it equally dangerous to affirm that the present sliding scale should not be interfered with, because it was at one end a system of prohibition. Under these circumstances, he was a sort of amphibious animal, between the two parties, and could take part with neither, and perhaps would not be respected by either. He hoped, however yet to see the day when both would be disposed to meet upon his view of the question.

Lord Brougham begged to say a few words in explanation of the grounds upon which he had said, that the noble Earl's brother, the High Sheriff of Somersetshire, had no doubt that the first resolution had been carried. He (Lord Brougham) had been waited upon last Friday by a respectable farmer of that county, bringing him a letter from an hon. Baronet who had taken part in the proceedings of the meeting, and who was very anxious that he should state what had actually taken place, because very inaccurate accounts had gone forth. It was very well known that he (Lord Brougham) was against the Corn Law, and that if he had been at the meeting in question he should have voted against protection; but there was a wish that he should state what had passed, and a paper was put in his hand which was stated to be an accurate account of what had taken place. Here, then, was the accurate version of the whole proceedings:—"The High Sheriff in the first instance decided in favour of the League, and against those who had called the meeting; on the question, whether the Amendment should be put first, he most properly decided in favour of the Amendment being first put. He then called for a show of hands, upon which he declared the original resolution carried. This decision was objected to by some, saying that the resolution was not carried, whereupon the hon. Mr. Bouverie, the High Sheriff, said, he had endeavoured to act justly and impartially" (and those who knew him so long and so intimately as he (Lord Brougham) had done, knew that no man was more likely to act justly and impartially); "he had carried his eye over the whole of the assemblage, and observed that double hands were held up for the Amendment; he had decided to the best of his judgment, and he would not alter his decision." Nor would any reasonable man doubt that the High Sheriff had no hesitation in his mind as to the show of hands having been in favour of the original resolution, because if he had entertained any doubt he would have called for a second division to clear up the point. Now a number of the people went away, and then this petition was carried by a majority of those who remained. This was a mode of proceeding, he believed, peculiar to the county of Somerset, and certainly it would be a very inconvenient practice to adopt in Parliament, because the result would be, that his noble Friend behind him would move an Address to the Crown, and then his noble Friend on the cross Bench would move a resolution negating that proposition, and then his noble Friend on the Wool-sack would declare the original Motion to be carried, and then his noble Friends behind him would leave the House and go to their dinner, and other noble Lords would have the matter in their own hands, and would carry their Amendment; so that both the opposite Motions would alike be carried. But this was what had been done in Somersetshire. At one and the same meeting, held on one and the same day—indeed, immediately after the former Resolution—another resolution was adopted directly contradictory of it. If this was the result of conviction, its operation must have been very rapid. The force of truth was very great; indeed, it was said, that it always would prevail; but if it had prevailed in this case, it must have acted with greater rapidity than he should have expected. No speeches were made to induce the assembly to alter their opinions; but, notwithstanding, there was a greater majority in favour of the Amendment than that which had carried the original resolution. Whether this was owing to conviction or absenteeism he did not undertake to say. He was sure nothing could be more untrue than what was said by an old Sergeant-at-law upon the Western Circuit—"that the further he went to the west the more he was convinced the more that the wise men came from the east." His noble Friend near him (Lord Portman), if he had been at the meeting, could have told the House whether the meeting was a respectable one or not. He (Lord Brougham) knew nothing about it, but he differed from his noble Friend as to the value he set upon the number of persons attending a meeting. He had been at meetings in Yorkshire and Cumberland, and other counties, at which he could rely upon 3,000 or 4,000 persons, out of a population of 200,000 or 300,000, representing the opinions of the inhabitants more correctly than if an unwieldy number were present. 3,000 or 4,000 people could discuss a question; but an assemblage of 30,000 or 40,000 was incapable of discussion. His noble Friend said, that he should receive the esteem of no one because he held amphibious opinions. From that remark, he (Lord Brougham) must be excepted. He thought his noble Friend had acted very wisely in not going to the meeting, if he thought it would not be well ordered. His noble Friend had said, that very reprehensible abuse had been uttered against the Anti-Corn-Law League, and had given samples of it, which certainly were deserving of severe reprehension. He could not help feeling—he would not say disgust—but concern, when he found persons using language charging any portion of their fellow-subjects with exciting others to capital crimes, such as incendiarism, and representing the advocacy of that great question of Free Trade, (which was now advancing more rapidly the more it was considered) as calculated to produce every species of misery in the country. He very much regretted these exaggerations, but unfortunately they were not confined to one side. When people were in controversy, they would indulge in such violence. He would refer to language used not by a farmer, not by a tradesman or an artisan, but by a lecturer—one who had gone about lecturing in favour of the League, and who asked his auditory how they could expect anything from the "Iron Duke" (meaning his noble Friend opposite—the Duke of Wellington), who had gone on butchering men, women, and children for two or three days together at the siege of Salamanca. Now, it would be seen that no such thing could by any possibility have taken place, seeing that there had been no such thing as a siege of Salamanca, even if the politic as well as humane nature of his noble Friend could have sanctioned such a thing. He differed from the opinions of those who suffered a continuance of the Corn Laws; but God forbid that, because he did, he was to look upon the landowners who supported them as murderers; yet he constantly saw murder charged against them; nor did he think they were guilty of blasphemy, although that also had been charged against them. It had been said that they were guilty of blasphemy every time they uttered that petition of the Lord's Prayer, "Give us this day our daily bread;" and, indeed, a charge of that nature had been made in the House of Commons, for it was not by any means confined to the vulgar. There had been gross exaggeration and misstatement at both sides; and whilst he regretted it, he should say he particularly regretted that they should have been found on the right side, for he should much rather have seen them brought to the assistance of the wrong side of the question. He was opposed to the use of such detestable exaggerations, and he believed that nothing could be more ruinous to any cause than to have it supported by such means.

The Earl of Radnor explained. He did not say, that the High Sheriff had no doubt about the Motion at the meeting to which he alluded.

The Duke of Wellington said, that, in consequence of what had fallen from the noble Earl and his noble and learned Friend, he felt it necessary to address a few observations to their Lordships. A number of respectable gentlemen in Somersetshire, a county with which he had some relations, had written to him a statement which corroborated the account that had been given with respect to what had taken place at the conclusion of the meeting. At the meeting, the Resolution, as originally proposed, was declared to have been carried, and at a subsequent period an amendment and a petition were also moved, both having been carried by a considerable majority on a division. The gentleman who had communicated with him (the Duke of Wellington), stated in the strongest manner that the majority which carried that amendment and petition were composed not of the same persons who had composed the meeting in the first instance, but of persons who were brought in subsequently—persons who did not belong to the class who ought to have decided such a question. The letter to which he alluded was signed by gentlemen of the highest respectability, and one of them was recently one of the Members for the county, and he thought it his duty to make that statement to their Lordships. With respect to the question which had been put by the noble Earl in reference to a speech made by an hon. Member of the House of Commons in Warwickshire, he could assure him that he had never heard of it till that moment. If the noble Earl had been kind enough to announce his intention of putting a question on that or any other subject, he would have been prepared to have given him all the information in his power. With respect to the abuse which had been directed at these meetings towards those who belonged to the Anti-Corn Law League, and by these towards their opponents, which language his noble and learned Friend had deservedly reprobated, he would remind the noble Earl opposite that they were all subject to such abuse—they had all been abused, it was their fate, they could not avoid it, and they must bear it as well as they could. He could only recommend the noble Earl to bear that abuse with the same tranquillity which those who sat opposite him (the Earl of Radnor) had displayed, in bearing what had been said of them. He had not changed the opinions which he entertained on the question which was the subject of the petition brought under consideration that night. He voted for the existing Corn Law, and he earnestly recommended to their Lordships to leave that Corn Law as it was, and to continue to maintain the system which it was the object of the Corn Law to carry into effect.

The Duke of Richmond said, the Anti-Corn-Law League had, for the last two or three years, been going about the country abusing everybody who did not agree with them in opinion; and although he would not impute motives to those who composed that League, who were not here to defend themselves, yet he had a right to remark on the effects which their proceedings had led to; and he had a right to remark, when they stated things which had since proved not to be true; they declared over and over again that the farmers were in favour of free-trade, and that they looked upon the question of free-trade in corn not to be a tenant's question, but a question which only affected the landlords. The tenant farmers were independent men, and they were not disposed to lie passive under the charges which were made against them by the Anti-Corn-Law League, and accordingly they aroused themselves, as they had an undoubted right to do, they called meetings in every part of the country for their own protection, and to petition Parliament: they formed societies for their own protection; societies not got up for the purpose of offending against the law, but solely for their own defence; the noble Earl complained that a Member of Parliament had attended one of those meetings and made a speech, to which the noble Earl objected. How liberal his noble Friend was in that respect! Would he seek to prevent a Member of Parliament from expressing his opinions on a public question in the House of Commons, and from repeating those opinions afterwards to his constituents or others at a public meeting? If that hon. Gentleman made the statement the noble Earl had alluded to, he had no doubt he believed it to be true; for he knew him to be a most honourable man. Let it not be supposed by any of those who advocated free-trade, that the farmers of England would allow themselves longer to be treated as they had been. They had aroused themselves—and rightly aroused themselves—to the necessity of uniting in their own defence. He would not say that the object of the Anti-Corn-Law League was to excite the people to those acts which had been described; but he would say that the members of that body made speeches of an inflammatory nature and tendency—he should not have joined the Society for the Protection of Agriculture, if it had not been for the Anti-Corn-Law League. He would not impute motives to the members of the Anti-Corn-Law League; but if any one looked to their language from beginning to end, he would find that it had been violent, improper, and vulgar to the last degree. His noble Friend (the Earl of Radnor), in describing the proceedings of the Society for the Protection of Agriculture, stated that it was said at those meetings that free-trade was a delusion. Now, would his noble Friend say, that any Members of a society were not at liberty to express their opinions upon public questions, and if they thought free-trade a delusion, that they had not a perfect right to say so?

His noble Friend might believe, that in the views which they took of the subject they were in error, but if they thought that the opposite opinions were fallacious, had they not a perfect right to expose the fallacy of the views which the Anti-Corn Law League were spreading by all the means in their power? He was delighted at the observations which his noble Friend made on the subject of the Societies for the Protection of Agriculture, for the opposition of the Anti-Corn Law League to such societies showed that they were doing good already, and that they would be productive of great advantage. That was important; and he would recommend the farmers of this country to remember it, for they would not have had the discussion of that night if it were not for the Protection Societies. He would recommend them to persevere in the course which they had commenced, and not to allow wild theories of free-trade to carry them away, whether they were advanced by Peers, by Members of Parliament, or by members of the Anti-Corn Law League. He hoped they would continue in the course they had adopted, and that they would not allow themselves to be prevented from boldly stating their opinions on all political or public matters. He believed, if they inquired about the petition, it would not be found to be the petition of the owners and occupiers of land in the county of Somerset. He believed that the landowners and the occupiers of land would be anxious to be relieved from the disgrace which would attach to them if it were generally believed that such a petition emanated from so respectable a body of men. He would ask his noble Friend, had not the emissaries of the Anti-Corn Law League organised their opposition to the meeting, had it not been well organised, did not the emissaries of that League go to Bridgwater before the day of the meeting, and make preparations for their proceedings; did they not hire vans to bring persons to the meeting, and pay men to go there and make a "row," in order to prevent the farmers from expressing their opinions? But they were not to be so beaten, and they stayed so long as they thought necessary to carry their own resolution, and then the Anti-Corn-Law League men, thinking it necessary to show that the money which had been expended, and the music that had been prepared, had not been thrown away, brought their hired bands up to carry their own opinions, and adopt this petition. They were right in giving their opinions; he did not object to the expression of them, but he thought that opinions were of more importance when they were not bought, always excepting opinions procured from members of the learned profession of the law.

Lord Beaumont said, that the impression on his mind and upon, he believed the minds of those at the meeting was, that in the speech which alluded to the effect of the proceedings of the Anti-Corn-Law League there was no intention of accusing the Anti-Corn-Law League of a design to cause incendiary fires. What he understood from that speech of the noble Lord was, that although the motives of the Anti-Corn-Law League might be good, yet the exciting speeches addressed to the labourers were calculated to produce the effect of making persons of that class believe that the farmers were their enemies, and possibly might in some instances, produce other effects; but he felt convinced that there was no intention of charging the Anti-Corn-law League with a desire to cause incendiary fires. With respect to the assertion that there was no such thing as a free meeting in favour of agricultural protection, he would ask, had not the meetings at York and Thirsk been free meetings? He (Lord Beaumont) re-echoed the condemnation of the harsh language that had been used in the discussion of the question of the Corn Laws. He wished that both sides would avoid the use of such language, and discuss the question with coolness, as one of great political importance, and one which ought to be decided by argument alone, and could not be advanced by virulence or by personal attacks. If he heard correctly the words of the petition which had been presented to their Lordships, it stated that the petitioners were desirous for the removal of all protection to English industry. It pleased him to hear that statement, for it showed clearly the views which they entertained, so that now all interests in the country could see the objects of the free traders, and thus the watchmakers, the shoemakers, and all our artisans, would be attacked by being exposed to the competition of foreign artisans. If the Anti-Corn-Law League were enabled to carry their views into effect, our artisans would be exposed to the competition of foreign mechanics as well as the agriculturists would be exposed to the competition of corn from Poland and America.

What, he would ask, had been the effect produced on America by the boon which the Bill of last year, on the subject of Canada corn had given? American wheat, ground into flour in Canada, would be allowed to come in at 4s. by the Bill of last year, and had the Americans given any facilities to our manufactures in return? No; the duty in America on most articles of Birmingham manufacture was still about 200 per cent. ad valorem, so that it would not appear that Birmingham could expect much benefit from the abolition of protection. That was an example of the effects which they might expect from carrying those principles out fully.

The Earl of Radnor said, the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) appeared to accuse him of entertaining an objection to the expression of their opinions on the part of those who were opposed to him in their views on the subject of the Corn Laws. Now he did not object to any one for expressing his opinions; but, on the contrary, he had a very great objection to one-sided meetings, which he did not consider favourable to the formation of correct ideas. The effect of those one-sided meetings was to encourage those who attended them to persevere in their views, without seeing both sides of the question. At York, for instance, one of the resolutions was to the effect, that the "modified protection" to British agriculture, which was given by the existing law was agreed to after long deliberation, and after a distinct appeal to the people at a general election on the Corn Law and the Tariff. Now, he (the Earl of Radnor) could not agree to the statement which that resolution contained, [for there was no such appeal to the people as it mentioned at the general election, and they were taken by surprise on the subject of the Corn Law and the Tariff. The fact was, that at such meetings gentlemen all of one view meet together and there was usually no one present to contradict the opinions which they expressed. He was not displeased at meetings being held by those who were in favour of the Corn Laws, he was not displeased at anything which produced discussion on the subject, and the Members of the Anti-Corn Law League, so far from opposing discussion, absolutely entreated it. There were many meetings which had been held throughout the country, and described as meetings of tenant farmers, but he had doubts as to their being comprised solely of tenant farmers, and he should also doubt the statements which had been made to the effect that all the tenant farmers were averse to free trade. The Corn Laws were injurious, and that opinion was gaining ground every day both in this country and America, as a letter lately written by Mr. Calhoun went to prove. For the last twenty years we had been progressing towards free-trade, and adopting free-trade principles. Now, if these principles were wrong, the proper course would be to go back—to retrace our steps. But, on the contrary, the highest authorities and most distinguished Members of the present Government had declared the principles of free-trade to be the principles of common sense. Nothing could be more mischievous than to stop short where we now were. He (Lord Radnor) wished for nothing more than that the supporters of the Corn Laws would really allow discussion, but they did not permit it at their meetings.—Petition to lie on the Table.

PROTECTION TO AGRICULTURE.] The Duke of Richmond rose to present a petition in favour of Protection to Agriculture, which was adopted at a public meeting held at Guildford, called in pursuance of a requisition signed by 150 tenant farmers, agricultural labourers, and others interested in agriculture. A good deal had been said about the meetings in favour of protection to agriculture all consisting of those who were of one opinion, and not admitting discussion of the question. The answer to this complaint was—Bridgewater. Hired ruffians, called bludgeon-men, came to the Bridgewater Protection Meeting to make a row and disturb the proceedings. But did the free-traders allow discussion at the late Meeting in Birmingham? Not a single person was admitted to the Meeting without a ticket. They said the Chartists would come and interrupt. Here it was. He would tell the noble Earl, that the League, with Bright, Cobden, and its whole crew, would not dare to hold a public Free Trade Meeting in Birmingham, a meeting to which admission could be procured without tickets, for they knew the Chartists would attend and obstruct their proceedings. He was surprised, after all that had taken place, that any doubt could exist of the farmers being almost to a man hostile to the delusions of free-trade. He now presented a petition from tenant farmers and others engaged in agriculture, in favour of protection to agriculture.

The Earl of Radnor did entertain doubts on that subject. With respect to the statement that payment was given to persons who attended the Meeting at Bridgewater, he would state that no such payment had been given.

Petition to lie on the Table.

PRIVY COUNCIL APPELLATE JURISDICTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.] Lord Brougham moved the nomination of the Select Committee on this Bill, pursuant to notice. He was rather astonished to hear, if indeed he could after living so long be astonished at anything, that the motive assigned to him for his bringing in this Bill instead of the Government was, that he wanted to make a place for himself. He, however, ought not to be astonished at this assertion, considering the numerous race it belonged to, is a story engendered by Malice and her bastard sister Falsehood—begotten both by the father of lies upon the weakness of human nature. He believed that all of their Lordships had formed some passing acquaintance with that family, not excepting the noble Duke opposite, and the noble Earl (Earl Radnor) behind him, than whom he believed none cared less for such things. In this case the story lost nothing from the coincidence of there being a creation of places as well as a Bill; but one could not help feeling that the person who put forth the story ought to have reflected that anything more absurd could not have been devised by the wit of man. It was a perfectly notorious fact, that he (Lord Brougham) had refused such an offer three times over, and when his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, and another noble Friend pressed him to it, and when, if he consented, the Bill would have been brought in with all the weight of Government, he refused it. This had been more than once stated in this House by his noble and learned Friend himself. Now, if at his time of life, he were afflicted with the vices of old age, avarice (and he believed those who knew him, would admit that he had not indicated it before), he might have accepted that offer at a former period, when the Bill would have been brought in with the weight of Government; but at that period he refused it, and he refused it on these grounds, that he did not then see the necessity for it; he at that time had not lived to see the necessity which now existed for such a Bill—he had not lived to see such an increase in the business brought before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—he had not seen the great necessity which now existed for further judicial help, and that arose from no fault of his noble and learned Friends in that House. His noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack laboured as hard in the discharge of his duties in the Court of Chancery and in that House as any one could, and his noble and learned Friend behind him (Lord Campbell) had constantly attended since he obtained a seat in that House—they sat four days in the week for six hours a day, and no kind of blame attached to the House or to any individual of it; but when he saw the great arrears of business, and when he also saw a continual increase of business, he felt that four days in the week would not do. The question then was, why did he bring in the Bill? He brought it in for an obvious reason—he originated it—it was his Bill—he brought in the Bill relating to the Judicial Committee, and he introduced provisions relating to the Patent jurisdiction, but he had not taken any further steps until he felt it his duty to improve what had become a defect in the constitution of the Court. The noble and learned Lord concluded with nominating the Committee.

The Lord Chancellor repeated the suggestion he had formerly made, that the Bill should be divided into two parts.

NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.] In answer to Lord Brougham,

Lord Wharncliffe stated, that the walls of the new House of Lords had been raised twenty-five feet, and the House would be covered in in the course of two months. The House of Commons had been raised only nine feet. The architect would undertake to say that their Lordships' House might be ready for them next Session, if they would be contented with temporary fittings.

Lord Brougham thought that very little outlay would be needed, and he was sure the House of Commons would give the money.

Lord Sudeley was quite satisfied if the architect had really felt an inclination to meet the wishes of their Lordships, they might have been in their new House, perfectly and permanently fitted-up by the next Session, and before the next Session. As it was, the temporary fittings could not be supplied without very considerable expense. He thought it highly desirable that all their Lordships' House should have a full opportunity of seeing, not only what the architect's general arrangements as to the interior were, but what the details were, and what the materials, while it was yet time to suggest alterations. He had himself seen the model, and understood, he believed, pretty accurately what the arrangement was, and what the principal details were; nothing could be more simple, and he saw no reason why the building should not be rapidly completed, at all events for all practical purposes. He conceived it would be a good plan to revive the Committee on the subject, to whom the architect might explain what his final plans were.

The Marquess of Clanricarde moved the re-appointment of the Committee, with the addition to its Members of Lord Campbell.

Re-appointment of the Committee agreed to.

THE REV. HERBERT MARSH.] Lord Lilford wished to call the attention of the right rev. Prelate whom he saw in his place to some remarks which had appeared in the newspapers upon the subject of the rev. Herbert Marsh and to ask whether that person was still permitted to perform his clerical duties?

The Bishop of Peterborough said, that no person was more proper to put such a question than the noble Lord, who, it was well known took such a deep interest in the cause of religion, and who rendered the greatest services to it in the diocese in which the noble Lord lived, and of which he had charge. He had read the letter referred to with great pain. It accused him of conniving at the continued performance of his clerical duties by a person who had inflicted deep disgrace on his holy calling; it imputed to him that he still permitted to perform the offices of the Church, to administer the holy Sacrament, a person who had been guilty of offences which in another person, not screened, it was said, as the rev. Herbert Marsh was, by high rank and connections, would have been visited with condign punishment. It was stated that no notice had been taken of the matter by the Bishop until a short time before the trial which had just taken place. Now the first word he had heard about this grievous transaction was in September last, at which time the rev. Gentleman, who lived about nine miles from Peterborough, had just completed his residence as canon in that city. As soon as he got home, after hearing of the matter, he communicated with the rev. gentleman's friends; but he immediately found that there were great difficulties in the case—it was not he who objected to proceed; it was the law which interfered. Their Lordships would recollect, that there was no method by which a Bishop could proceed in such matters now, except under the Church Discipline Act; and that Act did not allow him to take any cognizance of a case which had occurred more than two years back. In this case the offence had been committed four years before it came within his knowledge. All that he then knew was (for the other circumstances did not come out until the trial)—that a criminal connection had taken place between the parties, but it was said that this had taken place at Paris. There was, however, another clause in the Church Discipline Bill, by which the Bishop was only allowed to take notice of crimes or offences committed by a clergyman in his own diocese. So far from there being any selfish inducement on his part to pursue the line of conduct which he did, the living, which was a valuable one, was in his own patronage, and he could find many most excellent and exemplary clergymen in his diocese to whom it would be most acceptable. On that ground, therefore, he could not have any object in screening this rev. Gentleman. The fact was, that he was prevented proceeding in this case in consequence of a defect in the law. He, however, had distinctly told the friends of this person that they must take care not to let him take upon himself any clerical duties in the diocese, and he distinctly stated at first that he could not bear to think of having him do any duty until his innocence of this crime had been proved and made manifest. Mr. Marsh had for a long time kept a curate in his parish, and was frequently absent from his living, residing sometimes at Peterborough and sometimes in this great metropolis; but since the time at which the charge had been brought against this reverend offender, he had not,

to his knowledge, done any duty in the parish, which had been entirely performed by the curate. He hoped, therefore, that he had satisfied noble Lords that he was not open to the charge which had been brought against him.

Lord Lilford said, that all who were acquainted with his right rev. Friend were well aware that the suggestion in the newspaper was without foundation, and he was sure that his right rev. Friend only wished to have an opportunity to contradict the statement.

House adjourned.

REDUCTION OF THE THREE-AND-A-HALF PER CENT. STOCKS.] The Report of the Committee on the Three Per Cent. Annuities Acts was brought up.

On the Question that the Resolutions be read a second time,

Mr. Hume said, as he was not present when the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought the subject of the Three-and-a-half per cents. under the consideration of the House, he would take that opportunity of saying a few words. He considered the statement and proposition of the right hon. Gentleman as perfectly fair; and, as his plan would effect a very considerable saving to the public, the public had a right to expect a proportionate diminution of taxation. He took it for granted, therefore, that after next year we should not hear any more of the Income Tax. He hoped that our establishment, which had for too long a time been kept up as a War Establishment, would soon be reduced to one of peace, and that every possible reduction would be made in it. He would not offer any obstruction to the Measure before the House, and would only add, that if the Government did not adopt a system of reduction, they would act in a manner most unsatisfactory to the country.

Resolutions read and agreed to.

Bill to be brought in to carry the Resolutions into effect. Mr. Speaker forthwith to give notice, that the "Three Pounds Ten Shillings per Centum Annuities, 1818," payable at the Bank of England, which were created by an Act passed in the fifty-eighth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, will be redeemed and paid off.

SUPPLY.—DUELLING.] The Report of the Committee of Supply was brought up, and several Resolutions were agreed to.

On the Resolution granting a sum for defraying the charge of Widows' Pensions, and the question that the House agreed on the said Resolution,

Captain Bernal rose pursuant to notice to move for a copy of any letter or correspondence which had passed between the Secretary at War and the widow of the late Lieutenant Colonel David Lynar Fawcett, C.B., relative to the withholding of her Pension. Before doing so, he said he wished to return thanks to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary at War for the prompt courtesy and kindness with which he had received his request on a late occasion, and at the same time to express a hope, that however the subject which he was about to bring before the House might suffer from being committed to his hands, when there were so many more able and experienced Members on either side of the House, it would at least be discussed in that spirit of good temper and moderation which, more than any other, it pre-eminently demanded. It would first be his duty to recall to the attention of the House the question put on a former evening by the hon. Member for Truro, to the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Treasury. The House would no doubt very forcibly remember that the right hon. Gentleman on that occasion took credit to his Government for having (to use the right hon. Baronet's own words) "exerted their legitimate influence, as far as they could, against the practice of Duelling by refusing a pension to the widow of an officer of great military reputation, who had distinguished himself in the service of his country, but who had unfortunately fallen in a duel." He begged also to remark, that the right hon. Baronet in making that declaration, had urged no special circumstances as affording ground for refusing this particular Pension; the credit he claimed for the Government was simply discouraging duelling. ["No, no."] If he was misstating, the right hon. Gentleman would, no doubt, set him right. When he heard this volunteer declaration of the right hon. Baronet, he felt astonished, not so much on account of the manifest injustice of the act itself, as on account of the credit that was taken for its performance. On further inquiry, he was still more astonished to learn that precedents were adduced in support of this mode of proceeding. He had himself made a close and diligent search, and he had not been successful in a single instance in finding a precedent. It was true that in the year 1817, when the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton was Secretary at War, an instance occurred of the refusal of a Pension to the widow of an officer who committed suicide; but he would leave it to the House to decide whether any analogy existed between that case and the one he was now bringing before them. It was not his intention, on the present occasion, to raise the question of Duelling generally. Where a majority of the Members of that House were so ready to follow in the footsteps of Pitt and Fox in at least one respect—that of the appeal to the duel—it was not likely that such a question could be discussed with any hope of a satisfactory result. Therefore, if he might advise his hon. Friend (Mr. Turner) who had a notice on the paper on the subject of duelling for Thursday next, he would say, that he would pursue a prudent course if he were to withdraw his notice, and, turning his attention more to the details of the subject, endeavour to bring in a Bill by which the relations of a deceased in a duel might come on the survivor for compensation. This he believed was the law of France, and in Scotland the same law existed under the technical name of "assythment." By adopting this course the hon. Member might effect a practical good with respect to Duelling, which no mere general resolution would ever bring about. The right hon. and gallant Officer had told the House the other night, that by a clause in the Mutiny Act any officer sending or conveying a challenge to another would be liable to a court-martial, and to be cashiered if convicted. [The hon. Member here read the terms of the clause in question, which were to the effect that the officer "giving, sending, conveying, or promoting" a challenge, should be liable to be cashiered on conviction by a court-martial, or suffer such other punishment according to the nature of the offence as the judgment of the court-martial might award.] Now, he took upon himself to say, that this clause was now entirely a dead letter; and as far as regarded his own experience of the Army, he could say that no officers in an ordinary case would refuse a challenge, and that he had not known of any instance of either the conveyer or promoter of a challenge having been brought before a court-martial. There was, he believed, one instance of an officer having in the year 1824 been deprived of his half-pay for having fought a duel. That was the case of Ensign Battier; but his offence was not so much fighting a duel as fighting his superior officer, and in a General Order, issued that year from the Horse Guards the noble Marquess who was his antagonist was blamed for fighting a duel with his inferior officer. The clause referred to by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was practically therefore a dead letter. It was impossible for an officer now to submit to insult without sending a challenge; and he (Captain Bernal) held in his hand a very remarkable document which was at once conclusive on the subject. It was a letter written by an individual possessing the very highest military reputation—of the highest character in every sense of the word, and in it the writer said:—

“Is a Gentleman who happens to be the King’s Minister to submit to be insulted by any Gentleman who thinks proper to attribute to him disgraceful or criminal motives for his conduct as an individual? I cannot doubt of the decision which I ought to make on this question. Your Lordship is alone responsible for the consequences. I now call upon your Lordship to give me that satisfaction for your conduct which a Gentleman has a right to require, and which a Gentleman never refuses to give.”

That letter was signed “Wellington.” It was needless for him to remind the House that that noble and distinguished individual now held the command at the Horse Guards. Nor was it perhaps necessary to remind them that the Gentleman who conveyed that letter now ably filled the office of Secretary at War. And yet, with such acts, by such high authorities before them, they were told of the exertion of legitimate influence to discourage Duelling, and there was a boast of depriving an unfortunate widow of her pension, the widow too of a man who probably thought that in sending a challenge he was “making that request which no gentleman would refuse to accede to, and which every gentleman ought to make.” He refrained from referring to other painful cases where fatal consequences had ensued, not from the absence of examples, but from the consideration of the feelings of the parties concerned. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman would immediately recognize the case of a distinguished Officer, now a Major of a cavalry regiment in India, who had been concerned in a duel which unfortunately proved fatal. The right hon. and gallant Officer had said the other night that there was no instance of an officer being cashiered for not fighting a duel. He (Captain Bernal) was not aware whether an officer had ever been cashiered, but in 1818 there was an instance (he refrained for obvious reasons from mentioning names) of a Lieutenant Colonel in the Royal Marines being tried by a court-martial “for neglecting to demand the honourable adjustment of a quarrel.” And very recently an ensign in the 1st Bombay European Regiment was tried for conduct unbecoming an officer, because he had received a blow without resorting to those means of redress which were open to him. He was sentenced to be deprived of his rank and pay for six months. Of another case he (Captain Bernal) could speak from his own knowledge. An officer, after having been insulted, refused to fight a duel and was driven out of his regiment. He was more inexperienced when he took part in that transaction than at present, but he did not mean now to shrink from the part he took, nor did he hesitate to avow the sentiments which then actuated him. He believed he had now said enough to show what anomalies there were in the system. If an officer refused to take part in a duel he was judged and condemned accordingly—if he took part in one and his antagonist fell, he was liable to be tried for his life, and, as if to fill up the measure of vengeance, his widow was after his death liable to be deprived of her pension. With regard to the subject of pensions of this sort there appeared to be considerable misapprehension. Hon. Gentlemen appeared to think that widows had a right to pensions. Under correction, he asserted his belief that widows had no such right. If a widow would declare that she was not left in competent circumstances, and satisfied the Treasury as to other matters, there was no reason to suppose that a pension would be declined. In the present case, however, he wished to remind hon. Gentlemen on both sides that had Colonel Fawcett sold his commission a week before he died the sum of 3,200*l.* would have been at his widow's disposal; so that the unfortunate lady had not only been deprived of her pension, but also of the capital which her husband had embarked in the service. He wished also to call the attention of the House to the circumstances that had occurred on the late trials in Ireland, and, in doing so, he begged to disclaim all desire to cast unworthy taunts on the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Smith). Whatever difference of opinion might be entertained as to other parts of the right hon. Gentleman's conduct, the main way in which he had come to that House and explained the circumstances of the transaction alluded to was sufficient to obliterate all feeling which might at first have been entertained. But he was, nevertheless at a loss to understand how the right hon. Baronet could reconcile it to himself to treat the affair of the Irish Attorney General as a mere breach of decorum, while in the case of Colonel Fawcett (and he, too, a military officer) he was going the length of depriving the widow of her pension.

"Dat veniam corvis, vexat censura columbas."

For that lady to have lost her husband by the hand of her brother-in-law was surely cruel suffering enough without this additional aggravation; and now that the seconds had been acquitted, and still held commissions in the service, surely it savoured rather of persecution to withhold a paltry pension from a wretched and aggrieved woman. He could assure the House that he had no knowledge of or acquaintance with the lady in question; but he called on the House to treat her case with kind consideration, and he still could not help entertaining a lively hope that the right hon. Gentleman, whose character for courage was only equalled by his reputation for humanity, would, on further reflection, be inclined not to withdraw this pension, but to grant it to the widow of a man who, in the words of the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government, "was a man of great military reputation, who had distinguished himself in the service of his country." The hon. Member concluded by moving for the papers.

Sir H. Hardinge would endeavour to follow the example of the gallant Officer, and make the remarks he should offer to the House with the same excellent temper and good feeling which the gallant Officer had shown in introducing his Motion. He felt called upon to justify to the House the decision which he, in the exercise of the responsibility and discretion with which he was entrusted by virtue of his office, had formed, and which had been subsequently confirmed by his right hon. Friend. He might, however, at the outset, be allowed to say that in the exercise of that responsibility and discretion, he had been influenced by special circumstances, and not, as the hon. and gallant Officer supposed, by any direct or general rule; on the contrary, he had been actuated by the consideration that there were circumstances so unjustifiable in this duel as to require the Government to show as much discouragement and as marked a displeasure as possible. He would inform the House what had taken place. In September he had received a communication from the Army agent, asking for a pension for Mrs. Fawcett. He sent to the agent—not a letter, because at the time, he desired not to record his opinion of the circumstances out of which the application had arisen—but a communication, informing him that in his (Sir H. Hardinge's) opinion, it was a case in which a pension could not be recommended by him; but, under all the circumstances of the case, he recommended the agent through his private secretary not to press his application at that time. In the course of a month he received another letter from the agent withdrawing the first application. He did this, as he had already said, in order that the case of Lieutenant Munro, who was then understood to be about to take his trial, might not be prejudiced from any record of his that he considered the duel unjustifiable; and, not wishing to prejudice the case, he thought it best to take the course he had stated—not to make any record of his reasons for withholding the pension, but merely stating to the widow, that under all the circumstances, he thought the case was one in which pension ought not to be granted. Now, with regard to what passed between him and his right hon. Friend; his right hon. Friend wrote to him upon the subject of Mr. Munro from the country, asking him when steps had been taken to supersede that officer? His (Sir H. Hardinge's) answer was, that he understood expectations were held out by the friends of Mr.

Munro that in a month or two that gentleman would surrender and take his trial. This was subsequent to his decision upon the application of Mrs. Fawcett. Expecting that Mr. Munro would take his trial, he thought it would be equally prejudging his case if he had been superseded by the Horse Guards previous to his taking his trial; and he further stated that he would confer with the Commander-in-chief on the subject; but he at the same time stated to his right hon. Friend, that considering the near relationship of the parties, he had taken the step of informing the agent that he did not think he should be justified in recommending that a pension should be given to Mrs. Fawcett. In that decision his right hon. Friend ultimately concurred. Therefore the gallant Officer (Captain Bernal) would see that the refusal of the pension rested upon special grounds, and not on any general rule. He would now state to the House what was the usual practice of the War Office in regard to granting pensions to the widows of officers who fell in duels. And as illustrating that practice, he would state a case that had occurred. In 1829, when he had the honour to hold the office of Secretary at War, a duel between two officers, which terminated fatally in the case of one of them, occurred in Ceylon; the circumstance was reported in due course to him, and the claim of the widow of the officer who had fallen came before him for consideration. He found the report he had received from Ceylon was not sufficient to give him a perfect knowledge of the merits of the case, and he therefore referred it back for further particulars. He (Sir H. Hardinge) left office in 1830, before the answer from Ceylon was received. The noble Lord (Lord Palmerston) who had preceded him in that office, in reference to the case of the widow of an officer who had committed self-destruction at a moment of temporary insanity, stated his opinion in a Minute in 1826:—

“That the case of an officer who lost his life by his own act, was the same as that of an officer killed in a duel; the widow had no claim to the pension, but the case must be governed by its own special circumstances.”

That was the precedent to which he had referred in 1829, and after expressing some dissatisfaction as to the insufficiency of the report from Ceylon, he made a Minute dated December, 1829—having the Minute of the noble Lord before him at the time—which was as follows:—

“The Secretary-at-War (Sir H. Hardinge) must defer coming to any decision on the case submitted to him, in the absence of information as to the conduct of the parties, and the special circumstances of the duel. The claim of the widow to a pension was derived from the public services of the husband, and not from circumstances of compassion. If the husband lost his life in a private or personal quarrel, unless the circumstances admitted of palliation, the widow would not be entitled to a pension—but making all due allowance for custom and prejudice, as regards Duelling, if the Secretary-at-War can recommend the granting of the pension, he will exercise his discretion in favour of the widow.”

He had been unable to decide, from the absence of sufficient information, up to the period at which he left office. In the year 1830 it would be remembered he was succeeded by Mr. Wynn as Secretary-at-War, and when the case came before that right hon. Gentleman, he referred to the Minutes which had been made by him Sir H. Hardinge and Lord Palmerston; and an answer having been in the mean time received from the General commanding in Ceylon as to the facts of the case, Mr. Wynn made a Minute, which was to this effect:—“That, as there were no circumstances of palliation, he must on the principle laid down by Sir Henry Hardinge and Lord Palmerston, negative the application.” And accordingly, a letter was written to the lady, informing her that her application for the pension could not be granted. He (Sir H. Hardinge) thought he had now shown that in certain cases, when an application was made for the pension by the widow of any officer who had fallen in a duel, and circumstances of palliation could be brought forward, the Government were not disposed to refuse to give to such an application due consideration. But looking further to those cases in which pensions had actually been granted, he found a case in which the circumstances attending the affair were still more unfortunate than in that now under consideration. He alluded to the case in which Captain Boyd lost his life in a duel with Major Campbell. In that case, on its being proved to the satisfaction of the Government, that Captain Boyd had been forced into the duel, that the pistols had been actually forced into his hand, and that there were circumstances of palliation, they at once accorded the pension to his widow. Now, he had brought forward two cases—one decided by Mr. Wynn, in which no pension had been granted, because no circumstances of palliation could be shown; and another, which had been decided in 1807, or 1808, in which the Government had granted the pension, there being circumstances of palliation. He now came to the case of Mrs. Fawcett. His noble Friend, the Commander-in-chief, during the recess, had been anxious to consider the subject with the view of devising, if possible, some means by which the practice of duelling in the Army might be discouraged and prevented. Being also engaged in that investigation, and taking the circumstances of Mrs. Fawcett's case as they appeared before him—judging from the words of the opinions of previous Secretaries of War, and judging as a person filling the office he had the honour to hold would be supposed to judge, it did appear to him, that under all the circumstances of the case, it was impossible for him to recommend, that the pension should be granted to Mrs. Fawcett. Looking at the near relationship which had existed between the principals in the duel, and to the fact that no insult had been given which might not have been explained away—no difference which might not have been adjusted without detracting from the honour of either party—for he believed nothing more had passed than the one party saying to the other, “your manner and language are so unpleasant that you had better leave the room”—seeing that the insult was so very trifling as to afford no palliation, no justification for two men so nearly allied as brothers-in-law to go out and fight a duel—and Colonel Fawcett being a man of distinguished courage and distinction in the service, recently displayed in China, could have had no excuse for going out so readily to shoot his brother-in-law. Looking at all those circumstances, his opinion had been from the first, and was still, that this was a case in which the pension ought not to be granted. Although he had a due respect for the services of Colonel Fawcett, he could not bring himself to believe that it was within the province of his discretion to recommend the case as one deserving of favourable consideration. But it should not be forgotten that the pension of the widow was not granted as a mere matter of right, or upon consideration of whether the services performed by the husband entitled her to it, but, also upon the circumstances attending his death; for instance, if killed in action, a double pension was awarded, while, on the other hand, circumstances might arise on the death of the husband to deprive a widow of her pension altogether. In the case of an officer whose public accounts were involved, or who had been guilty of embezzlement, no pension would be given to his widow. Special grounds, therefore, would be sufficient either to give or refuse a pension. He could assure the House that he had, in dealing with the present case, desired to consider it in the most liberal point of view, but, nevertheless, he did not see how he could have made an exception in regard to it. He had, after due consideration, come to a decision on the subject, and in that decision the Government concurred. He was confident, too, that his decision was the correct one, and that it would go far to discourage a repetition of similar proceedings under such unjustifiable circumstances. He felt that he had exercised a sound discretion in the matter, and he was sorry to inform the hon. and gallant Member (Captain Bernal) that he had heard nothing to induce him to alter his determination, and by that determination he meant to stand. There were numerous cases in which the claims for pensions, on behalf of officers' widows, had been admitted; but in these, also, special circumstances existed. When the British Army was on the Continent, it was no uncommon occurrence for four or five duels to occur in the course of a single day. Officers in Her Majesty's service, dressed in their uniform, were often insulted by foreign officers, and compelled to fight, and if any officer's widow, whose husband had been thus killed in a duel, was to apply for a pension, it was justifiable to grant her pension in a case where the officer had been forced to fight in defence of his uniform, and the service to which he belonged. He thought, then, he had shown that the exercise of a discretion in these matters was a part of the duty of the Secretary at War. The hon. and gallant Officer had said, that he could not admit any distinction in the granting of pensions to officer's widows, on the ground that the husband had fallen in a duel, when very high military authorities had set examples of duelling. The hon. and gallant Officer had stated that Lord Londonderry had fought with an officer of lower rank than himself, and that no punishment had followed. But Lord Londonderry, it must be remembered, fought an officer who was, at the time, on half-pay, and not, therefore, amenable to military law—and the noble Lord fought him, not as an officer, but on the same condition as he would have felt bound to give a meeting to any other gentleman. And in the case of the Duke of Wellington, the person with whom the noble Duke fought, was another noble Lord not in the Army. And let the House distinctly understand, that it was no part of the military code to deprive an officer of the right to demand or give satisfaction, in case of a difference with a person not in the Army—in the case of a difference in which the vindication of his character required such a course to be taken. With regard to the statement that no superior officer had been dismissed for being engaged in a duel, he would remind him that General Burton, who fought an officer on full pay, was dismissed. The hon. and gallant Officer had also spoken of the case of a colonel of Marines, who had been engaged in a duel. In that case the officer had submitted to repeated insults directed against him for a long period, and at length, on those insults being reported by another officer of Marines, he found it was impossible to avoid noticing them, and in that case the circumstances were considered by the authorities so bad, that one officer was dismissed the service, and the other reduced to half-pay. He had a great desire to discourage and suppress the practice of duelling, so far as it could be done, and Her Majesty's Government had been occupied during the recess with the consideration of means to put a stop to it. And he was now prepared to state what he was not in a condition to announce on a former evening, when the subject was under discussion, for he had not at that time the official sanction of Her Majesty to do so; now he was enabled to say that Her Majesty, to show her disapprobation and abhorrence of the practice of duelling, had authorised him to amend the Articles of War, by the insertion of additional Articles, which he hoped would have the effect of materially suppressing it. Perhaps the House would prefer that he should read the proposed Articles, which he would do, merely premising that Her Majesty, when she heard of the unfortunate occurrence between Colonel Fawcett and Mr. Munro, with that humanity and consideration for the welfare of her subjects which always characterised her, expressed a strong desire that measures should be devised for putting an end to this barbarous custom. The first amended Article was to this effect:—

"Every officer who shall give or send a challenge, or who shall accept any challenge to fight a duel with another officer, or who being privy to an intention to fight a duel, shall not take active measures to prevent such duel, or who shall upbraid another for refusing or for not giving a challenge, or who shall reject, or advise the rejection, of a reasonable proposition made for the honourable adjustment of a difference, shall be liable, if convicted before a general court martial, to be cashiered, or suffer such other punishment as the court may award."

The second was:—

"In the event of an officer being brought to a court martial for having acted as a second in a duel, if it shall appear that such officer had strenuously exerted himself to effect an adjustment of the difference on terms consistent with the honour of both parties, and shall have failed through the unwillingness of the adverse parties to accept terms of honourable accommodation, then our will and pleasure is, that such officer shall suffer such punishment as the court may award."

Then there was a declaratory clause, in which Her Majesty expressed her approval of officers who endeavoured to repress the practice of duelling; and as the wishes expressed by Her Majesty in this clause were most reasonable, he was quite sure they would meet with every attention:—

"We hereby declare our approbation of the conduct of all those who, having had the misfortune of giving offence to, or injured, or insulted others, shall frankly explain, apologise, or offer redress for the same; or who, having had the misfortune of receiving offence, injury, or insult from another, shall cordially accept frank explanations, apology, or redress for the same, or who, if such explanations, apology, or redress are refused to be made or accepted, shall submit the matter to be dealt with by the commanding officer of the regiment or detachment, fort or garrison, and we accordingly acquit you of disgrace, or opinion of disadvantage, all officers and soldiers, who, being willing to make or except such redress, refuse to accept challenges, as they will only have acted as is suitable to the character of honourable men, and have done their duty as good soldiers, who subject themselves to discipline."

Now the manner in which this would act was this; when a difficulty arose in the settlement of a quarrel between two officers, and their mutual friends should be unable to accommodate the matter to the satisfaction of the parties, it would be referred to the commanding officer of the regiment or detachment, and if the commanding officer should not be able to arrange the difference between them, then they would be liable to be brought before a court martial, and subjected to punishment, as he had stated. And by the second

Article, if it should appear that the second in any duel had used every endeavour to arrange the difference between the parties, and to prevent the duel, but should fail through the unwillingness of one of the parties, he should not be liable to be punished to the same extent by the court martial as those who had refused honourable terms of adjustment. He could only state generally on the subject, that the effect of these new Articles would necessarily tend to discourage the practice of duelling in the Army. And he must observe, too, that when Her Majesty's opinion upon the subject should become known to the public at large, it would tend much to prevent the practice, and that not only officers in the Army and Navy, but private gentlemen, when they did wrong or gave offence to others, would be ready to apologise, and when offence had been received, to accept apologies like gentlemen, instead of resorting to duelling for the settlement of their quarrels. He had but little doubt when it was found that the officers of the Army took this course of redressing their wrongs, before long the other portions of the community would follow the example, and duelling would, in a great degree, be put an end to. He could not hope at once to check an evil that had existed so long, all he could expect was, to diminish it and to modify it. The Army was never in a better state than at this moment; and in corroboration of what he had asserted last week, he could now state that at Chatham where there were twenty-five regimental dépôts, and from seventy to eighty officers of different regiments messing and living together, there had not been a single instance of duelling for eight years; and he had every reason to believe that that disgraceful, criminal, and unreasonable practice was fast going into disuse in all societies; and that there was quite as little of it in the Army as elsewhere. He did not think it necessary, on that occasion, to go into the question of the military discipline of the Army in regard to duelling. He could conceive cases in which men acting disreputably and without proper courage, had been forced to leave their regiment, as the hon. and gallant officer had stated; but these were cases which defied legislation, and it was impossible for any Government or Secretary at War to devise Articles of War to meet such cases. All they could do, was to propose such rules and regulations as they thought best, and carry them out fairly, and with as much energy as they could. But, having said so much, he must beg the House not to be misled by a wrong impression; it must be distinctly understood that the Articles of War applied only to officers on full pay, and performing military duty. Officers living in garrison, barracks, or forts, and living in a family as it were together, required to be kept in subordination, and under discipline; and these, therefore, were governed by military laws, and it was necessary that means should be proposed by the authorities of immediately redressing those grievances and differences which might arise between the officers. But if any officer in the Army quarrelled with another gentleman in private life, he would be as free to vindicate his private honour as any man who did not hold the Queen's commission. He would never be a party to impose on any man in the profession of arms—however barbarous the custom, and however much he disliked the practice—the liability to be insulted in the streets or elsewhere, without the power of redressing his own honour, merely because he was an officer in Her Majesty's service. It was impossible to devise Articles to affect officers on half-pay, or to make them amenable to military law; and they could not interfere should an officer so circumstanced engage in a duel, unless in a case so distinctly and obviously wrong, that public opinion was against him; and in that case Her Majesty would, without doubt, exercise Her prerogative, whether the guilty party were on half pay or full pay. He believed so much had the practice gone down, that where there was one duel now there had been fifty formerly. With regard to the papers for which the hon. and gallant Officer had moved, they should be laid on the Table; but he again had to express his regret that he could hold out no hope of being able to recommend the granting of the pension to the unfortunate lady, Mrs. Fawcett. The hon. and gallant Officer was right in saying that there were other considerations which governed the granting of these pensions than the deserts of the deceased officer—he meant considerations of need. When an officer's widow applied, and it was found that she was in wealthy circumstances, the pension would not be accorded. And, in the case of Mrs. Fawcett, if the circumstances attending the death of Colonel Fawcett had been different, the question would still come under the consideration of the War Office, whether the lady was in such reduced circumstances as to require it. He was happy to say that he understood she was not. But it must be distinctly understood that that was not the principle upon which his decision had been come to, the principle was that which he had stated, and he was sorry to say he could hold out no hope whatever of reversing that decision.

Mr. T. Duncombe having just heard the announcement of the Government's intention to propose certain new regulations for the army, felt that the House would not consider it convenient at that time to discuss them. He might, however, be permitted to observe, that he did not think they would have the effect which the right hon. and gallant Officer anticipated. In some respects they appeared to him (Mr. T. Duncombe) to be a relaxation of the existing law as to Duelling and the sending of challenges in the army, as laid down in the Mutiny Act. In the case of seconds, the right hon. and gallant Officer had stated, that if it should appear that they had done every thing in their power to bring about an amicable arrangement and prevent a duel, the punishment was to be mild. But there was nothing more stringent than the present law on the subject, and what became of the new regulation, when the law of the country declared that the second in a duel was as guilty as the principal? He had no acquaintance with either the officer who had fallen in the duel which had been referred to or with Lieutenant Munro. But, at the request of his friends, the latter Gentleman had addressed to him (Mr. T. Duncombe) a letter on the subject, and he thought it due to the character of that Gentleman, and of the seconds engaged in the affair, whose conduct had been blamed that evening, to read it:—He must state, that he believed that in this case the seconds were not the parties to blame, and, indeed, that if all the particulars of the case were known, that Lieutenant Munro would be found entitled to the deep commiseration and sympathy, instead of the censure of the public. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had stated, that he had been told that the affair might and ought to have been settled easily. That it ought to have been settled there was no doubt, but the right hon. Gentleman had stated, that the duel arose from the circumstance of Lieutenant Munro having been told to leave the room; but if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was acquainted with all the circumstances, he would have known that language very different from such a request was used to Lieutenant Munro. Again, the right hon. Gentleman had stated that the parties went out, and the duel had taken place the morning after the night on which the insult had been given. He had certainly been under the same impression until he received the statement which he now held in his hand, and he thought that the public would be inclined to judge differently of the case, when they knew all the circumstances connected with the transactions which occurred during the day intervening between the quarrel and the duel. The quarrel took place on the Thursday evening, and the duel was not fought until Saturday morning, the 1st of July. The whole of the day was passed by the seconds and Lieutenant Munro in taking the opinions of persons in high stations—not only in military life, but in general society, as to what course ought to be adopted in reference to the matter. The hon. Gentleman then proceeded to read the statement of Lieutenant Munro to the following effect:—

“ I returned, and said, that if it had not been for the connection that existed between us, and the unseemly nature of such a proceeding, that I would bring him to account for it, or have resented it upon the spot; he replied, that as to the connection, he wished never to hear of it again, and hoped that it would not prevent me from doing what I referred to. I then went away. Upon the following morning I took the opinion of an officer of acknowledged judgment, and of upwards of thirty years, standing in the Army, upon the unfortunate occurrence. He said, that during the course of his service he had never heard of so gross an outrage, and that, as a British officer upon full pay, I had no alternative whatever but what was usual, viz., an apology or a meeting. I then called upon Mr. Grant, and took him with me to consult with a friend of much experience in these unhappy affairs. His opinion entirely coincided with that of my other friend, but he said he would take the advice of a general officer about it, whose reply was, that no officer holding her Majesty's Commission could possibly exist under such an insult. In the course of the same day I took the opinions of three other friends (all officers, or having been in the Army); they all said that, however lamentable the proceeding was, that I was compelled to uphold the honour of the station I held in the service at the hazard of my life. I hoped that one word of regret might have been expressed for the wanton and gross insult put upon me, but none would be given, and a meeting was proposed that day by Lieutenant Colonel Fawcett, to which Mr. Grant objected. When I found, late in the evening of the 30th of June, that no amicable arrangement was likely to be come to, although I had left the affair entirely in the hands of my seconds, I wrote a note, recommending my wife and children to the care of some friends; and also a paper (which I signed in the presence of two witnesses), declaring that I most deeply deplored being obliged to go out with Lieutenant Colonel Fawcett, and that, from circumstances over which I had no control, I was forced to do so; I most earnestly desired that some arrangement might be come to the following morning, and I made three appeals to Mr. Grant upon the ground, with that view, saying each time, 'Good God, Grant, can nothing be done to stop this dreadful affair from going on?' but it appears that he was so obstinately and violently received the day before by Lieutenant Colonel Fawcett, that he had no hope of coming to a friendly understanding. It would be both imprudent and improper for me to proceed further with the details of this most melancholy transaction, but I think I have said enough to convince most fair, thinking men, that I am much more to be sympathized with than blamed for what has happened."

The hon. Gentleman continued: That statement placed the affair in quite a different light. Why, what was the state of the case? Lieutenant Colonel Fawcett's widow had been deprived of her pension in consequence of this duel. If her husband had fallen in the service of his country, she would have had a pension. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had stated, that there were special circumstances in Colonel Fawcett's case which prevented him from making the provision of a pension. [Sir Henry Hardinge: the special circumstances referred principally to the relationship of the parties.] He admitted that there might be cases in which peculiar circumstances might justify a Government in refusing a pension, such as when it could be proved that the wife was a party to the transaction, and knew of the duel beforehand. But what was the case as regarded Lieutenant Munro? Indeed, he would wish to make an addition to the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend, and to have all the correspondence which had passed between the Horse-Guards and Lieutenant Munro in reference to his having been superseded, laid on the Table of the House. The duel took place upon the 1st of July last, and Lieutenant Munro was not superseded until February. He purchased his commission that was lost, and his pay was stopped from the 1st of July last, although he belonged to the Army until the end of February. He did not see what right the Horse-Guards had, in such a case, to stop the pay as they did. [An Hon. Member: Lieutenant Munro was absent without leave.] But the right hon. Gentleman had stated, that he would not supersede Lieutenant Munro, because he understood that he was going to take his trial. Why, that was a tacit acquiescence in his absence. But what was the condition of Lieutenant Munro now? He described his condition thus:—

"I will not attempt to describe my own most unhappy state of mind since I have been forced to fly from my country, my profession, and my beloved wife, children, father, mother, and relatives; but those who have known me from my childhood, and my gallant comrades, can conceive what I have suffered. I had a happy and a contented home; my utmost and constant endeavours were directed to perform, to the best of my power, my duties to my God, to all men, and also as a faithful subject to Her Most Gracious Majesty, and I am now a marked and wretched exile! It has been said that I was to enter a foreign service, and I have occasionally, in my solitude and wretchedness, thought of doing so; but my heart and my affections are and ever will, remain with my kindred and my country; and I do not think that I need be ashamed of owning that, when alone, I have shed many a bitter tear for what has happened, but what I could not prevent; but I have a great consolation in the assurance that my Merciful and All-seeing Maker will hold me guiltless of the abominable and horrible crime that erring men like myself lay to my charge."

Lieutenant Munro was not to be blamed for this duel. He was a victim to the barbarous system of Duelling. The persons who were to blame were those who promoted and upheld the system. The persons who were to blame were, or at least one of them, that General Officer, who told him that, at the hazard of his life, he must stand not only by his own honour but by that of his corps; that if he had not done this he would have been dismissed from that service to which he was an ornament. Now, after having followed what to him were really the commands of this General Officer, if Lieutenant Munro had come forward, and, as the phrase goes, thrown himself upon God and his country, what would have been the consequence? Most probably he would have been visited by transportation. That was the way in which Officers were exposed to transportation upon the one hand, or to stigma and dismissal from the service upon the other. It really behoved the House to do something to put an end to this state of things, and merely passing these Articles of War would not do. They must go one step further, and should pronounce that they would not consider the man degraded in the eyes of society who did not fall into the melancholy error of Lieutenant Muoro. But he was afraid that, notwithstanding, they must go through the farce of confirming these declarations which Her Majesty was about to issue; he considered it a farce, unless this House was prepared to express some stronger opinion than they had yet done upon the subject, for he did believe that, heartily as they all seemed to unite in condemning this system, there was hardly a man now hearing him who, if he received an insult such as Lieutenant Muoro had been subjected to, would not have adopted a similar way of avenging it. It was true that public opinion generally condemned duelling, but they must go further than public opinion. Half-pay officers engaged in duelling should be punished, he thought, as well as officers on full-pay. It was a most painful subject for the House to enter into, but he did say that the man, the Minister of the Crown, or merely a private Member of the House, who could by possibility put a stop to Duelling, would be entitled, he thought, to the gratitude and respect not only of the House, but of the country.

Sir C. Napier admitted, that the widow of an officer had no abstract right to a pension. The Crown bestowed a pension upon widows, but a warrant was issued stating the cases of those widows who were not to have pensions. Duelling was not one of those cases. It was true, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had read a minute as to the case of an officer in Ceylon, who had been killed in a duel. But that minute had not been made public. He doubted whether any officer ever knew of it, and he thought that if Lieutenant Colonel Fawcett had not heard of this minute, his widow had not been justly treated. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had stated, that there were special circumstances attending the case of Mrs. Fawcett, which precluded her from receiving a pension, but he did not tell the House what these circumstances were. He would wish to hear whether Mrs. Fawcett had anything to do with the duel, and whether she knew beforehand that it was to take place? He did not believe that she knew anything of the sort. There might be delicate circumstances connected with the case which prevented the right hon. Secretary at War from letting the House know all that he was acquainted with; but he could not be satisfied that Mrs. Fawcett was properly treated unless they had some distinct declaration that she was in some way privy to the melancholy transaction. He agreed with all that had been said relative to the hideousness of Duelling in general, but particularly to that of Duelling between near relations. As to the late case, there was nothing on earth to excuse it; surely brothers, or even brothers-in-law, should never fight. No, nor even cousins. These were his sentiments upon the matter. They could not put an end to Duelling at once, but they should discourage it as far as they could by stating their opinion of such quarrels, particularly between relations. They had heard that a general officer had given it as his opinion that the duel should take place. He thought it lamentable that a man, at a time of life at which it was probable that that officer had arrived, should give such advice. But that advice did not justify the seconds. They should have said—we will not go out, or take a part in this matter, and if you are determined to fight, you must find other seconds. Now, according to the rules and customs of the duel, if two seconds, after mature deliberation, come to the conclusion of not going out, the principals would not find other seconds, who, on knowing the previous circumstances, would consent to act as such. In the present case, these seconds had been acquitted, and he believed that they had not been punished at all. Surely the case was of such a character, that if the Secretary at War punished the widow, he was punishing the least culpable party of all. He did hope that the matter would yet be reconsidered. They had heard of new regulations touching Duelling to be introduced into the Army. He agreed with the hon. Member for Finsbury in thinking that these Resolutions would not answer the purpose they were intended to serve. It was not necessary that officers should make it public that they were going to fight a duel. The public would know nothing of the matter unless one of the combatants should be killed or wounded. And every person in the regiment would think himself bound to keep the affair as secret as he could, for the purpose of evading the regulations. He would suggest another means of putting down Duelling. It was true that Duelling was going out of fashion; but there were few officers in the Army and Navy who had not seen or heard of persons in both services—practised duellists—men who made a habit of practising pistol-shooting, and attained such a degree of proficiency that they could almost shoot a sparrow's eye out—at all events, that the person who went out with them had not the slightest chance of his life. Now the pistol was not a necessary weapon in war. It was not necessary that a man should be a pistol-shot; and he should like to see some regulation adopted in the Army to the effect that if it was brought home to any officer that he was a practised pistol-shot with a view to duelling, that such an officer should be severely punished. But they should go further, and provide against duelling in civil life. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary at War had stated that duelling had almost gone out of the Army; but to hear the discussions which had lately taken place in this House upon the subject, one would suppose that it existed in the Army alone. He thought then, that they had better begin with civilians—ay, with the First Minister of the Crown, and go down from him to every Minister who ever sat on the Benches on either side of the House. He would make one and all of them incapable of becoming a Minister of the Crown after it was proved either that he had sent a challenge or fought a duel. He would go further, and apply the same rule to Solicitors General and Attorneys General, and all Gentlemen of the same genus. If such a regulation had been long in practice, however, he feared that there were a considerable number of Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench who would not be sitting there now. He did not know how the rule would affect the ex-Treasury Bench on his side of the House, but he repeated, that he would like to see a regulation issuing from Her Majesty, to the effect that no person could be competent to become a Minister of the Crown, who had been engaged in a duel. That would be a powerful preventative. But then, on the other hand the remedy might prove worse than the disease, for had the plan been in operation they must have lost, among others, the services of the Commander-in-chief the Duke of Wellington. He did not think it fair or right, however, for the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary at War to promulgate his Regulations as to the Army unless some such measures were applied to the Navy, and also to persons in civil life. He would tell them a way of putting down Duelling at once. He would not allow a duel to be fought unless across a table. First let one pistol be loaded with ball and the other not, and let lots be drawn who shall have the loaded pistol; then, if that had no effect, let both be loaded with ball, and then let the Gentleman who was not shot be hanged.
